

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. PUBLIC BILL.—3<sup>a</sup> Transportation and Penal Servitude.

TREATMENT OF SAILORS IN MERCHANT SHIPS—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, he wished to put a question to his noble Friend the President of the Board of Trade of which he had given him notice. Their Lordships might have seen the report of a case which had been brought before the Liverpool Police Office involving circumstances of a most atrocious character. It would appear that a man, who had been engaged on board a ship that was to sail from Demerara to Liverpool, during the course of the voyage was subjected to treatment of the most atrocious nature by the captain and the mate. Not only was he scourged, starved, and put in irons, but upon occasions, a large ferocious dog was let loose upon him, which tore his flesh, and left him lying in a pool of blood; the result of this treatment was that in a short time the poor man died, and the body was thrown overboard. On the ship reaching Liverpool the matter was brought before the police office there. Now, he wished to know whether the subject had received the attention of the Government, and whether measures would be taken to bring the parties implicated to justice? He also might be allowed to ask, whether it was the intention of the Government to introduce a measure for the better regulation of the mercantile marine?

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, that he could assure his noble Friend, that the Board of Trade would always do their utmost to prevent the perpetration of such atrocious cruelties as those to which the noble Earl had referred. His attention had been directed to the case alluded to, which he admitted, taking the facts to be as they were given in evidence at the police court, was one of very gross cruelty. A prosecution had been instituted, the master and mate had been committed, bail being refused, and they now awaited their trial. He might observe that it was the duty of the master to forward information of all cases of death occurring under circumstances of suspicion on board of any vessel arriving at the port to the Board of Trade, who, if they thought the facts warranted it, would prosecute the parties implicated. A similar case of cruelty to that referred to by his noble Friend had occurred very recently on board a vessel called the Anna Jane, where a sailor died from the ill-treatment he received. That case was brought to the notice of the Board of Trade in the way he had stated, and the guilty party was prosecuted at the last Spring Assizes, and was transported for life.

RESIGNATION OF THE BISHOP OF NORWICH—OBSERVATIONS.

LORD REDESDALE rose, pursuant to notice, to call their Lordships' attention to the circumstances attending the resignation of the Bishop of Norwich. Their Lordships must feel that, after what took place in the debates last year concerning the resignations of Bishops, it was impossible that they should pass over the vacation of a see without the intervention of Parliament, and the succession of one Bishop to the seat of another in that House, without some step being taken to ascertain from those who were principally responsible for the proceeding, on what grounds they had acted and what they conceived to be the law which governed them in these cases. Their Lordships would recollect, that during the debates concerning the resignations of the Bishop of Durham and London last year, doubts were expressed whether a Bishop had any power to resign, and it was admitted on all hands that no provision in the nature of a retiring pension could be made without the sanction of Parliament. For his own part, he thought then, and still believed, that any arrangement for resigning upon a retiring pension settled beforehand partook strongly of the character of simony. It was felt that there was some objection to the proceedings then under discussion, and a promise was given by the Government that a measure should be introduced to make a fixed and permanent provision for resignations of this kind. In that position the question still remained. Towards the close of the Session of last year, in the course of a debate, it was stated that the Bishop of Norwich, feeling himself unable to discharge the duties of his see, was anxious to resign if an arrangement could be made for that purpose; consequently the state of matters connected with the See of Norwich was known so far back as last year. When the Parliament met early in the present year; it was then stated by the Government, on being asked their intentions on the subject, that a Bill upon this subject was prepared, and that it would very shortly be laid before Parliament. Circumstances then occurred which led to a dissolution of Parliament, and when that was impending it was felt that it would be useless to introduce a measure which could not then be passed into a law, and therefore no steps were taken to settle this question. Just at the time Parliament was dissolved, it was announced that the Bishop of Norwich had resigned, and that his successor had been appointed. The first question which he thought it important to settle was whether, according to the law, a Bishop could resign. He was not himself disposed to dispute that the Bishop had such power, but considerable doubt existed on the subject, and he did not think that that doubt had been at all lessened by the alterations which had been made as to the seats of Bishops in that House; because the effect of the resignation of any Bishop was to introduce into that House another whose title to sit would depend entirely upon the legality of the vacancy. Supposing it, however, to be perfectly legal for a Bishop to resign, it must be admitted that it was desirable that some legislative regulations should be made, defining the terms upon which that power should be exercised; because, looking at the peculiar circumstances which had attended the resignation of the Bishop of Norwich, their Lordships must feel that there might arise in regard to it certain suspicions to which the Church ought not to be subjected. Nothing could be more dangerous to the interests of the Church than that anything approaching to political feeling should enter into the appointment of Bishops; and it must be admitted that when a resignation took place at a time when Parliament was dissolved, on account of a vote of the other House, which the Prime Minister declared to be a vote of want of confidence in the Ministry, and when the continuance of that Minister in office and his power to appoint a Bishop depended upon the returns about to be made to the ensuing Parliament, their Lordships must feel that a resignation made under such circumstances—he did not say that it was peculiarly so in the present instance—did give to the appointment of the successor a political complexion, which it was most undesirable should attach to it. He therefore thought it most desirable that some legislative provision should be made to prevent a resignation taking place in a manner so sudden and so summary as that in which the retirement of the Bishop of Norwich occurred. One thing had given him the greatest satisfaction, and that was that in the case of this resignation there was no arrangement, and apparently no intention of making an arrangement, for a retiring allowance. It was clear that the resignation had been purely and sincerely made, and that it was made in a manner which reflected upon the Bishop the greatest credit, and removed from his resignation any imputation which might otherwise have been cast upon it, that it was made to favour a particular Minister. He sincerely trusted that in any general measure which might be introduced upon this subject, no attempt would be made by retrospective enactments to give an allowance to the late Bishop of Norwich. Such an attempt would deprive his resignation of its sole virtue of having been made without any understanding that he should receive a retiring allowance. Having brought this subject before their Lordships, he trusted that they would hear from the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack what was the law with regard to the resignation of Bishops, and would receive from some Member of the Government an assurance that it was their intention to proceed by some legislative enactments to regulate the retirement of Bishops who were unable to perform their duties, and the making provision from some ecclesiastical fund for their support during the remainder of their lives.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he apprehended that there was not the least doubt that according to law a bishop had power to resign, although it was true that in the case of a bishop, the metropolitan, and in the case of a metropolitan, the Crown, must accept that resignation before it could take effect. Upon that subject he had no doubt whatever; but as his noble Friend had given notice of this question, he had thought it right to be prepared with authorities as to the law. To refer first to the most popular authority. Blackstone, in his Commentaries, speaking of the resignations of the clergy, said—

“All resignations must be made to some superior; therefore a bishop must resign to his metropolitan, but an archbishop can resign to none but the King himself.”

The same statement is made in nearly the same words in Burns's Ecclesiastical Law. To go backward, however, to earlier authorities. One of the greatest authorities on ecclesiastical law is Bishop Gibson, and he says—

“A resignation can only be made to a superior. This is the maxim in the temporal law, and is applied by Coke to the ecclesiastical law, when he says, ‘Therefore a bishop cannot resign to the dean and chapter, but it must be to the metropolitan, from whom he received confirmation and consecration.’”

What he meant by “cannot resign to the dean and chapter” was this:—During a vacancy of the archbishopric the custody of the spiritualities was with the dean and chapter; and what Lord Coke said in the passage referred to was, that in that state of things a bishop could not resign, because he must resign to his superior; and the dean and chapter, although they had the care of the spiritualities, were not his superiors. This might satisfy their Lordships; but in addition to this, he would read them a case which occurred in the time of Queen Elizabeth or King James I., and which was recorded in Norman French. In that case it was held by Lord Coke that an alderman of a town—Boston, for instance—who was a justice of the peace by charter of incorporation, could only resign his office into the hands of a superior; and Coke went on to say, “a bishop cannot resign to a dean and chapter, but only to the metropolitan.” There was not, it was true, an instance of this since the Reformation; but before the Reformation there had been several, and the Reformation made no difference in this respect. In the time of Queen Elizabeth, Archbishop Grindall proposed to resign, having become blind; but he died while the instruments were in preparation, and before his resignation could be completed. On this part of the case there could be no doubt; but he had heard another difficulty started—with no more foundation, certainly—as to what would be the consequences of the resignation. Would such a resignation, it was asked, remove a bishop from that House? There could be no doubt, he believed, on that point. There were plenty of authorities, and there was the analogous case of a translation, which, in his opinion, was sufficient to decide the point. The moment that a bishop had been translated, and confirmed in his new see, he had done that which was analogous to a resignation of his old see. That in such a case a bishop lost his right to sit and vote in their Lordships' House until he had obtained a writ of restitution of his new temporalities and a writ of summons commanding him to sit in that House, was a matter admitting of no doubt. By accepting a new see he vacated his old see, and thus, ipso facto, lost his right to sit in the House until he obtained a new writ in his new capacity. There was one memorable instance of this, in which, if it had been possible to get out of the difficulty, there was no doubt that his predecessor on the woolsack, Lord Eldon, would have availed himself of it. During the time of the Queen's Trial, or, more properly, of the discussion of the Bill of Pains and Penalties brought in against the Queen, the House of Lords was called together for the consideration of that Bill on the 17th of August, 1820, and the roll of Parliament was called over when the House met. Among the names of the bishops present on that day was that of the Bishop of Lincoln. In the July previous, Dr. North, the Bishop of Winchester, had died, and the Bishop of Lincoln had been promoted to that see, but had not been confirmed in it; consequently his name appeared in the roll as Bishop of Lincoln on the 17th of August. On the next day, however, he was not present, and on referring to The Times of the 19th of August—for there was no mention of the matter in Hansard—he found that the Lord Chancellor, on behalf of the Bishop of Lincoln, stated—

“That his Lordship had been present yesterday, but that he had to-day been confirmed Lord Bishop of Winchester, and, consequently, could no longer attend as Bishop of Lincoln, nor could he attend as Bishop of Winchester until his temporalities had been restored to him.”

If Lord Eldon could have invited the attendance of the right rev. Prelate on that occasion, it might be presumed that he would have done so; but he felt that it was impossible, as the right rev. Prelate, having been confirmed Bishop of Winchester, had ceased to be Bishop of Lincoln, and could not sit as Bishop of Winchester until he had received writs of restitution and summons. It was perfectly clear that a resignation put a bishop in the same position as a translation. But there was a stronger analogy than this in the case of a deprivation. A case of this sort was very much discussed both in and out of the House, in the time of William III. and Queen Anne, when proceedings were instituted against Dr. Watson, Bishop of St. David's, for simony and extortion, and other high crimes and misdemeanours, before the Archbishop. The result was that the charges against Dr. Watson were established to the entire satisfaction of the

The Lord Chancellor

Archbishop, and he pronounced sentence of deprivation. While the matter was in progress the Bishop of St. David's endeavoured to obtain a prohibition from the Court of Queen's Bench, then presided over by Lord Chief Justice Holt; who, however, scouted the notion of the want of power on the part of the Archbishop to proceed to deprivation; and there was also an application to their Lordships' House to upset Holt's decision, but that was equally unsuccessful. The result was that the Bishop of St. David's was deprived of his bishopric by sentence of the then Archbishop. His seat in their Lordships' House was consequently vacant, and a large party in that House thinking that the matter bore somewhat the aspect of a political persecution, as the Bishop had been appointed by James II., a great debate occurred, and it was moved and carried, to address the Crown not to fill up the vacancy until it was ascertained whether the Archbishop had the right to deprive a bishop of his see. A year or two afterwards, however, the see was filled up, during the lifetime of Dr. Watson, and nobody ever doubted, during the ten subsequent years of his life, that the new bishop had a right to sit in the House or that Dr. Watson had lost his right. Here, then, was the undoubted right of deprivation, and the analogies of translation and resignation, to show what were the effects of resignation. It would be absurd if the result were otherwise, for then there would be sitting on the right rev. Bench both the Bishop of Norwich and Dr. Hinds. Nor need he remind their Lordships that no man sat in that House by virtue of his being a bishop, but by right of the particular see to which he was appointed; and the moment that a prelate ceased to be bishop of a particular see, whether by resignation or by his being translated to another see, it followed necessarily that he had no longer a right to a seat in that House. With regard to the resignation of the Bishop of Norwich, it was but justice not only to that Prelate, but also to the Government to say that that resignation was entirely his own act, without the slightest stipulation or the least hope that any provision would be made for his future support. The right rev. Prelate felt that his health was in such a state as to disable him from discharging the duties of his office in a satisfactory manner, and therefore, without the smallest stipulation or even a hint that any provision would be made for him, he said that whatever was the consequence he must resign an office for which he no longer felt himself qualified. His noble Friend had, however, asked why the Government had not introduced a general measure providing for cases of resignation. He could only say that all the Members of Her Majesty's Government would feel extremely obliged to the noble Lord if he would suggest a mode in which this question could be settled. The Government were quite disposed to introduce such a measure, if it could only be devised; but the difficulty was where to find the funds for the purpose. The matter was under consideration, and the Government hoped to be able to see their way clearly to a solution of it. It was a matter, however, which did not press, because there was no stipulation with Dr. Hinds that any provision should be made for him, nor had the Government received any intimation that it was the intention of any other Member of the right rev. Bench to resign.

THE EARL OF DERBY reminded the noble and learned Lord that last year, when the measure in reference to the Bishops of London and Durham was introduced it was stated to be preparatory to a general measure. Towards the close of the last Parliament, too, the Lord Privy Seal, in answer to a question put to him, stated, on behalf of the Government, that a general measure was in preparation.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON said, he could confirm the statement of the noble Earl. He himself had put a question to the Lord Privy Seal as to the intention of the Government, and was informed that they hoped soon to lay a Bill before the House on the subject.

LORD CAMPBELL said, he thought it right to state that he fully concurred in all that had been said by his noble and learned Friend on the woolsack as to the law on the subject. From the earliest time that he had been a student of the law he had always understood that a bishop must resign to the Archbishop, and an Archbishop to the Sovereign. Formerly the Archbishop would have resigned to the Pope; but since the Reformation, the Sovereign being for this purpose the head of the Church, the resignation of the Archbishop must be made to the Sovereign. The resignation having been accepted by the metropolitan or the Crown the see was vacant. It was not the resignation but the acceptance of the resignation which vacated the see. In the Session of last year a Bill passed that House with reference to the resignation of two bishops, but that was a Bill to enable these bishops to resign, but to enable them to retain certain parts of the temporalities of their sees after they had resigned. In the case of the Bishop of Norwich it was a simple resignation, and no Act of Parliament was necessary; but it was perfectly clear that, though a bishop might remain a bishop, if he was no longer in possession of a particular see in connexion with the Church of England he had no right to a seat in that House. He regretted that no general measure had been passed on the subject, and he expressed an opinion to that effect when the Bill relating to the Bishops of London and Durham was before the House. There could be no doubt that the Judges and the Bishops should be placed on the same footing in this respect. When no longer able to discharge their duties the bishops should have power to resign on a decent allowance, and no room should be left for bargaining between a retiring bishop and the Minister of the day.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE regretted that the noble Lord on the woolsack, while stating that a general measure was under the consideration of the Government, should have expressed the opinion that the question did not press. When a Bill for the retirement of the Bishops of London and Durham was before the House last year he opposed it, and, as he had anticipated, they found it impossible to act upon it as a precedent; and now some of the facts elicited by the present discussion showed that this matter did press, and they saw the result of the course then pursued, and the suggestions then offered not having been adopted. A right rev. Prelate who found himself unable longer to discharge his duties satisfactorily had resigned his charge, and had done so without receiving any provision for the rest of his days. It was most painful to allude to the private affairs of any individual, and his acquaintance with the late Bishop of Norwich was so slight that he was hardly entitled to refer at all to his case; but he could not refrain from saying that he feared the right rev. Prelate was not in the position as regards worldly means in which he ought now to be placed. He had from a high sense of duty and honour resigned his see when he found himself unable to discharge the functions of his office; he had retired into private life without a pension or allowance of any kind, and if he had done so in poverty—though he hoped it was otherwise—the act was all the more to his honour. Now, this was just one of those cases which a general measure would have met, and he could not help thinking that the Government had failed in its duty in not having introduced such a measure. It appeared even that a measure was not to be expected this Session; and in the meantime other cases might arise of as urgent a nature as the present. When a Bill was brought in it would, of course, provide for all future cases of episcopal resignation, and no doubt they might, at the same time, provide by ex post facto legislation for the case of the Bishop of Norwich. On the question of a pension being granted by an ex post facto law to the Bishop of Norwich, he would of course exercise his judgment when the case came before them; but in the meantime he felt that a grave responsibility rested upon the Government by whose neglect this case was not provided for. The noble and learned Lord had said this subject was beset with difficulties. No doubt it was; but it was not beset with greater difficulties than had been overcome by former Governments in other cases. A bishop when unable to attend to his diocese might be empowered to appoint a suffragan bishop, as a parochial minister now devolves his duty on a curate. Again, he saw no difficulty in arranging a scheme by which a bishop should be allowed to retire on making due representation to his Metropolitan, and should receive a moderate pension out of the funds of the bishopric, to that extent causing a diminution of the revenue of the incoming bishop. Whatever inconvenience might arise from this arrangement, he could not for a moment believe that it would interfere with the appointment of good bishops, for he had no doubt that the ablest theologians, the ablest scholars, and the ablest parochial ministers would be quite as ready as now to accept bishoprics. He must say, also, that he should not regret any arrangement that would tend to lessen the political character of episcopal appointments. He would rejoice in anything that would compel the Ministers of the Crown to look out for the best qualified men only to fill the episcopal sees of this kingdom. His great object in rising, however, was to protest against the opinion that this question did not press, and to state his belief that it pressed now more urgently than ever.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY would not say that this question did not call for the earnest consideration of the Government. It had, in point of fact, been under the notice of the Government, but was not considered so pressing as other measures that occupied their attention, though but for the dissolution the Government would have brought in a general measure to provide for the resignation of bishops. The noble Duke had referred to the circumstance of the late Bishop of Norwich having retired without having arranged for any allowance. He believed that next Session of Parliament a general measure would be introduced, and he would be happy to see that measure so drawn as to provide for his case. The late Bishop of Norwich retired when he found himself unable to discharge his duties, and certainly in any measure that was brought forward he of all men should not be overlooked.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, the noble Earl's explanation appeared to be that the Government had not yet made up its mind in what shape provision should be made for the retiring bishop. If the pension of a retiring bishop was to be derived from a charge upon the revenues of the see such a measure could not be made applicable to this case, unless there were an understanding with the bishop lately appointed, and that would be simoniacal.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY had not stated that there was any understanding with the late or the newly appointed bishop. What he did say was, that on any future measure upon the subject the Government would not allow the fact of the retirement of Dr. Hinds to prejudice his interests.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE wished to point out that if a retiring bishop was to receive a third, or fourth, or any other proportion of the revenues of the see after his retirement, the Government could not make any such provision for Dr. Hinds, because the revenues of the see in their entirety were now vested in his successor.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY remarked upon the contradictory character of the statements of the Lord Chancellor and the Lord Privy Seal (the Earl of Harrowby) with regard to future legislation on this subject. Surely the latter noble Lord could not have been in the House when the noble and learned Lord addressed their Lordships. He (the Earl of Malmesbury) had understood the noble and learned Lord to say that no measure was in preparation, and that he would be obliged to any noble Lords on the Opposition side of the House if they would suggest one; whereas the Lord Privy Seal said that but for the dissolution a measure would have been brought in. That led to the inference that before the dissolution a measure had been prepared. Again, the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack said that no arrangement had been made with the late Bishop of Norwich; that he had no hope of receiving a retiring pension, and expected nothing. The one noble Lord said that there was not a chance of the late bishop getting a shilling, and the other held out a hope that he would receive something. If these differences and this confusion existed in the ranks of the Ministry, it would be well if they did not quit their seats during the evening, for that appeared to be the only way of avoiding a repetition of such extraordinary discrepancies.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR explained that he had not meant to say Dr. Hinds had no claim to a pension, but simply that there had been no stipulation upon that point. The late bishop resigned purely and simply without any arrangement for pension. He did not think it right to state the retrospective arrangements of the Government; but of course if any general measure were introduced justice would be done to that reverend personage. He was of course quite cognizant of the Bill which had been referred to by the noble Earl (the Earl of Harrowby), which, not being so pressing as other measures, had not yet been submitted to Parliament. The measure was now nearly complete, and might be introduced in the course of the present Session.

THE EARL OF DERBY begged to ask, in that case, why the noble and learned Lord invited his noble Friend to suggest a measure?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR explained that he had only said he would be glad to hear what the noble Lord could say upon the subject, as it had been found by the Government to be one of far greater difficulty than it appeared on the first blush to be.

EARL FITZWILLIAM said, as it appeared there was a measure prepared, he had some curiosity to ascertain its nature.

The only sources he had heard suggested for providing pensions for retiring bishops were the Consolidated Fund and the revenues of the sees vacated by the bishops. With regard to the first mode, he thought it would be very difficult to induce Parliament to assent to it; and as to the second, it would really be compelling a diocese to maintain two bishops instead of one. He was inclined to think that any such provision should be made from the general funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and not from the revenues of particular sees.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD hoped that no measure would be hastily introduced, as upon this subject, which required mature consideration, a little delay was preferable to precipitancy. It was far better that the Government should thoroughly examine the question and bring in a Bill on their own responsibility. He, however, wished to make a few observations upon what had fallen from two learned Lords. The noble and learned Lord on the woolsack was of opinion, that the acceptance of the resignation of a Bishop created a vacancy in their Lordships' House, and referred to cases in support of that view, but did not allude to one which appeared to him (the Bishop of Oxford) to be the most important upon that point; he meant the case of Bishop Bancroft, who was not able to take his seat in that House during the interval between the acceptance of his resignation of the former see and his being confirmed Bishop of London. The noble and learned Lord had referred to the case of the Bishop of Lincoln, and had stated that that Prelate could not take his seat until he was put in possession of the temporalities of the see. That, however, was incorrect, as the seat in that House was quite unconnected with the temporalities, and only depended upon confirmation in the episcopate. The noble and learned Lord at the table (Lord Campbell) had quoted Blackstone, but that authority had rather slurred over the case of an Archbishop's resignation, saying that an inferior must resign to a superior, and there was no superior to an Archbishop except the Crown; but he did not say that therefore resignation must be made to the Crown. Before the Reformation, the Archbishop of Canterbury acknowledged the Pope as his superior, but subsequent to the Reformation all the powers which had previously been enjoyed by the Pope passed to the Archbishop of Canterbury. His noble and learned Friend, therefore, to make out his case, must show either that the Crown was the spiritual superior of the Archbishop, or that by some statute or acknowledged church law it was enabled to accept his resignation. The only parallel case which presented itself to his mind was, the resignation of the Pope himself, of which there had been instances. The Pope, having no spiritual superior, resigned to no spiritual superior, but simply abdicated; and such, in his view, must be the course pursued by an Archbishop, in similar circumstances. Their Lordships would see that the question was a very grave one, and it might be that the suggestion thrown out by the noble Duke would be a better arrangement than any other which had been proposed. He trusted, however, that in a matter so deeply affecting the position of the Bishops, there would be nothing like undue haste, but that the Government before introducing any measure would give their best attention to it.

LORD REDESDALE hoped that the general measure to which reference had been made, would not be pressed with the same extreme rapidity as the Bill of last Session providing for the retirement of the Bishops of London and Durham. He accepted the statement of the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack, that the resignation of the Bishop of Norwich was made without conditions—a statement which would free the resignation from the imputation of being a political act—although the readiness with which the Lord Privy Seal had intimated that in any general measure which might be introduced, provision would be made for Dr. Hinds, was calculated to lead to the supposition that some implied understanding did exist between the Government and the Bishop, that his case should receive consideration. He trusted that something would be done to separate the appointment and resignation of Bishops from the vicissitudes of political life.

EARL GRANVILLE assured the noble Lord, that so far from there having been any understanding between the Government and the Bishop, the resignation took place without qualification, stipulation, or expectation.

LORD PORTMAN rose, to say a word for the clergy generally. He could see no reason why the same provision on retirement which was made for a Bishop should not be extended to a hardworking clergyman, unable from advanced age or physical infirmity to continue the discharge of his duties. He also expressed the hope that the Government would not deal with the question in a hurried manner.

BURIALS—CONSECRATED AND UNCONSECRATED BURIAL-GROUNDS.

PETITION.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON presented a petition from the Rev. William Palin, rector of Stifford, Essex, praying that a Select Committee may be appointed to inquire into the canonical obligations and usages of the Established Church in connection with the subject of burial, with the view of allaying such doubts and disputes as now frequently arise regarding the necessary and lawful incidents of all new cemeteries constituted under Acts passed in the 15th, 16th, 17th, 18th, and 19th of Vict. or that a declaratory Act defining the same may be passed. The noble Lord remarked, that the main question in dispute was the nature of the boundary wall separating that portion of a cemetery which was consecrated and devoted to the use of members of the Established Church from that which was unconsecrated and placed at the disposal of Dissenters. It was much to be deplored that some declaratory Act had not been passed, describing exactly what the boundary wall should be. He quite agreed with the petitioner, that it was important the question should be set at rest, because it appeared to be giving rise in more dioceses than one to feelings of a very painful, bitter, and unpleasant character. The result had been, in some parishes, even to deprive members of the church of burial, according to the rites of the Church. He wished to ask the noble Earl (Earl Granville), whether the Government were disposed to introduce a declaratory Act which might set at rest the question of the boundary line between consecrated and unconsecrated ground, or, if not, whether they would support such a Bill if introduced by an independent Peer.

LORD WENSLEYDALE said, he would repeat the opinion he had expressed before—that the Bishop of Exeter had mistaken the canons, and that there was no occasion for an explanatory Act. A dispute arose in the diocese of the late Bishop of Carlisle, and he had occasion to consider the whole subject very fully. It was perfectly clear to him that the 85th canon, which required the churchwardens to put a fence or wall round the churchyard, had no reference to the line of demarcation between the consecrated and unconsecrated parts of a common cemetery, but only required that the churchyard should be fenced all round. The object of the canon was to secure that the churchyard, which was the place of interment for all the parishioners, without distinction of religion, should be protected. It therefore declared that a competent fence should be provided to resist the inroads of trespassers and beasts, and to prevent the churchyard from being desecrated. The canon had no reference to the distinction between consecrated and unconsecrated ground. What that division should be—whether a fence or a permanent line of demarcation, such as was not likely to be obliterated—might, he thought, easily be arranged between the Bishop and the cemetery board, the latter of these divisions between consecrated and unconsecrated ground being quite enough to ratify the canon.

LORD REDESDALE said, he was surprised that the noble and learned Lord did not see that the canon could not possibly comprise unconsecrated ground within the churchyard. The question was as to the requirements of the Church, and he could not be surprised that the Bishops generally did not acquiesce in that view, but thought that the recommendations of the Report on the subject should be adopted.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY said, the Committee were not by any means desirous that there should be any separation at all; but merely suggested a certain kind of separation as the most reasonable.

LORD WENSLEYDALE explained that there was a distinction between churchyards and cemeteries, and that the canon did not refer to cemeteries at all.

LORD CAMPBELL said, it would be very satisfactory to him to have some definite rule laid down on this subject, as at present there was some litigation going on in the court over which he presided in connection with it. He thought the rule laid down by their Lordships' Committee might be embodied in a short Act of Parliament.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON said, he regretted the existence of the present anomalous state of things to which he had called their Lordships' attention, and sincerely hoped that an end would be shortly put to it. He could not help thinking that if the Government were to bring in some short Act which would define what was to be considered a boundary between consecrated and unconsecrated ground in public cemeteries, a painful and constantly recurring subject of discussion would be henceforward avoided.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD said, the question was already rapidly settling itself. Cemeteries in his own diocese had been constituted without any difficulty arising. The conclusion of the Select Committee had gradually helped matters to a settlement, and he thought it was generally understood that that was to be a compromise which would be satisfactory to both parties.

Petition ordered to lie on the table.

TRANSPORTATION AND PENAL SERVITUDE BILL.

THIRD READING. BILL PASSED.

Bill read 3<sup>a</sup> (according to order), with Amendment.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR moved the insertion of a Clause applying the provisions of Acts concerning transported offenders to offenders under sentence of Penal Servitude.

THE EARL OF AIRLIE, in rising to put the question of which he had given notice, proceeded to consider the operation of the Bill of 1853, by which transportation was so much restricted, and urged the necessity of some relaxation of the stringency of that Act. In 1850, 2,455 persons had been actually transported; in 1851, 2,240; in 1852, 2,541; besides those sent from Ireland. He learned from what had occurred in the other House, that the Secretary of the Home Department had calculated that Western Australia would only take 1,000 convicts a year, so that we should have an enormous number of criminals let loose in this country. In a colony the convict could obtain employment—here he could not. He, therefore, deprecated any measure which did not provide for the sending out of convicts from this country. The noble Lord concluded by asking Her Majesty's Government whether it was their intention to take any steps with the view of counteracting the evil consequences which must follow from the discontinuance to a great extent of the punishment of transportation beyond the seas under the operation of this Bill and of the Act of 1853.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY regretted that his noble Friend had not expressed his views when the Bill was in progress. He did not know that he could give any answer other than that it was a matter requiring the gravest consideration. He believed the good sense of the country would be quite sufficient to prevent any system being carried into effect which would, as in other nations differently situated, consign criminals to imprisonment for life. No such system certainly could be permitted in England; and he thought that the impracticability of employing criminals constantly upon the construction of roads and in other public works had been clearly pointed out in the discussion upon this question. Indeed, so many difficulties arose the moment that such a course was suggested that it was quite evident that it would fail, even if any Government had the temerity to try it. Probably the best way of treating incorrigible criminals would be to subject them to lengthened terms of imprisonment, and do all they could in the way of moral training combined with labour to form in them habits not easily broken, and which might render them at all events less dangerous to society when the term of their imprisonment had expired. He could not help thinking that, looking to the spread of education among the lower classes, and the many opportunities that now offered for the exercise of honest industry, the evil feared would be much less in reality than it was in apprehension.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON would not go so far as to say that there was no instance of hardened criminals becoming reformed through such means as those referred to by his noble Friend, but thought the cases were extremely rare. He was afraid that the measure now introduced by Her Majesty's Government would be anything but satisfactory to the public at large. For his part it seemed to him of little importance whether hardened criminals were sent to Australia or any other place, if they could be usefully employed abroad; but he was convinced in his own mind that they ought not to be retained in this country.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that in the present state of their Lordships' House it was hardly worth while to prolong what, if it was not the penal servitude, was the solitary confinement of his noble and learned Friend on the woolsack.

Clause agreed to.

Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

House adjourned at Half-past Seven o'clock, to Monday next Eleven o'clock.

The Earl of Harrowby

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, June 19, 1857.

MINUTE.] PUBLIC BILL.—3° Turnpike Trusts Arrangements.

THE STATUES IN ST. STEPHEN'S HALL. QUESTION.

MR. WARREN said, he would beg to ask the Chief Commissioner of Works when the Statues of Pitt and Burke are likely to be placed on the vacant pedestals in St. Stephen's Hall?

SIR BENJAMIN HALL said, two statues only remain to be placed in St. Stephen's Hall. That of Pitt, by Mr. McDowell, is nearly completed, and will be fixed this year. It is to be placed opposite the statue of Fox. The statue of Burke, by Theed, is less advanced, but the clay model is finished, and when the marble statue is completed it will be placed next that of Fox, and opposite the statue of Grattan.

FAIRS AND MARKETS (IRELAND). QUESTION.

In answer to Mr. O'CONNOR HENCHY, MR. H. A. HERBERT said, that he could not hope to pass a measure on the subject of fairs and markets in Ireland during the present Session, but a Bill would be prepared and placed on the table, so that the opinion in Ireland might be expressed with regard to it.

On the Motion that the House at its rising do adjourn till Monday,

THE DESIGNS IN WESTMINSTER HALL. QUESTION.

LORD ELCHO said, he wished to put a question to the First Commissioner of Works relative to the late exhibition in Westminster Hall of Designs for New Public Offices. The exhibition had now been closed for a fortnight in order to enable the Commissioners to report on them, and adjudge the prizes, and the question he wished to put was, whether after the judges had decided, the exhibition would be opened for a few days, in order to enable the public to compare the designs which had obtained prizes with those which had not; for although the public placed every confidence in the ability, integrity, and impartiality of the Commissioners, yet it would be more satisfactory if they had an opportunity of comparing the prizes with the other designs?

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Commissioner of Works stated on a former occasion that he hoped shortly to receive the Report of the Commissioners. He begged to ask when that Report would be presented to the House?

SIR B. HALL said, that although Westminster-hall was a large space it was only sufficient to hold all the designs sent in for public exhibition; and on the very day that the exhibition of the designs closed, the models for the Wellington monument began to arrive, and they now occupied a portion of the Hall. The 25th of this month was the last day for receiving the models, and, though some of those which were the productions of foreign competitors had already come in, he believed that a great many were still on their passage. The models were likely to be of a very valuable nature, and the whole of Westminster Hall could not be thrown open without exposing them to great damage. Neither would it be fair to the authors of those models to allow them to be seen until they were fixed in their respective places for exhibition. With regard to the question as to when it was likely the judges would come to their decision on the designs, he had every reason to believe, from the communications he had had with those gentlemen, that they would be able to make their award on or about the 25th instant. As soon as their award was given he would take care to make it known to the House. But in order that the public might view the designs which had been selected by the judges he proposed to place around the enclosure within the Hall all those to which premiums might be awarded, and the models would be arranged upon tables in the centre of the Hall in a manner well adapted for their proper inspection. The public, therefore, having already had the fullest opportunity of forming their own judgment as to the merits of the designs, would then have an opportunity of seeing those which the judges had selected, and they would, at the same time, be enabled to appreciate the talent of British and foreign artists as displayed in the models for the Wellington monument.

THE GENERAL VALUATION OF IRELAND. QUESTION.

MR. GROGAN said, he rose to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if it be the intention of the Government to make any change in the mode whereby the expenses of carrying on the annual revision of the general valuation of Ireland are at present raised? He wished to explain the circumstances under which the valuation was originally undertaken and effected, and the purposes to which it was applicable. The expenditure had been very great, as the cost of its execution had exceeded £357,000, which had been entirely defrayed by the counties of Ireland, and, though the work was perfect when first completed, its annual revision was rendered necessary by the changes constantly occurring in the various townlands and tenements throughout the country. The valuation had not only proved useful in the assessment of county cess and poor rates, but had been of the greatest service to the Government in the levying of the income tax, the legacy and succession duty, and various other branches of the Imperial revenue. Having hitherto paid the whole charge of this valuation, the counties of Ireland felt that they had done all that could fairly be required of them, and they now looked to the Government to defray the expense attending its annual revision, which was required by the provisions of the Act of the 9th and 10th Vict. Nor was this feeling confined to Dublin, for there had been no less than nine petitions from various counties presented on the subject. The Government made infinitely greater use of the valuation than the counties; and, as the object was therefore a national one, the counties of Ireland naturally complained of the whole burden being cast upon them, and nine of them had petitioned the House for a new arrangement on the subject.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the valuation of Ireland was originally introduced exclusively with reference to the county cess. That system, although an improvement on the previous one, contained some principles which did not accord with the English law, and to which objections were made. One was that it contained a provision with regard to the scale of prices, and another had reference to the mode of assessing not the tenement of a single occupier, but a townland; and when the gross sum was as-

ROCHDALE ELECTION—PRIVILEGE.

GENERAL THOMPSON said, that a petition had just been put into his hands, and as it related to a matter of privilege he presumed that he could present it at once. The petition was from John Newall, Parliamentary agent, who stated that he was the agent to the petitioners against the return for the borough of Rochdale; and that Abraham Rothwell, a material witness, had informed him (Mr. Newall) that he had been offered £50 by one Peter Johnson to induce him to go to New Orleans. He would move that it be read at the table.

Petition read as follows :—

“TO THE HON. THE COMMONS OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND IN PARLIAMENT ASSEMBLED.

“The humble Petition of John Newall, of 44, Parliament Street, Westminster, Parliamentary Agent,

Showeth,

“That your Petitioner is the Agent for Andrew Stuart and Thomas Southworth, who signed the Petition complaining of an undue Election and Return for the borough of Rochdale, presented to your honourable House on the 11th day of May last.

“That the evidence of Abraham Rothwell, of No. 12, Packer Street, in the said borough, but now residing at No. 6, York Street, Blackfriars Road, is necessary to enable the said Petitioners to establish their case before the Committee to be appointed to try and determine the matter of the said Petition.

“That, on the 12th day of May last, your Petitioner caused the said Abraham Rothwell to be served with a warrant, under the hand of the right hon. the Speaker, requiring him to appear before the Select Committee to be appointed to try the matter of the said Petition.

“That the said Abraham Rothwell has this 19th day of June stated to your Petitioner that Peter Johnson, beershop-keeper, Toad Lane, Rochdale, did, in the evening of yesterday, the 18th of June, offer the said Abraham Rothwell £50 to induce him to go to New Orleans, for the purpose of avoiding giving evidence before the Committee upon the subject matter of the said Petition, and the said Peter Johnson appointed to meet the said Abraham Rothwell this evening the 19th of June, to conclude the arrangement, and that one John Lord has been cognizant of and assisting in the said offer.

“That your petitioner begs respectfully to submit to your honourable House that such tampering with the said Abraham Rothwell in respect to his evidence to be given to the Committee appointed to try the matter of the said Election Petition, and endeavouring to deter or hinder the said Abraham Rothwell from appearing or giving evidence before such Committee, is contrary to the Standing Orders of your honourable House, and may, if permitted with impunity, prevent the Petitioners against the said Election and Return from establishing their case before the said Committee.

“Your Petitioner, therefore, humbly prays your honourable House to take the premises into consideration, and to make such order thereon as to your honourable House shall seem meet. And your Petitioner will ever pray, &c.—JOHN NEWALL.”

GENERAL THOMPSON then moved that the petitioner and Abraham Rothwell do attend this House forthwith, and it being ordered accordingly, and the said John Newall and Abraham Rothwell attending according to order, the said John Newall was examined in relation to the matter contained in the said petition, as follows :—

MR. SPEAKER: John Newall, you have stated, in a petition which has been presented in your name, that the evidence of Abraham Rothwell is essential in the case of the Rochdale Election Committee. Is that so?

Witness: It is so.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM: I rise to order.

Then the witness was ordered to withdraw.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM: I would suggest to you, Sir, and to the House, that it is essential that a shorthand writer should be present. If it should result from the decision of the House that a warrant should be issued under your direction for the taking into custody of any person by the Sergeant at Arms attending this House, it would be desirable that there should be a record of our proceedings.

MR. SPEAKER: A shorthand writer is in attendance.

The witness having again come to the bar,

MR. SPEAKER: You have stated in your petition that on the 12th of May last you caused the said Abraham Rothwell to be served with a warrant requiring him to appear before the Select Committee to try the matter in question.

Witness: I did.

MR. SPEAKER: And that the said Abraham Rothwell stated to you on this day that Peter Johnson, a beershop keeper in Rochdale, did on the evening of yesterday, the 18th of June, offer to the said Abraham Rothwell £50 to induce him to go to New Orleans for the purpose of avoiding giving evidence before that Committee. Is that so?

Witness: That is what he stated to me.

MR. SPEAKER: That is all that you know of your own knowledge in this matter?

Witness: That is all.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: What answer did he tell you that he made to that proposal?

Witness: That he was dissatisfied with the offer ; that £100 would not be too much. If the House will allow me I will read from a written statement which is signed by Abraham Rothwell—I will read the answers which he gave, I said “ Who shall I have to see ? ”

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON : Did Rothwell say to you that he would absent himself from the examination of the Committee for any given sum of money, if that were promised to him for that purpose ?

Witness : No ; certainly not.

The witness was directed to withdraw.

Abraham Rothwell was called in and examined as follows :—

MR. SPEAKER : Where do you live ? —At Rochdale, in Packer Street.

Were you served with a warrant to attend to give evidence before the Committee in the case of the Rochdale Election Petition ?—Yes.

On what day ? I have been served with one to-day.

Were you served with a warrant on the 12th of May ?—Yes, Sir.

Has anything occurred in consequence of your having been summoned to give evidence before this Committee ?—Yes.

What has taken place ?—Last night I was met by a friend of the name of John Lord. He asked me respecting some little matters. We went and had a glass of ale together, and then he said he had a friend who had come up from Rochdale entirely to see me, to see if he could arrange with me to go out of this country to prevent giving evidence before this House.

Where did this take place ?—I cannot positively say the House—it was in a vault leading from where I am working. He asked me to go and see his friend who had come up. I objected to do it till I had been and had my tea. After that I agreed to meet them at nine o'clock at the Falcon Inn, in Falcon Square. I got there at a quarter after nine, and Lord was waiting for me in the square. He took me to the vault at the corner. I can't say the name of the vault, for I am a stranger here. Then his friend, Peter Johnson, was there. As soon as he saw me he came to speak to me—he said that I knew what he had come about ? I said, Yes. He then further asked me if I meant to go away ; if so, he would find me an outfit of £50 ; that he would go as far as £50. I said I thought that was full little. I thought £100 would look much better. He said he did not wish to press me to give an answer then, and he allowed me till to-night to give my answer, and we then agreed to meet to-night at nine o'clock.

Was that all that took place between you and Peter Johnson ?—That would be about the amount of it ; there were some little things more besides.

Did you then agree to meet him this evening and arrange matters further ?—Yes, about taking the money.

By the ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND : Do you know where Peter Johnson lives ?—Yes, Toad Road.

Where ?—Rochdale.

Do you know where he is to be found in London ?—No, only to-night at nine o'clock.

What is Peter Johnson by trade ?—He keeps a public-house.

In Rochdale ?—Yes.

Is he here as a witness in the Rochdale Election case ?—I am not aware of it.

You mentioned that he said something about £50 ?—Yes.

Was anything else offered you besides a sum of £50 ?—£50 was mentioned for my outfit and my expenses to Mr. Houldsworth—that is his brother-in-law who is now in New Orleans. But he did not name the name of New Orleans, but that I could go to Mr. Houldsworth's. My outfit was, I expect, the shipping expenses, and my fare, and the remainder would be to make up altogether £50.

Was any statement made to you expressly for what purpose you were required to go to Orleans ?—Yes, to get out of the way of giving evidence here.

On what occasion ?—On the occasion of the petition against Sir Alexander Ramsay.

The Rochdale Election Petition ? —Yes.

Was anything said upon that occasion by you or by Johnson about the sum of £100 ?—Yes, by me.

What did you say to Johnson about that ?—I said that I thought £50 was too little, and that I thought £100 little enough.

When you got to Orleans, were you to remain there any time ?—No, I was to please myself ; he also offered me money to go to any part of the country ; he offered that he would pay my expenses as far as I liked to go away, to be out of the way of the petition now in London, so that he might arrange with me to get me right away.

To get out of the way of giving evidence on the Election Petition ?—Yes.

After that offer had been made, and you made an arrangement to meet Johnson again this evening, what did you do?—I went home and wrote it down.

And to whom did you give that writing?—To Mr. Newall.

To the Petitioner's agent?—Yes.

When did you give the writing to Mr. Newall?—To-day.

About what hour to-day?—Perhaps it would be two o'clock.

Have you since last evening had any communication, direct or indirect, with Peter Johnson?—No.

By MR. WARREN: Did Peter Johnson show you any money?—No.

Did he tell you where the money was to come from?—He said that he had it in his possession.

He did not produce it to you?—No.

Was anybody else present?—John Lord.

Where was this?—It was in a vault near Falcon Square.

Who was the first person you told of this after it had happened?—Samuel Holland.

Do you know where John Lord is?—I have heard that he lives near to Falcon Square.

Did John Lord hear about the £50?—Yes.

Did he hear about the £100?—Yes, he heard all the conversation.

Where are you to meet this evening?—At the Elephant and Castle.

Did Peter Johnson say where the money was to come from?—He said he had it in his possession.

He did not say that any one was to pay the money?—No. I asked him the question when he mentioned the money. I said, "Who shall I have to see." He said, "No one."

MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND: Will you repeat what Lord said to you when he first spoke to you about this?—He said, I have a friend come up from Rochdale, and has brought me some news respecting some money that you are bound for, and he then changed the subject and said, he had also to deliver a message, or rather a question to ask me, that were it possible for me to go away money should be found me. He said that his friend had come up entirely to see me, for fear that another friend of mine, who is likely to come up on this petition, would get two years for not doing his duty. I said I should be very sorry if he got two years. And he said that he had come up to London to see me, if I thought proper, and I said I had no objection to see him. He said the money would be forthcoming to me to get away, if I thought proper, and he thought it was my best way, as I had taken some money to get out of the way.

Did he say to you, or did you say to him anything about the warrant that had been served upon you to attend the Committee?—I believe there was not anything said expressly about that.

When Lord was present at the interview yesterday evening, are you sure that he was near enough to hear what Johnson said to you about the money, and about your going away?—Yes, he assisted it on.

In your interview last evening when you met Johnson, and when you say Lord was "assisting it on," did he say anything?—He advised me to go away.

Do you recollect the words he used?—did he advise you to accept the offer made to you by Johnson?—His mode of talking to me was, how foolish it was for me to go against Sir Alexander Ramsay, now we had made a commencement of it—that as I had received the money I ought not to have gone against him.

How long have you known Lord?—Five years.

When did you come up to London?—On the 10th of May.

Have you been in London ever since the 10th May?—Yes.

What brought you to London on the 10th of May?—I came up expressly to be out of the way of what I call my enemies, that were always at me, trying first one way and then another, and I came out of the way intentionally to get work.

To get out of the way of whom?—Of both parties.

Both the sitting member and the petitioner?—Yes.

Have you been living in London ever since?—Yes, I have got work here.

What have you been doing? what has been your occupation since you have come to London?—I am now working for Gooch and Cousens.

What are you by trade?—A wool-sorter.

How long have you been with those parties?—A week since last Tuesday.

Had you any occupation in London before you got the employment you speak of?—No.

Where does Lord live in London?—Somewhere near Falcon Square.

How soon after you came to London did you see Lord?—About a week.

Have you been in the habit of seeing him since you came to London?—I have seen him two or three times.

Has he made any proposition to you before yesterday similar to that which you have stated?—He wrote me a letter.

Have you that letter?—No, one day I sent it to Rochdale.

Whom did you send it to at Rochdale?—The Attorney, Mr. Harris.

Why did you send that letter to Mr. Harris?—To let him see his opinion, and what he was saying to me.

That is Lord's opinion?—Yes.

Are you yourself a voter for the borough of Rochdale?—Yes.

Did you vote at the last election?—Yes.

Where were you when the Speaker's warrant was served upon you?—I am not exactly sure whether I was at Mr. Newall's office or not.

Were you in London or at Rochdale?—I was in London.

Do you know by whom it was served?—I believe it was Mr. Newall's clerk.

Do you know the clerk's name?—No.

Should you know him again?—If I saw him I should—I have seen him to-night.

MR. SOTHERON: What do you expect to receive from Mr. Newall?—Not anything.

Are you quite sure of that?—Yes.

Did Mr. Newall know that you were going to see this man Johnson last night?—No.

Did the Attorney at Rochdale that you wrote to know of it?—No.

Did you tell nobody that you were going to see Johnson last night?—Only my friend Mr. Holland.

Who is he?—A friend of mine at Rochdale.

How was it that you wrote to the attorney at Rochdale, that you did not tell anybody that you were going to meet Lord last night?—Because nobody knew that I was going to meet him—he met me.

Then nobody knew of the meeting beforehand except yourself?—No, except Holland.

How came you to tell Holland about it?—Holland is an agent under the Rochdale Petition.

Then Holland, one of the agents of the Petition, knew beforehand that you were going to meet Johnson last night?—I told him where I was going and he went with me part of the way.

VOL. CXLVI. [THIRD SERIES.]

MR. ESTCOURT: In a former answer you said that you had received money from some party?—Yes.

From whom?—From Sir Alexander Ramsay's Electioneers—a person of the name of Metcalf.

When did you receive this money?—On the day of election.

Have you received any money since that time?—No.

When you said in a former answer that you received money, did you refer to receiving money at any time since the election?—No.

Who paid the expenses when you came up from Rochdale?—It was money borrowed.

Who has paid your expenses since you have been in London?—I have borrowed money.

From whom?—From Mr. Livesey.

Have you received from Mr. Newall or from any other person money to support yourself or for any other purpose since you have been in London?—I have not received any money from Mr. Newall or from anybody belonging to him that I know of.

You said that you borrowed some money, from whom did you borrow it?—From Thomas Livesey.

The witness was directed to withdraw.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON moved that Peter Johnson be ordered to attend in the House forthwith.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Would it not be right to order the other persons also to attend this House?

MR. MACAULAY said, he did not intend to offer any opposition to the Motion, but he wished to call the attention of the House to the circumstance that a witness at the bar had charged a man named Johnson with having last night offered him a bribe to abstain from giving evidence before a Committee—an act for which Johnson was liable to be indicted for misdemeanour. He (Mr. Macaulay) presumed the object of calling Johnson to the bar was to ask him whether he was or was not guilty of an act which was a misdemeanour; and such a question could scarcely be put to him unless it were intended that he should answer it under compulsion. He (Mr. Macaulay) wished to know, before acquiescing in the Motion, whether such a course was justified by the law and practice of Parliament?

SIR GEORGE GREY replied that it was declared by Sessional Resolutions of the House, that if it should appear that any person had been tampering with a witness in respect of his evidence to be given in that House, or any Committee thereof, and had directly or indirectly endeavoured to deter or hinder a witness from appearing or giving evidence, the same is declared a high crime and misdemeanour, and that the House would proceed with the utmost severity against the offender. He apprehended, however, that the House would afford to a person under such circumstances the opportunity of making any statement he pleased.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Yes; but one at a time.

THE BOMBARDMENT OF GREYTOWN. QUESTION.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON said, he rose to ask the First Lord of the Treasury what steps Her Majesty's Government have taken to obtain compensation for the British subjects residing at Greytown, whose property was destroyed when that town was bombarded in 1854; and if he will lay upon the table of the House copies of the communications that have taken place on that subject with the Government of the United States? The town of Greytown, possessing from its situation peculiar advantages for commercial purposes, had become the residence of numerous merchants—French, Spanish, and English, and after the wonderful increase of trade and population that ensued in California from the discovery of gold, it became so important a position as to excite the cupidity of a certain very active and not very scrupulous party in the United States, who had frequently evinced a disposition to outrage the territory of their neighbours, and who manifested a strong desire to possess themselves of Greytown. Amongst the other parties carrying on business in this place were two rival transit companies, one composed of the people of different countries, including natives of England; the other the New York and Nicaraguan Transit Company, consisting, for the most part, of Americans. This latter company, whose agents were, for the most part, connected with the party in America to which he had referred, had obtained from the local Government on certain conditions a large grant of land near the port. This land was speedily covered with buildings, and the company then evinced a systematic spirit of encroachment, endeavouring to extend their possessions without regard to the terms of the covenant upon which they obtained the original grant. The consequence was, that constant collisions, attended with violence, took place between the servants of the Transit Company and the local authorities. It appeared that, unfortunately, the Government at Washington appointed a gentleman as representative of the United States at Nicaragua, who was a strong partisan of the Transit Company. The consequence of the appointment of that gentleman had been, that the local authorities of Greytown had been systematically insulted by the Americans, and on one occasion an attempt was made to withdraw from the hands of the authorities a person who had committed a murder. There were in the town extensive warehouses and other buildings belonging to the parties engaged in the other company, and the object of those who assumed this attitude of hostility towards the local authorities seemed from an early period to be to obtain by force possession of the town. But as the authorities had no force sufficient to resist the partisans of the Transit company who were constantly receiving reinforcements, they never attempted to assert their rights by force, but sought by remonstrance and conciliation to avert the threatened encroachments: on one occasion they resigned their trust, and invited the British consul to act for them. This arrangement, however, was not carried out. The Americans having failed to provoke the local authorities into a resistance by force, began to proclaim that they were most oppressive in their conduct, and had recourse to the expedient of making fictitious claims against them for injuries said to have been done to American interests and property. The ipse dixit of the Americans was always taken as sufficient in those cases, and any appeal to refer the points in dispute to arbitration had always been rejected. The local authorities could only remonstrate, and it had at length been announced by the American Consul that the Government at Washington should be consulted upon the questions at issue, but nothing had been heard in relation to the result of any such appeal until the 12th of July, 1854, when a large corvette belonging to the United States had arrived in front of Greytown, the captain of which vessel had immediately sent a formal intimation to the authorities to the effect that if they did not at once consent to pay 24,000 dollars by way of compensation for injuries alleged to have been inflicted upon the Americans, the town would forthwith be bombarded. Upon the receipt of that intimation the local authorities drew up a strong protest against the outrage about to be committed upon them. The English Consul happened to be absent at the time, but he had ably been represented by our Vice-consul (Mr. J. Geddes), who also drew up a protest against the meditated bombardment, which protest was duly forwarded to Captain Hollins, Commander of the United States' corvette. Now, he might add that it was perfectly well known that the local authorities could not raise the sum which had been demanded of them; but, notwithstanding that fact, and despite the protest to which he had just adverted, the town had, after a lapse of a period of only twenty-four hours from the time of the arrival of the vessel been bombarded by the American captain, shells to the number of 250 or 300 having been thrown among its unarmed inhabitants. Finding, however, that the shells had not succeeded in destroying the whole of the houses in the town, Captain Hollins had given orders to his men to proceed systematically from house to house, with torches in their hands, and to set fire to every species of valuable property as they passed upon their way. The result had been, that all the houses in the town had been destroyed, and among them the residence of the British Vice-Consul, which had been deliberately set fire to while the English flag was flying from its roof. The disgraceful outrage which had thus been committed upon defenceless citizens had, he might further observe, taken place in the middle of a most inclement season, had deprived the inhabitants of Greytown of all shelter, and had resulted in driving forth aged women and children without a roof to cover them amid all the severity of those tropical tor-rents by which the period of the year at which the melancholy disaster in question occurred in Nicaragua was characterized. This version of the facts was not taken from the British residents only, but was concurred in by the French, Spanish, and other residents, and testified to by the Consuls of several nations; and he should ask the House not to lose sight of the fact that the alleged grievances of the Americans were of such a fictitious nature, that no attempt had ever been made by them to submit them to arbitration. These shameful occurrences had taken place three years ago, and yet no attempt had hitherto been made upon the part of Her Majesty's Government to obtain any explanation of a proceeding, in the dreadful consequences of which no less than thirteen British families were involved, and by which a direct insult had been offered to the English flag. In the meantime a document fell into the hands of the sufferers which showed how inexcusable were these proceedings, and that the design of the Americans was to gain possession of the town. This document was a letter written by a Mr. White, the agent of the New York and Nicaraguan Transit Company at New York, to Mr. Fabers, the American agent at Greytown. In this document the people of the town were styled scoundrels. It stated, that if these scoundrels were soundly punished, possession could be taken, a business place built up, and the jurisdiction transferred. The writer observed, "You know the rest;" and added, "It is of the last importance that the people of the town should be made to fear." This was the letter:—

"Office of the New York and California
Steam Ship Line, via Nicaragua, No. 5, Bowling-green, New York,
June 16, 1854.

"Dear Sir,—Captain Hollins leaves here next Monday. You will see from his instructions that much discretion is given to you, and it is to be hoped that it will be so exercised as not to show any mercy to the town or people. If the scoundrels are soundly punished we can take possession and build it up as a business place, put in our own officers, transfer the jurisdiction, and you know the rest. It is of the last importance that the people of the town should be taught to fear us. Punishment will teach them, after which you must agree with them as to the organization of a new Government, and the officers of it. Everything now depends on you and Hollins. The latter is all right.—Yours, &c.,

"J. L. WHITE."

He thought, after this, that the House had a right to some explanation from the noble Lord at the head of the Government as to what steps had been taken to obtain compensation for those British subjects whose property had been destroyed by this unjustifiable bombardment. The noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston) held high language some time since when he repudiated the insinuation of an hon. Member that the resistance of the British Government to acts of oppression was to be measured by the strength of the aggressor. The noble Lord repelled that idea with indignation. Hon. Members who remembered the way in which the noble Lord exercised all the power of England in the case of Don Pacifico, knew with how high a hand he carried British authority on such occasions. The House knew, also, the manner in which the noble Lord had declared it necessary to vindicate the honour of the British flag in the Chinese waters, in a case in which the right to hoist that flag had been exceeded. In the Chinese case there was a doubt if the flag of England was flying, and it had been clearly proved that the vessel in question had no legal right to hoist the British flag, but in the case of Greytown there could be no doubt, for the house of the British consul, over which the British flag was flying, was deliberately and wantonly set fire to, and destruction entailed on thirteen British families, one British subject losing property to the value of many thousand pounds sterling. He (Lord C. Hamilton) was aware that it was said by the American Government that they were not originally conscious of the proceedings that were carried on in their name; but, unfortunately, since that time, they had involved themselves in the transaction by not punishing the perpetrators as they might have done, the agents in the outrage being citizens of the United States. Still, in justice to the inhabitants of the United States, he must observe that public opinion among them had strongly manifested itself on numerous occasions by condemning the whole transaction, and by stigmatizing it as a marked violation of the law of nations. The public press has also most honourably denounced the whole proceeding. In conclusion, he begged to ask the Prime Minister for the information sought by the terms of his notice, and trusted that the noble Lord would be able to show that some steps had been taken by the Government in this case to obtain justice for British subjects who had been grossly outraged, and whose property had been destroyed.

MR. HADFIELD, before the speech of the noble Lord who had just spoken was replied to, wished to draw the attention of the noble Lord at the head of the Government to a Bill which had been brought from another place, and was now upon the table of the House, relating to testamentary jurisdiction. The measure was a very important one. During the last four years they had had not less than eight Bills brought before them on the subject, and the present Bill had undergone the consideration of some of the ablest lawyers, here and elsewhere, that the country ever possessed. The Bill had already appeared once in the paper, but so low down that it had to be postponed. It now stood for Monday next, and unless the noble Lord lent it his powerful support, he feared it would continue in the "slough of despond," and the country would despair of the power of the House to remedy the evils it was intended to cure. He begged to ask whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to press the Probates and Letters of Administration Bill to a successful issue in the present Session.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, I can assure my hon. Friend that it is the full intention of Her Majesty's Ministers to press the Bill to which he has referred, as they hope a favourable decision in this present Session. The Bill was brought in by the Lord Chancellor in the other House of Parliament. It is one of the measures of the Government, and therefore I am exceedingly anxious for its progress, in which I am very glad to find we shall have the assistance of my hon. Friend. The Bill having come down from the House of Lords, is not so pressing as other Bills which have to go up to that House. Therefore, if the Bill is postponed for other Bills of more pressing importance, my hon. Friend must not suppose the Government will at all shrink from doing their utmost to carry it. With regard to the matter to which the noble Lord has called the attention of the House, I am bound to say that the transaction to which his question refers was one which it is impossible not to characterize as a very violent and a very cruel proceeding. It was, however, authorized and ordered by the Government of the United States. Whether they meant it to be carried out with such severity, or whether the officer—and who is, I believe, a very distinguished and honourable officer in the United States' service—mistook his instructions, I cannot say. But I am bound to observe that the manner and degree of severity which was exercised, reflect no credit either upon the Government which ordered, or upon the officer who executed those orders. But the question which Her Majesty's Government had to consider was the bearing of international law upon that question. Now, it is undoubtedly a principle of international law, that when one Government deems it right to exercise acts of hostility against the territory of another Power, the subjects and citizens of third Powers, who may happen to be resident in the place attacked, have no claim whatever upon the Government which, in the exercise of its national rights, commits these acts of hostility. For instance it was deemed necessary for us to destroy the town of Sebastopol. There may have been in that town Germans, Italians, Portuguese, and Americans, but none of those parties had any ground upon which to claim from the British and French Governments compensation for losses sustained in consequence of those hostilities. Those who go and settle in a foreign country must abide the chances which may befall that country, and if they have any claim, it must be upon the Government of the country in which they reside; but they certainly can have no claim whatever upon the Government which thinks right to commit acts of hostility against that State. Therefore, we were advised, and I think rightly, that British subjects in Greytown had no ground upon which they could call upon the Government of this country to demand from the Government of the United States compensation for the injuries which they suffered in the attack upon that town. We may think that the attack was not justified by the cause which was assigned. But, as an independent State, we have no right to judge the motives which actuated another State in asserting their rights and vindicating wrongs which it supposed its citizens or subjects had sustained, and there was nothing in the relations between Great Britain and Greytown which gave us a right exceptional to the application of that general rule of international law. Greytown certainly was part of the Mosquito territory, and under the general protectorship of Great Britain, but that protectorship was of a nature which carried with it the obligation merely of protecting it against foreign aggression, but did not go to the extent of interfering in disputes between that and another State. There are two kinds of protectorship. In the Ionian

Islands the British Government directs the action of the Government of the protected State. Nothing is done in that State except by the counsel and advice and the actual action of the British representative. We are consequently responsible for everything which the Government may do, and therefore entitled to require redress for wrongs or to vindicate any attack upon the place. Not so with regard to Greytown. Government is there administered by a self-elected, self-constituted municipality of Americans, English, French, Spaniards, and Germans. They are acting upon their own responsibility, and they, and not England, must be responsible for the consequences of everything they may do. I believe the real state of the case was that there was a dispute between two rival American transit companies, the one patronized by the self-constituted Government of Greytown, the other protected by the Government of the United States; and that out of the rivalry and quarrels of those two companies arose the transaction to which the noble Lord has adverted. Undoubtedly communications have passed between the British and American Governments, with a view to ascertain what the intentions of the American Government were; but we found that they rested upon the rule of international law to which I have referred, and the right which the law of nations gave them to take measures which they, in their own judgment, deemed necessary. The American Government have determined not to give compensation to any parties. They have refused, I believe, to give compensation to their own citizens who suffered by the bombardment. When I say refused, I do not know whether the demand was made, but I know they do not intend to give compensation to Germans, French, Spaniards, or any subjects of other Governments settled at Greytown at the time. Her Majesty's Government, therefore, acting under the advice of those who are most competent to give an opinion upon the subject, and deeming the advice in accordance with international practice, have foregone demanding any compensation of the United States for those subjects of Great Britain who have been so unfortunate as to have been injured by the bombardment of Greytown. I have now to appeal to my hon. Friend the Member for Mallow (Sir D. Norreys) who has a Motion on the paper with regard to proceedings in Committee of Supply. The embarrassment to which the Motion relates has in the present instance arisen very much from the anxiety of the Government to afford to the House the most detailed information possible with regard to the Estimates which they proposed. We felt, however, that there was a great deal of force in the objection made that one Vote ought not to cover such a multitude of items, and we intend to divide the Estimate into three, so that the classification will be more in accordance with the nature of the expenditure. We may, in a future year, endeavour to alter the form of the Estimates so as to obviate in a greater degree the difficulties which have arisen; but no change can be made in the course of proceeding in this House without altering those forms of the House which have existed, I believe, from the memory of man. It is matter well deserving the consideration of the House whether those forms of proceeding ought to be altered. They rest upon reasons which have appeared to be good for a long course of time. At all events they ought not to be altered hastily and on a sudden by a Motion for an instruction to the Committee of Supply, but after a full consideration of their bearing upon the general character and nature of the proceedings of the House. I therefore hope that my hon. Friend will not call on the House to decide upon the Motion which he has announced his attention of making, but that he will allow Her Majesty's Government to endeavour, in the next Session of Parliament, to frame the Estimates in some manner that may be more calculated to afford facilities to hon. Gentlemen to urge objections which may occur to them. Then, if it should appear that we have not succeeded in that, this House may, on full deliberation and consideration, determine whether it will be worth while to alter forms of proceeding which are of long standing, and which are part and parcel of its general system of conducting business.

LORD LOVAINE said, he could not refrain from making one or two observations relative to the manner in which the noble Viscount had treated the question brought forward by his noble Friend. The noble Viscount might, perhaps, be right in the legal view which he took of that question; but he believed it was the first time in the history of civilized nations—at all events, he (Lord Lovaine) could not recall to mind any instance of a nation in a time of profound peace, not only sending out an armed force to destroy a town, but to destroy property which belonged—and notoriously belonged—to the citizens and subjects of a power with which they were at peace. Now, so far as our vice consul at Greytown was concerned, it appeared that the English flag was flying on his house, and that the house was destroyed with the perfect consciousness and knowledge that it did belong to the English consul, and was under the protection of the English flag. Moreover, it was not destroyed by the fire of the American ships, but deliberately by the party who were sent on shore. Now, he could not help thinking that if one-half the energy and vigour which had been shown by the British Government in the affair of China had been exhibited in the present instance, something might have been secured in the way of compensation for the wretched sufferers at Greytown. The case was an entirely exceptional one. It was not like any other that he knew of as having occurred within his memory; and when he recollected that the noble Lord had out of the House, in places where there was no opportunity of contradicting him, indulged in language which was not very complimentary to hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House, and stated that his opponents on the question of the Chinese war were indifferent to the honour of the British flag, he (Lord Lovaine) thought it was as well that it should go forth to the world that there had been other opportunities of vindicating the outraged honour of the British flag and the rights of British subjects which had not received that attention from the noble Viscount to which they were entitled. It was a remarkable circumstance that when a power was weak and feeble the noble Viscount could display plenty of determination to vindicate those rights; but where the power was one to be respected by reason of its strength, somehow or other no remonstrance was made, and no effort employed to obtain anything like redress for those English subjects who happened to be the sufferers.

MR. ROEBUCK: I cannot help being reminded by this discussion of the sort of castigation, as I may almost call it, to which I was recently subjected by the noble Lord, because I had presumed to say the conduct pursued by our Government would lead the world to think that England was a bully to the weak and a coward to the strong. On the occasion to which I refer, the noble Lord was, as he always is, exceedingly adroit in diverting attention by his sarcasms from the point to which my remarks were directed. But what has he done in this case? He has brought forward a sort of solution which, in its very essence, is a degradation to the country. Greytown, says the noble Lord, was under the protection of England. What is the meaning of that phrase? "Oh!" says the noble Lord, "we are to protect Greytown against occupation or conquest by a foreign nation;" but he would allow a foreign nation to bombard it. How was Greytown originally peopled? Subjects of this country went out, carrying with them, as they thought, the name of Englishmen and the protection of England, and colonized that town. This place, says the noble Lord, was a part of the Mosquito territory? I will bind him to that. What, then, have we always said and done in respect of the Mosquito territory? Have we not held that we were the protectors of the Indians there? and did we not, on a late occasion, make a treaty by which we vindicated to ourselves the right to protect them, and also declared it a part of the honour of England not to desert tribes which have been for centuries under our protection? But if this were true as regards the Indians of Mosquito, how much more true is it as regards those Englishmen who have gone out and colonized that country, believing that the ægis of England was extended over them? If there ever was a flagrant case in which we have been subservient to the strong this is it. The noble Lord himself calls this a cruel proceeding. It was more than that; it was dishonest as well as cruel, on the part of the United States' Government; but were we to stand by and allow our subjects to be ill-treated by a strong Power? Supposing this had been done by China, or by Brazil? Why, we should have had one hon. Gentleman after another on that (the Treasury) bench rampant at the outrage offered to the British flag, and indignantly insisting that the national honour should be vindicated. We should have had this sort of language mouthed here from twelve o'clock in the day to twelve o'clock at night, and the war-cry would have been sent through the country by the newspapers of the next morning. We all know what happened when the lorcha was boarded in the Canton river. We heard of the insult to the British flag. Did we ever hear of the insult to the British flag at Greytown? A British consul was there, and protested against the proceedings.

The British flag was flying over his house when the bombardment began, and he and his family were obliged to leave the place on account of the danger to which they were exposed. The town was, in fact, blown to atoms by the strong Government of America; and we stood by while we saw our people ruined, their property destroyed, and our flag disgraced. Yet, an occasion is taken, forsooth, to vilify hon. Gentlemen in this House who are really anxious to vindicate the honour of England, but who do not wish to vindicate that honour by becoming bullies to the weak and trucklers to the strong. An honest, just, and merciful bearing towards all nations is the attitude worthy of England. Let her protect the weak if they are in the right, and see that justice is done to Englishmen wherever they reside.

MR. BENTINCK said, they had that night heard two remarkable statements from the noble Lord at the head of the Government; one of these was an opinion in favour of non-intervention in the affairs of other countries, and by that opinion he trusted the noble Lord would henceforward be guided. There was something remarkable, too, about the description which the noble Lord had given of the whole transaction at Greytown as connected with the Government of the United States. He had told the House that a quarrel took place between two rival transit companies and that the mode of settlement—he could hardly term it arbitration—adopted by the United States Government was to bombard the town which was the scene of the dispute. That was one of the most singular proceedings on the part of the Government of a great country that he (Mr. Bentinck) had ever heard of; yet they had the authority of the noble Lord that that course was taken by the United States Government in order to determine the dispute between the two rival companies. He trusted the Government of the United States would be satisfied with the version of the proceedings which had been given by the noble Lord. He (Mr. Bentinck) would not now go into the question of international law. The noble Lord himself was high authority upon that subject; therefore, although it appeared to be somewhat extraordinary that the British flag should, under any circumstances, be insulted and disgraced without this country being possessed of the power of requiring an indemnity or apology for such conduct, he would waive the question of international law. With his noble Friend (Lord Lovaine), however, he must say that it was rather singular that by some chance or other it always happened that whenever any such outrages were committed by countries which had not the power to defend themselves, we insisted upon immediate reparation; but when the outrage was committed by a power that was able to take its own part, or with which it was not thought expedient to have an altercation, we allowed ourselves to submit to the grossest insults without exacting redress or even demanding apology for what had been done. This reminded him of what had been a subject of discussion in that House time out of mind; for the present was not the first, second, or third occasion on which they had had discussions as to the want of, he would not say common courage, for nobody doubted that, but of determination on the part of this country to resist the outrages and insults which were offered it by the United States. He was not one of those who for one moment undervalued the importance and the enormous misfortunes which a war between this country and the United States of America would inevitably entail on both. He begged to be distinctly understood as entertaining the strongest sense of the importance of that question, and the necessity of never allowing ourselves to commit any unjustifiable act that would lead to such a result. But the course pursued by this country with regard to the United States on more than one occasion—not particularly the present, though that, he thought, was a case which should have been dealt with differently—had been such as was more likely to lead to hostilities than to avert them. He believed the real cause of that which had led so justly to the numerous complaints, both in this House and in the country, of the sort of degradation to which we had at various times submitted under outrages and insults from the Government of the United States, had arisen out of a painful necessity—namely, that a great portion of the commerce of this country was dependant for its supply of raw material upon the United States, and there had always been a dominant party in this House who had, in so many words, told the Government, “If you go to war with America we will turn you out.” The consequence was, that no Government had dared to take a straightforward or manly part when a dispute had arisen between this country and the United States. Now such a policy as that was, in his opinion, much more calculated to lead to hostilities than to insure the continuance of peace. The practice, so often repeated by the Government of the United States, of offering insult to this country under circumstances in which they would not from policy venture to do so, did they not know that we were hampered by commercial considerations, was one very likely to lead to a repetition of such proceedings, and to the inevitable consequences of a repetition, namely, that one of these days an outrage of such magnitude would be offered that the spirit of the country would revolt at it, and we should be forced into that very war which we now sought to avert by improper and untimely concession. There was a limit, no doubt, at which conciliation and cowardice became convertible terms, and he believed there was nothing so calculated to precipitate a war with America as forgetfulness of what was due to our own honour.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL assured the hon. and learned member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) and the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down that if the law advisers of the Crown had found that, compatibly with the international law of Europe, satisfaction could have been demanded from America for the losses sustained by British subjects at Greytown, they would unquestionably have pressed upon the Government advice to that effect. The opinion they arrived at was arrived at unwillingly and reluctantly by the law advisers of the Crown. But France also was concerned in this affair, and was she to be accused of truckling to America? In France they were obliged to come to the same conclusion, and France therefore as well as England had abstained from pressing any demand for satisfaction that could not legally be obtained. The experience of the proceedings between this country and America which he had had as law adviser of the Crown led him to a conclusion the reverse of that arrived at by the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down. If America were asked her opinion, she would say that she had reason to complain again and again of the strictness with which the law of this country and the principles of international law had been enforced against her. He defied the hon. Gentleman to point to a single instance in which England had given up a legal claim to satisfaction. Every jurist admitted that in a case like that of the Greytown bombardment no compensation could be enforced for the losses sustained. The principle which governed such cases was, that the citizens of foreign States who resided within the arena of war had no right to demand compensation from either of the belligerents, for the losses or injuries they sustained. As an instance of this doctrine he would beg the hon. Gentleman to call to mind the case of Copenhagen and the bombardments of other places.

MR. DISRAELI: I am not surprised, though the interval since this outrage was committed has been not inconsiderable, that the affair at Greytown has at last been brought to the attention of the House. I think we should have been wanting in our duty to the people whom we represent as well as to that honour which has been appealed to, if such a subject had been permanently passed over in silence. It must be recollected, that shortly after the bombardment of Greytown, this country became involved in a war of almost unsurpassed magnitude and importance, which demanded all its attention and energies, and that may be offered as some reason, if not a sufficient excuse, for our not having before this discussed the question now under our consideration. I think we are much indebted to the noble Lord for having, even at this late moment, recalled to us that we had left a duty unfulfilled, and, if I had any doubt of the great expediency of the Motion of my noble Friend, that doubt would have been removed by the observations which we have heard this evening from the noble Lord the First Minister of the Crown. Those remarks appear to me, to say the least, unsatisfactory and unsound, and, if they indicate the spirit in which our relations with the United States are in future to be managed, I do not think that the prospect is one of which this country has any reason to be proud. The noble Lord has laid down to-night the same exposition of the principles of international law as he gave us during a former discussion, and the learned Attorney General has endeavoured to enforce and establish a view which I cannot help suspecting, from the strong similarity it bears to the observations of the noble Lord, he himself must have inspired. I cannot pretend to contend with the learned Attorney upon a question of international law, but at the same time I may make some remarks which will at least indicate the reasons why I receive with some hesitation the conclusions at which he has arrived. The learned Attorney stated his view of the principles of international law as they are established in Europe, but we have to consider to-night the application of those principles to America. The noble Lord, also, full of the same view, adduced the case of Sebastopol as being similar to the blockade of Greytown. Copenhagen and Sebastopol are, according to the noble Lord, two precedents for this infamous and ineffable outrage. But Copenhagen and Sebastopol were fortified towns. Greytown was not a fortified town. I always thought it was a principle of international law that it was not legal to bombard towns which were not fortified, and where authorities are established who by treaty are bound to have neither military nor naval resources. Under such circumstances I doubt whether it is legal for any other State to make a foray of the description which we have now under consideration. But even if that view cannot be established, are there no other circumstances of difference between the case of Greytown and those of Sebastopol and Copenhagen? Why, Sir, Greytown is under the protection of the English authorities; and I cannot believe that the House will accept for a moment the hair-splitting distinction which the noble Lord made between inert and active protection. But if the law in this case is so clear, as the learned Attorney maintains, how is it that not only Her Majesty's Government but the Governments of other countries took at the origin of these affairs a totally different view of it? Why did they make representations to the Government of the United States, assuming that this was an outrage on the law of nations? If the law was so very clear, every power of obtaining redress was as closed to them then as they say it now is. The learned Attorney General endeavours to defend himself by instancing France. He says, could France, that high spirited nation, which is so prone and proud to interfere under any circumstances in which the rights of her subjects or her own honour are concerned,—could she have been silent if there had been an infraction of international law? But, in the first place, let me observe that France was not the protector of the Mosquito territory, and in the second place that France has interfered; that France has represented this outrage to the Government of the United States, and that France has demanded, and is at this moment demanding, reparation for the outrage. What, then, becomes of the precedents of the learned Attorney General? Now, let us remember that it is exactly three years since the bombardment of Greytown took place. I will not long trespass upon the attention of the House, though I fancy there are few hon. Members present who do not feel that this is a question which demands our earnest sympathy. Three years after this event took place—namely, on the 16th day of February, 1857, through the kindness of Captain Erskine, an officer in command of the British fleet, a memorial, of which I will read a paragraph, was addressed to the Secretary of State (Lord Clarendon). It is written in very temperate language, and, while it shows confidence in Her Majesty's Government, it impresses upon them the necessity of obtaining redress. The memorialists say,—

“ May it please your Lordship,—We, the subscribers, British subjects presently resident in Greytown, take the liberty of addressing your Lordship in reference to that disastrous and well-known catastrophe of the 13th of July, 1854, when, in a time of profound peace, and without any provocation whatever on our part, Captain Hollins, of the United States' corvette Cyane, after making unavailingly a fictitious claim and utterly unjust demand upon the community of this city to an amount in money, also, which, at the time, it would have been utterly impossible for it to have furnished, proceeded to bombard our homesteads, our warehouses, and shops; and then, not satisfied with the mischief thus wrought us, gave orders to his men to proceed systematically from house to house, from one end of the town to the other, setting them on fire, to the utter destruction of our shelter, our clothing, our furniture, our merchandise, and everything moveable we possessed; and this, too, in the middle of the most inclement month of this climate, when the forest that closely environs this town had become an impassable marsh. The mere statement of so sudden and awful a calamity befalling, under such circumstances, an entire community; the knowledge that the aged, the women, the children, the sick were, within a quarter of an hour, driven forth shelterless amid the tropical torrents which characterize that month, appears to us to render entirely superfluous and misplaced any attempt to describe, not only the sufferings thus occasioned to the inhabitants, but the atrocity also of those who caused them. We are aware, moreover, that this frightful act has become known throughout Christendom; and that on every occasion on which reference has been made to it in public prints or public addresses, in America as well as in Europe, such reference has unanimously been made in terms of the severest reprobation and the strongest disgust. We should be at a loss, therefore, to conceive why the representations we have formerly been constrained, by the deplorable straits to which most of us have been reduced, to address to your Lordship have hitherto remained fruitless, were it not that we are well aware, not only of the gigantic efforts our country and her allies had to exert to bring the late war to a successful conclusion, but that since that fortunate event affairs, both in Europe and America, have been so situated—international questions of such deep import have arisen for discussion, as to have called for the exercise of the mental energies of your Lordship and all other statesmen in distinguished positions, in a degree almost unprecedented. But now that peace again prevails in Europe, and that a solution of those international questions has happily been attained, the time appears propitious for our again venturing to recall to your Lordship's consideration the afflicting predicament to which we were reduced—and from no fault of ours—by the atrocious act of an officer of the United States, and in which, during the last two years and a half and more, we and our families have remained struggling and almost despairing. It is in this view, your Lordship, that we once more entreat you to take into consideration the great and long-endured hardships of our case, and to procure us such relief and redress as to your Lordship may appear most suitable.”

Now, I ask the House whether it is possible under the circumstances that an appeal more temperate and more forbearing could have been made? Conscious of the great events which were occurring in Europe, cognizant of the mighty struggle we were making, and of the necessity which existed that our Government should bend all its energies for the accomplishment of one great end, these unfortunate Englishmen forbore to press their sufferings upon the Government, or, at all events, did not urge the Government to attempt a solution of the difficulty, because they did not desire to add to its embarrassment. But now that peace has returned they naturally ask for some reparation and redress. We are told that the United States' Government, adopting the conduct of their officer, haughtily refused to listen to such an appeal; but I say, let us see upon the table of this House an answer from the United States on the subject. Sir, I have too much confidence in the good qualities of the people of the United States and their Government to believe for a moment that they would adopt without demur the acts of the commander of this corvette. I believe that they do share the feeling which the memorial of the sufferers generously and properly attributes to them—a feeling of disapprobation and disgust, which pervades every part of the United States, as well as this country, with reference to these transactions. Well, after all this forbearance, and after patiently waiting during three years of neglect, what is the answer received by the sufferers from the Secretary of State? I have here the original of the letter which

“ Foreign Office, June 8, 1857.

“ Sir: I am directed by the Earl of Clarendon to acquaint you, in reply to your letter of the 29th ult., that his Lordship has received and has had under his consideration the memorial which you drew up on the 16th of February last, and which was forwarded to this department by Captain Erskine, of Her Majesty's ship Orion, on behalf of British subjects inhabiting Greytown who sustained losses when that port was bombarded by the United States' ship of war Cyane in 1854; and I am to state to you that, judging from the answer which the United States' Secretary of State returned on the 26th of February last to a note of the French Minister at Washington, urging similar claims of French subjects for compensation, Lord Clarendon is of opinion that an application to the United States' Government on behalf of British claimants would not at present be of any avail.

“ I am, Sir, your most obedient humble servant,

“ J. S. Bell, Esq.

“ E. HAMMOND.”

So it appears that at the end of last February the French Government, which, according to the learned Attorney General, did not interfere on this subject, were at that time urging on the American Government the claims of French subjects to compensation and redress.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL: What I said was that the French Government did not insist on reparation.

MR. DISRAELI: Did not “insist” on it, but “urged it.” Where is the difference? I infer from this letter that the French Government are exercising their influence and are using all the pacific means at their disposal to obtain some redress for the subjects of the Emperor who were among the sufferers at Greytown. I am only asking Her Majesty's Government to do the same. And now let me recall the attention of the House to the character of the despatch I have read. If it be the opinion of the Government that they are justified neither by law nor by policy in interfering in this case for the vindication of English honour and the maintenance of English interests, why not have answered the temperate memorial I have read to the House in a statesmanlike despatch which should have frankly, clearly, and concisely (I had almost added, honourably) expressed the reasons for the course pursued? Nothing of the kind. The Government shelter themselves under the gabardine of the French Ministry and the policy of France, and held themselves excused from exertion because that Government had failed to produce any effect. The despatch contains no denial of the claims of the memorialists. There is nothing on the face of it to show that Her Majesty's Government deem that, however great may be the misfortune of the sufferers at Greytown, their claims are illegal or impolitic. On the contrary, the only inference to be fairly drawn from this despatch is, that the Secretary of State conceives these claims to be such as might be urged and ought to be redressed; but, says he, after the answer given on the 26th of February last by the United States' Secretary to the note of the French Minister at Washington urging similar claims for compensation, I am of opinion that an application on my part would not be at present of any avail. Well, Sir, I say that that is a shabby mode of meeting this question. The memorialists who receive this answer have not the satisfaction of knowing that their case, after all their patience and forbearance, has been examined and considered by the Government of their own country, and that, though sympathy is felt for their losses and regret for the calamities to which they have been subjected, still the stern front of international law prevents redress. If they knew this, they might reconcile themselves to their lot with the conviction that, had not the law been against them, the proud policy of this country would have gained for them ample reparation. But, Sir, I deny the assertion of the Secretary of State, that the subjects of the French Government are in the same position with regard to redress as the English settlers in Greytown. There is a broad distinction between the position of the English and of the French sufferers from the bombardment, and I defy the most adroit diplomatist to persuade the inhabitants of England or of France, whether by speech or by writing, that that position is the same. The protectorate claimed by England over the Mosquito territory renders the difference between the French and English claims one of immense proportions. But, although such a difference exists and is so much in favour of English subjects, it appears from the despatch of the Secretary of State himself that the French Government are at this moment urging the claims of the sufferers belonging to that nation, while the English Government, not coming forward and frankly laying down the grounds upon which they resolve upon non-interference, absolutely refuse to make even a remonstrance to the authorities of the United States, because, forsooth, the French Minister applied last February and has received an unfavourable answer. I say that in all our annals such an answer was never yet given by an English Secretary of State to English subjects. Sir, notwithstanding the tone of the noble Lord, I do not despair of redress being even yet obtained, at least by the subjects of England. But, now, when the tumult of war has ceased, and the struggle in which we were engaged is over, this question will come to be fairly discussed and whether reparation is accorded upon the application of the English Government, or, as I hope will be the case after reflection, by the generous and spontaneous Motion of the United States' Government, I am convinced it is impossible that such an outrage as this can go unredressed in the nineteenth century, simply because redress is not compatible with the interpretation put upon international law.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: I rather expected that one of the occupants of the Treasury bench would have got up to answer the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. I certainly do not feel that I can enter upon a complete vindication of the course pursued by Her Majesty's Government, because I do not agree with them upon all the points of this case. I think, however, it is clear that they could not have acted to any good purpose in the way the right hon. Gentleman seems to think they ought to have acted. The bombardment of Greytown was a proceeding which, as I understand, the American Government authorized, and have openly avowed. The right hon. Gentleman seems to think that the American Government would not avow it; but, as far as I recollect the circumstances, that Government, without, perhaps, vindicating every part of his proceedings, have declared that the instructions they gave to their naval officer authorized him to proceed to the bombardment in the event of the satisfaction demanded not being accorded. Well, now, if that is the case, and there seems to be no doubt that it is so, I do not see that Her Majesty's Government could do otherwise than apply, as they did, to the law officers of the Crown, for the purpose of ascertaining what redress could be obtained for British subjects whose property has been destroyed, and who have been, no doubt, cruelly treated in this matter. The law officers of the Crown—the Attorney General, the Solicitor General, and the Queen's Advocate—have, as I am given to understand, expressed their opinion that these belligerent proceedings having been authorized by the American Government, it is not competent for the British Government to demand or obtain satisfaction or reparation for the injuries done to British subjects at the hands of the American Government. As I understand it, they compare it with the bombardment of Copenhagen, which took place in 1807, and they would maintain, no doubt, that if an American citizen, then resident in Denmark, had come to the British Government, and had demanded reparation for the losses which he had sustained, and the damage done to his goods and warehouses at the bombardment of Copenhagen, the British Government would have been fully justified in refusing that reparation. I take it that that is the version of the law of nations, upon the authority of the law officers of the Crown; and I confess I see no reason to doubt its accuracy, or its application; but, that opinion being given, I do not well see how the Government of this country could proceed to make a demand for redress and reparation, because they could hardly do so and accept a total denial of such redress without taking further proceedings; and how would they have been justified in taking further proceedings when they had in their portfolio the opinion of the law officers of the Crown that they were not justified by the law of nations in demanding reparation? If that be the case, a mere representation to the American Government that we expected redress from them, while we were content at the same time to accept a refusal of the application, would hardly have been consistent with the dignity of the Government, and it certainly would not have raised their position in the eyes of America. Such being the state of the case, I think, with regard to the sufferings that these persons represent, and the damages and losses which they have sustained, that the Government can hardly do more than express the opinion which I believe the whole civilized world entertains of that proceeding of the American Government—namely, that their demands were exorbitant and unfounded, and that they proceeded to carry those demands into effect by a cruel and outrageous action. But there is one part of this affair on which I think the Government ought to have demanded some explanation from the United States. It is that which refers to the insult to the British flag, which was hoisted on the house of the Vice Consul.

Mr. Disraeli

Let it be admitted, according to the opinion of the law officers, that no pecuniary compensation could be made to those who suffered loss; but here was the Vice Consul, in a State which is nominally under the protection of Great Britain, and with the British flag flying from his house. The American captain might have said that he was ordered to bombard the town, that he could not distinguish one house from another, that the shots could not be so aimed as to spare that particular house, and that the house suffered like the rest in the bombardment. But such cannot be the allegation of the American captain, because, as stated in the memorial which was read by the right hon. Gentleman opposite, after the bombardment—in itself a wanton and cruel proceeding, as I think—the sailors of the American corvette landed, and actually set fire to different parts of the town, and I believe, among others, to the very house of the Vice Consul, from which the British flag was flying. If that be the fact, as I believe it to have been, I think that the Government might have said, “Setting aside the question of pecuniary compensation, which the law of nations will not allow us to demand, we must be satisfied that no insult was intended to the British flag by the proceedings that were taken by the American captain, because there is every appearance of a wanton insult to that flag having been intended.” I will not put in any competition with this case the example of China, which has been so often referred to in the course of this discussion, because I hold that, in the case of China, our conduct has been so flagitious, so totally wanting in every regard to justice, that, so far from being a precedent to be followed on any other occasion, I hope that it will be a precedent which the British Government and the British nation will never again adopt. With regard to the Motion of the hon. Baronet the Member for Mallow (Sir D. Norreys) with respect to the mode of discussing the items of the Estimates, I wish to observe, that we have now arrived at a state with regard to the Votes in Supply when I think that it will be incumbent on us to make some change in our rules. I do not think it desirable in a hurried manner, upon the occurrence of a difficulty which may turn out to be temporary, to concur in a Resolution for altering the rules and orders under which the House has so long acted; but I shall be glad to hear from the Government that they intend in the present Session, to propose the appointment of a Committee to consider the question. I admit that the Votes are better divided now than they were formerly, but still divide the items in a Vote as much as may be, there will always be great difficulties involved in the present system. For example, suppose a Vote of £120,000 to be asked by the Government; one hon. Member proposes to reduce it perhaps to £110,000, and another to reduce it to £100,000; if the Motion for reducing it to £100,000 is carried, there is at once an end to the question of the £110,000. Or suppose that there are ten or twelve items included in one Vote, and one hon. Member proposes to reduce an item by £5,000, while two other hon. Members propose to reduce two other items by £1,000 each, if once the Vote is reduced by the smaller sum it is not competent afterwards to propose the larger reduction, although the Committee may desire possibly to make all the reductions.

SUPPLY—MISCELLANEOUS ESTIMATES.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair.”

SIR DENHAM NORREYS said, that having given notice of a Motion for that evening with respect to the Estimates, he had endeavoured to render himself deaf to all that was passing around him, and to shut his ears to the discussions upon the multifarious topics which had sprung up since the meeting of the House, when the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston) roused him from the state in which he was by appealing to him to postpone his Motion. He did not wish to become a bore, or to trouble the House with disagreeable propositions, but he believed that the subject of which he had given notice had long attracted the attention of every hon. Member who attended to the proceedings of that House, and that in placing his Motion upon the paper he was pointing out an evil the inconvenience of which was very generally recognized. He was quite ready to leave his Resolution in the hands of the House to adopt it if they thought there was common sense in it, or to reject it if there was not; but if he might be allowed to express an opinion upon his own Motion he should say that it was of more importance to the people of this country, so far as their pockets were concerned, than any Reform Bill that could be introduced. He believed that all their great speeches about retrenchment went for nothing, and that the really practical way in which to introduce economy in the finances was by attacking the Estimates in detail. Probably no official man, nor any man who had been or expected to be in office, would agree to his proposition, but, if it were adopted, the Estimates would henceforward be examined in such a manner as they had never been examined before. Under the present rule one hon. Gentleman started one hare, and twenty other hon. Gentlemen started twenty other different hares, and the result was that hon. Members' minds became so thoroughly confused that not a single hare was run down. Every job and every extravagance which a Government proposed was sure to pass because the Committee had not by its own forms the power of deciding on each item of a Vote. If each item were separately considered and separately decided, the Estimates would be very different to what they were now. He respected the ancient forms of proceeding, but those in respect to Votes in Supply were no longer applicable to the times. He should very much prefer that the matter should be referred to a Committee, but he would propose his Resolution and leave the House to deal with it as it thought fit. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving that it be an instruction to the Chairman in Committee of Supply that if a Member raises a discussion on any item of the Estimates, by proposing that it be omitted or modified, the Chairman shall confine the discussion to that item until it shall have been disposed of by the House, and that the Question shall be put to the House on the item under discussion separately and apart from the other items comprising the total amount to be voted.

MR. W. WILLIAMS seconded the Motion.

MR. SPEAKER: I ought to point out to the hon. Baronet that the only mode in which he can put his Motion is in the form of an Amendment on the Motion that I do now leave the Chair. That is the Motion at present before the House, and no other Motion can be now made except as an Amendment to that Question. It will be necessary, too, for the hon. Baronet to make a change in the wording of his Resolution before I can with propriety put it, because the instruction ought to be to the Committee, and not to the Chairman.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "it be an Instruction to the Committee, That if a Member raises a discussion on any item of the Estimates, by proposing that it be omitted or modified, the Chairman shall confine the discussion to that item, until it shall have been disposed of by the Committee; and that the Question shall be put to the Committee on the item under discussion separately and apart from the other items comprising the total amount to be voted," instead thereof.

MR. HENLEY said, he agreed with the noble Lord the Member for London and the noble Lord at the head of the Government, in thinking that it would be well that this subject should be referred to a Committee, but if the Motion were now persisted in it would be necessary to give an opinion on the subject at once. An idea seemed to have suddenly struck a great many hon. Gentlemen, from the proceedings of Friday night, that the rules of the House needed amendment, so that it might be possible for hon. Members to vote in two lobbies at one time. The confusion consequent upon discussing two or three questions at one time arose, not so much from the form of proceedings in the House of Commons, as from the desire of the Government to submit the Estimates in detail, and to give every information which hon. Members might desire in reference to them. If the hon. Baronet's proposition were adopted he was afraid it would only make confusion worse confounded. Supposing an Estimate of fifty items were under discussion, the first question to be put would be, "That a sum not exceeding—whatever the amount might be—be granted to Her Majesty." An hon. Member might take exception to the last item, say, of the fifty; if the discussion was to turn and the votes to be taken on that item, as the hon. Baronet proposed, the first step would be to withdraw the original question by leave, and to put the item objected to as the main question. After that was disposed of the original question would again have to be put, when some other hon. Member might drop down upon some other item, and the same process would have to be gone through, and so on throughout all the fifty items of the Estimate. The true remedy was in the hands of the Government. They had not these difficulties heretofore, because the items were kept more together, if he might use such a phrase, and he could not help expressing his opinion, that with respect to a Vote containing a number of small items, if the House were to attempt to give a separate decision on each of those different items, it would not be able to exercise economy in reference to them so effectually as the Government could who had considered them. He did not think it right to allow the Minister to shelter himself under the authority of that House in respect to every one of these little details, for he would have no difficulty in making out a case for each, which the House could not resist, as the House would not know anything about the items but what he chose to tell them. Such a course of proceeding, so far from leading to a beneficial result, would have quite a contrary tendency. If the Government thought fit to have the matter inquired into by a Committee, he (Mr. Henley) was not inclined to object to that proceeding; but, as the existing forms had lasted so long, he had a strong opinion that it would be difficult to alter them with advantage to the public.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken had on the whole taken so sound a view of the matter that he should have had but little disposition to add anything to his statement, had he not thought that it might be expected that something would be said on the part of the Government. According to the 206th section of the printed Rules and Forms of Proceeding of the House it was settled that where there arose a question between a greater and lesser sum, or a shorter or longer time, the least sum and the longest time were first to be put to the question; and that was stated to be an ancient order observed in November, 1675. Consequently, that rule had the merit of prescription on its side, and had stood the test of long experience. That was a point deserving consideration before an alteration was hastily adopted; and he recollected it to have been remarked by the late Speaker, than whom no one could speak with greater authority on such matters, that the more he considered the rules of procedure in that House the more he was convinced that they were founded on good sense. He would, therefore, strongly advise the House not, without good and solid reasons, to alter the present simple rule. He was willing to admit that when that rule was first introduced, and for very many years afterwards, the forms of the Votes were much simpler than at present. Some years ago the Votes proposed in the Estimates simply stated certain services with scarcely any detail, and, whenever detail was required it was furnished by some member of the Government, who orally, and while a Vote was under discussion, furnished the requisite explanations to satisfy the House of its propriety; but in consequence of the repeated demands of the House, and particularly of the Committees on the Estimates which sat in 1848, the Estimates were now really loaded with an amount of details which almost defeated the purpose which that detailed information was sought for, and prevented hon. Members from reading and studying the Estimates to the extent to which they might attend to them if less information were given. He doubted, without meaning improperly to remark on the industry of hon. Members, whether they all took the trouble to go in detail through the immense quantity of matter in small print now submitted to them. If hon. Members looked to the Army and Navy Estimates of the present year they would see under the head of Public Works and Fortifications a great succession of items, many of them of considerable importance, and if they had been inclined to deal with them in the same manner as the Civil Service Estimates had been dealt with the other night, they would have met with precisely the same embarrassment. If the Committee of Supply really undertook to go through the Estimates on the plan according to which a Bill was considered in Committee, and if the Estimates were to be read line by line, and each item put separately, he really did not know how many nights would be required for Supply in the course of the Session. The hon. Baronet who moved the Amendment had said that no person in office, or who desired to be in office, would ever assent to it; but he assured the hon. Baronet that no official Member had any wish to promote any rule of procedure other than that which should create the greatest clearness in the Committee of Supply, and enable the question to be put with the least confusion. He, however, entirely agreed in what the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Henley) with his usual shrewdness, had remarked, that the course now suggested would not tend to substantial economy. A vast deal of time would be consumed in discussing minute items of expenditure while the practical result, undoubtedly would be that the responsibility of the Government would be diminished, and the House by attempting to go through a mass of details, would really limit the control it otherwise exercised. He thought the more convenient and advantageous course would be to throw the responsibility of the details of expenditure on the executive, and to leave the decision of great and important principles of expenditure to the House. Let not the hon. Baronet suppose that the mode of proceeding suggested by him would increase the trouble of the Executive Government. Their trouble consisted in making the Estimates and studying them, but not in explaining them, since they were in possession of all the facts. If the House should on consideration find that the present rule was insufficient there would be no difficulty on the part of the Government to agree to the appointment of a Select Committee whenever it should be thought fit to appoint such Committee. He should not have the smallest objection to that course, but he had considerable doubt whether the present rule would not be found sufficient. When there were several items in a Vote the question was put upon the total Vote, and if single items were objected to it would be easy for hon. Gentlemen to state their different objections and add the several items objected to together ["Oh, oh!"] He was only stating the course actually adopted, and such cases would not occur frequently. If that course should be found unsatisfactory the House would have to consider whether some other course of procedure should be adopted, such as that sketched out by the hon. Baronet; but as far as the Government were concerned, they had no objection to the appointment of a Committee and to the substitution of any simple rule for the existing one. Unquestionably they had the strongest wish and interest for the promotion of that course of procedure which tended to the greatest clearness, and was most calculated to obviate confusion in the discussion of the different Votes.

Mr. CROSSLEY said, he believed that it was true that more detailed information was now given than formerly with respect to items in the Votes of Supply, but it amounted to nothing more than waste paper if, when it was laid before the House, hon. Members could not object to separate items. It was quite impossible to follow the advice of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that hon. Members objecting to different items, should add the sums together, and then move that the total amount be deducted from the Vote proposed, because with respect to those several items some hon. Members might concur in a portion, objecting only to one or two, and therefore they could not possibly amalgamate their objection with the objections of others. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley), thought matters went on very well because they had never met with a difficulty before, but the reason of that was that the Government was always too strong for them, and able to push the Votes through; but when they became too strong for the Government they might be able to strike out from the Estimates items that ought not to be there. As the Government did not seem to object to the appointment of a Committee, the best course for the hon. Member for Mallow to pursue would be to withdraw his Motion and leave the matter in the hands of Government.

MR. DISRAELI said, it seemed to be the general opinion, that if the forms of the House were to be considered at all, they had better be considered by a Select Committee than in the House itself. He had been a member several times of Committees appointed to confer on subjects like these, and he knew that after that process very different results were obtained from what could have been arrived at in the heat of debate in that House. The hon. Gentleman who had just sat down, based his argument on a ground that rather astonished him. He said, the difficulty now complained of never occurred before, because we had always strong Governments to deal with. Now, he had always thought, till now, that the general subject of congratulation was, that we had a strong Government, and he certainly had expected that the new Parliament would have given the noble Lord a trial for at least one Session. His opinion was, that the more they altered the forms of the House in respect to matters like these, the more they were increasing the power of the Members of the House and proportionally diminishing the responsibility of Ministers, and this was a course to which he could not give his approbation. He knew that no Motion was more popular than to move, that the Estimates should be referred to a Select Committee. Now, to refer the Estimates to a Select Committee was, in effect, saying to the Ministers that they should not exercise their intellect or incur any responsibility in reference to these Estimates. Under our Parliamentary constitution the Ministers of the Crown were the Select Committee of the House of Commons, and those who would refer such questions to a Select Committee were only endeavouring to take the work out of the hands of the Government. With regard to the Estimates, a very great change had taken place within the last two or three years in the form of drawing them up. There was the appearance of a great deal more information being imparted to the House of Commons, and the House accepted that as an evidence of its increased authority. Now, he thought the House should view that information with considerable suspicion. In old days a Vote was asked, say, for £100,000 for palaces; the Minister who proposed the Vote was supposed to be master of his subject. He explained it, if necessary; and the House, if satisfied, granted the £100,000 on his responsibility. If any details required explanation, he could be reckoned upon in his place to give it. He was prepared with a statement on the subject of the Estimate; and the Committee, after hearing his statement, with the advantage of cross-examination, were able to form an opinion; and if they were satisfied that his general and aggregate Estimate ought to be sustained, then they passed it. Now the fault of the present system was, that they had in one Vote too many items. It was perfectly absurd to fill up the Vote with the details of every miserable item, as if the Ministers could not, for example, be charged without the interference of the House with the responsibility of a water-closet. But, under the present system, the matter might become serious as regarded the public business. Any four men might, by the forms of the House, bring its business to a close. Any four men could, by the forms of the House, make a dissolution of Parliament absolutely necessary. And if there was not sufficient good sense in the country to insure that these four men would never be returned again, they might soon have such a dissolution of Parliament brought upon them. Why, they might destroy the British constitution at any time. Suppose they were to lay down, as one of the great principles of the Parliamentary constitution, that they should go into the minute details of every Vote. Every one would, of course, be entitled to require an explanation of the most minute particulars, and in such a case he wanted to know how business was to be carried on. The Minister who ought to be responsible, required a certain amount to maintain Her Majesty's palaces, and if he was a Minister who deserved their confidence—and his position implied that he did—they must suppose that he would not propose a sum for that purpose without making himself master of the business. With him, then, ought to rest the responsibility; but, if the Members of that House were to analyze the Estimate in detail, they would introduce into public business and into the conduct of the affairs of this great nation principles which they did not adopt in the management of their own establishments, and which, if they did, they would get no servant to carry out, or, at the best, such a servant as would not be worth keeping in any establishment.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he wished to ask, how it was possible for the House to deal satisfactorily with thirty or forty different items, all lumped together in one Vote. Within the last few years, a sum of £9,882,000 had been taken as one Vote, and in a Vote of this year (No. 12) thirty-four different items had been lumped together. The consequence of such a system was, that they could only address themselves effectively to some one leading topic, while numerous other objectionable matters escaped notice. The first thing to be done was, to have well-devised and well-considered Estimates, and have the items so classified, that discussion could take place on any item with something like effect. It was impossible in a House of 654 Members to discuss any small matter, but if the Votes were properly classified, the opinions of the House could be brought to bear upon any great particular grievance. He hoped some practical result would flow from this debate. The great difficulty they had to remove was, that after the first objection to a Vote, all other hon. Members were shut out from objecting. He hoped the Government would consent to the appointment of a Select Committee to consider the subject.

MR. ROEBUCK said, it appeared to him that the difficulty which was complained of, might be removed by a very simple process. Under the present system the Government proposed a Vote—say, of £39,691, that Vote being composed of a large number of items. He would suppose that four of those items were objected to by different Members. If, upon a division the reduction proposed by 'one of these hon. Members was carried, no further reduction of the Vote could take place. That appeared to him—and, he believed, to every hon. Member of the House—a most unwise arrangement, because a Vote might contain 100 or 200 items, and he thought an opportunity ought to be given to hon. Members to object to every item which they deemed exceptionable. He was aware that the objection to increase the power of the House in this matter would have the effect of diminishing the responsibility of the Ministry was a favourite objection; but he must say, that he regarded with a good deal of suspicion the disinclination which existed to afford too much information to the House. He knew that Ministers, and those who expected to be Ministers, were not anxious to afford such information; but, as the great majority of Members of that House never expected to be Ministers, and only sought to promote the interests of their constituents, he would advise them to require the fullest information with regard to every item of expenditure. He thought that the best course would be, that the Chairman of the Committee of Supply should begin by announcing the total amount of a Vote—say, £39,691—and should then proceed to read the items which constituted the Vote. The first item, for instance, might be "Buckingham Palace, £2,450." Well, nobody took any objection to that. Then the Chairman passed to the next item, which was not opposed; but when he came to the third item an objection was raised. He (Mr. Roebuck) thought all the items which had been read without objection should be taken as passed; but that when exception was taken to a particular item, a division, if it were called for, should take place upon that item. He recollected that when an alteration in the mode of taking divisions was suggested, and it was proposed to take down the names of hon. Members, it was objected that the change would only tend to waste the time of the House, but he would put it to the hon. Members who were acquainted with the old system whether that had been the result. He believed that if his suggestion were adopted, the Estimates would be passed very rapidly. Under the present system, scenes of contention occasionally occurred which were disgraceful to the House. Why, only on Friday they were engaged in discussion from five o'clock in the afternoon until one o'clock in the morning without passing a single Vote, and the Estimates were now precisely in the same position in which they were when that debate commenced. In his opinion, if an objection was raised to a particular item in a Vote, a division should be taken, and the Committee should then proceed to consider the subsequent items. This would ensure a discussion pertinent and consecutive, and they would not then have to complain of every one starting a hare and nobody catching it. He believed that if a Select Committee, consisting of experienced Members, were appointed to consider this question, they would speedily arrive at a satisfactory conclusion.

LORD ROBERT GROSVENOR suggested, that if a Select Committee was to be appointed, it was an unnecessary waste of the time of the House to proceed with this discussion. He, therefore, would advise the hon. Member to withdraw his Motion.

SIR DENHAM NORREYS said, if the Government were prepared to state that they would appoint a fairly selected Committee, to consider in what manner the Estimates could be most conveniently discussed, he would withdraw his Amendment.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON observed that, as it seemed to be the wish of the majority of the House that a Select Committee should be appointed to consider, whether any and what alteration could be made in Parliamentary forms, with the view of expediting proceedings in Committee of the whole House, he was prepared to state that he would move for the appointment of such a Committee.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. STAFFORD wished to ask the First Commissioner of Works, whether the Estimates of his Department were submitted to an audit, and if not, whether it was intended to submit them to the same audit as the Army and Navy Estimates?

SIR BENJAMIN HALL said, in reply to a question from Mr. Stafford, that the accounts of the Board of Works were regularly audited; the mode of keeping those accounts would probably be brought under the consideration of the Committee on public moneys, and that when the report of that Committee was presented, the accounts of the Board would be made out in a different form from that in which they were now prepared under the provisions of an Act of Parliament. He was glad to have the opportunity of stating that those accounts were now subject to audit, under the provisions of the 14 & 15 Vict.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

House in Committee; Mr. FitzRoy in the Chair.

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £39,691, be granted to Her Majesty, for the maintenance and repair of the Royal Palaces for one year, from the 1st day of April 1857 to the 31st day of March 1858."

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY said, he should divide the Committee on the item of £4,500 for the erection of a residence for the Royal Equerry, unless he received some satisfactory explanation of the necessity for such a building.

SIR BENJAMIN HALL said, that before he inserted this item in the Estimates he visited the Royal Mews, and satisfied himself that the proposed changes were necessary.

MR. ROEBUCK observed that this item included a charge for "a schoolroom for the children of Her Majesty's servants." He considered the promotion of education a very praiseworthy object, but he did not wish to see education promoted by these means. The House of Commons did not provide a place of education for its servants, why, then, should there be a school for those of the Queen? He thought the whole item ought to be struck out. It was—

"For the erection of a residence for the Crown Equerry, including a waiting-room, porter's-room, and store-rooms, and for the appropriation of the present residence of the equerry as apartments for the second clerk, and for an office and waiting-room for the Master of the Horse; for the removal of the third clerk from the rooms he at present occupies in the east wing to the apartments to be vacated by the second clerk; and for adapting the rooms of the third clerk as a schoolroom for the children of Her Majesty's servants, and as a residence for the schoolmistress, also for new carriage and foot gates to the principal entrance."

If the public money were to be spent in that way, the sooner the House of Commons ceased to call itself the guardian of the public purse the better. He really thought the Government should have been ashamed to submit such items to the House.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY asked why St. James's Palace could not be adapted for public offices? Buckingham Palace ought to be sufficient for court purposes, and St. James's would make a very good War Office.

MR. BRISCOE thought the Vote for filling up the spot of ground at Pimlico was most reasonable, and with regard to the item for the erection of a schoolroom he should most cordially concur in supporting it, believing it to be a most praiseworthy application of money.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he thought that the Committee ought not to pass such Estimates. The question was, not whether the amount was large or small, but whether the Vote was right or wrong. It was very right for Her Majesty to erect a school for these children, but then the public ought not to be called on to pay it. He found, also, that it was proposed that there should be expended on the repairs of those portions of St. James's Palace, occupied by Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Cambridge and His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, a sum of £2,689. But it seemed to him that if residences were provided for those Royal personages they ought themselves to defray the cost of keeping them in proper condition; at any rate, he should like to reduce that item by half. He had also to object to the proposed outlay of £6,218 on Hampton Court Palace. It appeared that during the last ten years there had been expended on that building not less than £70,000. That was, he maintained, an extravagant outlay; and in page 14 he found another Vote, Hampton Court Park. The different items were so scattered about that it was almost impossible to tell what any one building really cost. Hampton Court Park was put down at £961. The pleasure grounds of Longford River, £2,525, and the roads £833, making together over £4,000; and during the last ten years these items had amounted to £40,000 or £50,000. Let it be remembered, too, that Hampton Court Palace was never used by Her Majesty, but was occupied principally by indigent members of the aristocracy. He might be told that apartments had been provided there for the widows of two distinguished officers who had fallen on the field of battle; but he would venture to say that if the proper inquiry were made it would be found that worse accommodation was given to those ladies than to other persons who had no similar claims on the gratitude of the country. He did not complain that a provision had been made for those two widows, but he thought it would be better if it were furnished in the shape of an annuity. It appeared that there was a stud at Hampton Court, for in page 4

there was a Vote on account of it, and that young horses from that stud were annually sold. He wished to know to whom the proceeds of those sales went? And he would also ask what Members of the Royal Family occupied Bushy Park and Frogmore House and grounds, for the maintenance of which a sum of over £2,000 was set down in these Estimates?

SIR BENJAMIN HALL replied, that Bushy Park was unoccupied, and Frogmore House was occupied by the Duchess of Kent. He had stated on a previous evening, in reference to the Vote for Hampton Court paddocks, that the young stock which were sold last week were the property of Her Majesty, who of course received the proceeds; and at the same time he explained that none of the stock had been bred in the paddocks for which the Vote was asked.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he did not wish to withdraw at once the whole amount for the Royal Palaces, but there were several which were not occupied by any Members of the Royal Family. He must also beg again to express his disapproval of the Vote for the repairs of those portions of St. James's Palace occupied by their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge. He also objected to the charge for Kensington Palace, which was at present, he believed, occupied by no person except the Duchess of Inverness. He wished to see the Votes for St. James's Palace, Kensington Palace, and Hampton Court, reduced by one-half; and in order to obtain that object, he moved that the Vote should be reduced by a sum of £4,926, so that it should stand at £34,765 instead of £39,691.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £34,765, be granted to Her Majesty, for the maintenance and repair of the Royal Palaces for one year, from the 1st day of April 1857 to the 31st day of March 1858."

SIR BENJAMIN HALL said, he understood the hon. Member for Lambeth to say that he would allow one-half of the sum for the repair of the Royal palaces to be voted that evening. What would be the consequence? They would be able to effect one-half of the repairs, and next year or the year after they would have to vote an additional sum for the purpose of making at a higher cost those repairs which, if taken in time, might be done for a moderate sum. He could assure the hon. Gentleman that these Estimates had not been inserted in the Votes without the most careful consideration. He had attended to most of them himself, so far as he could do so. The hon. Member for Lambeth always let fly, especially at Hampton Court Palace, saying that the people took no interest in it. He wished that the hon. Gentleman would go down some Sunday, and see the number of people that flocked thither. A few Sundays ago between 13,000 and 14,000 persons passed through the apartments of Hampton Court Palace, thoroughly enjoying themselves. What would the people say to the House if they allowed the palace to fall into decay? He had therefore felt it his duty to produce these Estimates for the purpose of keeping in repair that structure, which was one of the decorations—if he might use the expression—of this country. Let him call the attention of the Committee to the manner in which the apartments of Hampton Court Palace were appropriated by the Queen. Formerly the Lord Chamberlain had the appropriation of the apartments, and it was charged against him that he divided them among his friends and relations. All that had been changed. The Queen had now taken them under her own supervision, and nothing could be more admirable than the way in which Her Majesty had appropriated them to the widows of men who had distinguished themselves in the wars of the country. [Mr. W. WILLIAMS: Who are they?] He might mention the names of Shadforth, of Boxer, of Strangways, of Cureton, and of many other distinguished officers, whose widows had been accommodated with apartments in Hampton Court Palace. It was now proposed to keep that and other palaces in order, so that they might not get worse than they were; and he would venture to say that if they had been put in a proper state of repair in time, they would have been much less expensive than the Committee now found them to be.

MR. BIGGS said, that the population of 70,000 which he represented was for true economy, but not parsimony. These debates were, to a great extent, time wasted, and he was sure that a great majority of hon. Members would agree with the poet that they are—

"Petty quarrels about petty things."

LORD JOHN MANNERS observed that the hon. Member for Lambeth had blamed the Government for having distributed the Votes under so many different heads; but it was not too much to say that when he sat down the Committee had not the faintest conception what Vote he was speaking about, or to what palaces or buildings his remarks were applied. He hoped that the hon. Gentleman would not act in the same way in future, but would remember the difficulty in which the Committee was placed when Votes were placed before it in such a way as to render systematic or regular discussion altogether impossible. The hon. Member, to whom the Chief Commissioner had given an admirable answer, so far as any answer could be given, seemed to propose either to make those palaces which were not in the personal occupation of Her Majesty perfectly useless by allowing nobody to inhabit them, or to permit them to fall into decay, and become a perpetual monument of his absurd economy. The Committee would act far more wisely if it followed the advice of the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. Biggs), and discussed all these questions with a view to true economy. Wholesale reductions of Votes indicated no principle, and could lead to no result except to enable hon. Members who had not the courage to face real extravagance to say to their constituents, "See what bold fellows we are! In a Committee of the whole House of Commons, and in opposition to Government, we proposed to cut down one-half of the Votes for the Royal palaces."

MR. DILLWYN hoped the hon. Member for Lambeth would withdraw his Amendment, and allow the Committee to discuss the proposition of the hon. Member for Tavistock (Sir J. Trelawny) with respect to the Crown equeries. The Royal palaces ought either to be kept up in a proper manner or not at all. It was of no manner of use to keep nibbling at the Votes in this way.

MR. PIGOTT could not agree with the noble Lord the Member for Leicestershire (Lord J. Manners) that the observations of the hon. Member for Lambeth were either unnecessary or ill-timed. They had, at all events, effected one good object, for they had drawn forth some excellent advice from the noble Lord, and a very satisfactory explanation from the Chief Commissioner. He believed that the discussion of these Votes was both necessary and useful.

SIR JOHN TROLLOPE observed that the noble Lord the Member for Leicestershire had not deprecated the discussion of these estimates, but had simply found fault with the mode in which they had been dealt with by the hon. Member for Lambeth as being based on no intelligible principle. He must say, for his own part, that the hon. Gentleman was so confused, so little to the purpose, and so rapid in his transitions from one portion of the Votes to another, that he found it impossible to follow him through his statement. There could be no doubt that Hampton Court Palace afforded immense gratification to the hard-worked, middle, and lower classes of this great metropolis; and if anything could lessen his regret at knowing that they flocked thither in large numbers on Sunday, which was the last day that ought to be devoted to such a purpose, it would be the fact that they spent their time there in a reasonable and happy manner. He hoped the Committee would maintain the Vote in its integrity. The hon. Member for Lambeth proposed to reduce it by a round sum, but he stated no reason why the Committee should lop off that particular amount.

MR. AYRTON said, that he agreed that the House ought to express its opinion upon some principle with regard to these Votes, and not upon the pounds, shillings, and pence alone involved. A very important question might be raised on the present Vote. A large sum had been spent by the nation in providing a splendid palace for the Sovereign, and if Buckingham Palace were not everything that could be wished, it was not because the House of Commons had voted the money wanted with a grudging hand. The question to which he referred was, what ought to become of the old palaces which the Sovereign had vacated? He contended that they ought to be surrendered to the country, in order that they might be made available for national purposes. The proper mode of carrying out this principle would be by disallowing all the money proposed to be voted for St. James's Palace, and thus declaring that the House would not recognize the keeping up of St. James's Palace for the Sovereign. He had not had time to consider this matter maturely, but upon a future occasion he would not allow the Vote to pass without raising the question. He therefore gave the Government twelve month's notice to quit St. James's Palace.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he knew the alacrity with which the House voted away the public money. Was it necessary for the maintenance of Hampton Court Palace and grounds to expend every year £12,000 upon it? Still he was not for doing away with Hampton Court. He would beg to withdraw his Motion.

Motion by leave withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he must protest against the imputation which his hon. Friend (Mr. W. Williams) was always ready to cast upon those who differed with him,—that they voted away the public money with alacrity. He was just as ready as his hon. Friend to be economical, but he hoped he showed more common sense in his economy than his hon. Friend. If his hon. Friend declared that those who lived in these palaces, and paid no rent for them, ought to keep them in repair, that would be a definite proposition; but to come down, as his hon. Friend did, and detain the House for an hour on a Motion to withdraw half a Vote, so that the palace might be half painted and half cleansed, passed his comprehension. That was about as sensible as for his hon. Friend to come home from a public meeting with his face dusty and dirty, and to wash one side of his face to-day and the other half to-morrow.

MR. ROEBUCK said, in page 2 of the Estimates it was stated that the sum voted on account last Session was deducted at the head of each estimate; but, it appeared to him that the sum of £39,961, now asked for, was the total expenditure for the year. He wished to know what had become of the sum voted on account.

MR. WILSON explained that last Session a Vote of £60,000 had been taken on account of the sum of £196,000, required for royal palaces and public buildings. The estimates for these purposes were now divided under three separate heads; the full amount was asked on each of the two first, and credit for the whole amount of £60,000 would be found under the third head, at page 5.

In answer to a question from Sir H. WILLOUGHBY,

MR. WILSON explained that the Return for 1856 placed in the margin of these Estimates, showed the amount that had actually been expended in the twelve months ending September last. The present Estimates gave the sum which it was considered would be required for the various objects during the present year, but from the nature of these objects the money was not always expended during the year, as the objects could not be carried out in a given time. That was a distinction between the Civil Service Estimates and those voted for the army and navy, the amount voted for which was always expended during the year.

The Chairman was about to put the question, when

MR. DILLWYN said, that the hon. Baronet (Sir J. Trelawny) had not withdrawn his Amendment.

MR. CHAIRMAN said, he had received only one Amendment.

MR. DILLWYN said, that in that case he would move that the Vote be reduced by £4,500, the item for the alterations in the equerries' house.

Motion made, and Question, "That a sum, not exceeding £35,191, be granted to Her Majesty, for the maintenance and repair of the Royal Palaces for one year, from the 1st day of April 1857 to the 31st day of March 1858," put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(2.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £60,386, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary for maintenance and repair of Public Buildings, for providing the necessary supply of Water for the same, for Rents of Houses for the temporary accommodation of Public Departments and charges attendant thereon, for one year, from the 1st day of April 1857 to the 31st day of March 1858."

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY said, he wished to call the attention of the Committee to the fact that the British Museum was not opened in the evenings, by which working men after the cessation of the day's labour were precluded from visiting it. At present the privilege of seeing the Museum might be said to be exclusively enjoyed by the higher and middle classes only, and he could not see why an arrangement might not be made for admitting the humbler classes in the evening.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER reminded the hon. Baronet that the British Museum was under the management of the Board of Trustees, and that the proper time for raising the question which he had just brought under consideration would be when the separate Vote for the Museum was proposed. He might state that the suggestion of the hon. Baronet was a matter which had been much discussed at different times by the Trustees of the Museum. It also became a question with the Trustees whether the reading-room should be open at nights. The objection to lights in the reading-room in the evenings was considerable, and, notwithstanding the earnest wish of the Trustees to make the Museum as extensively available as possible, they had come to the conclusion that, charged as they were with the public duty of guarding so valuable a collection of books and manuscripts, they would not be justified in opening the reading-room at nights. They were fortified in that conclusion by the fact that their present practice of only opening the Museum and reading-room in the daytime was in unison with that adopted in similar institutions on the Continent.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY said, the difficulty might be got over by opening the Museum on Sundays. ("No, no!") Some hon. Members might differ with him on that point, but Hampton Court Palace and Kew Gardens were open on Sundays, and no one ventured to say that any harm had ensued from that practice. He did not see why after, or between, the hours of divine service on Sundays the Museum might not be opened to the public. He knew that the result of such an arrangement would be that thousands of the working classes would gladly avail themselves of seeing the antiquities and works of art collected within the building, instead of spending their leisure on Sundays in public-houses. He had another suggestion to make, and that was that the ugly screen in front of Burlington House might be taken down with advantage to the public and to the appearance of the building itself.

SIR BENJAMIN HALL said, he could not suppose the hon. Baronet had been inside the courtyard of Burlington House, otherwise he would have been convinced that if the wall or screen were taken down the public would see very little more worth looking at than they now saw through the centre gates, for, except the house itself, a great part of the courtyard only communicated with stables and back premises which were not very agreeable objects to look at.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, there was a considerable Vote taken for furnishing accommodation to certain learned societies in Burlington House, but he had always understood that the occupation there of those societies was only to be a temporary one; and he should wish to hear from some Member of the Government what was to be the ultimate destination of Burlington House.

MR. WILSON said, no decision had been come to by the Government as to the permanent occupation of Burlington House, but certainly the want of room felt in Somerset House occasioned by the necessity of providing offices for the collection of the succession duty and for other public departments rendered it necessary that they should make arrangements for the removal of the learned societies in question from the premises where they had been located for so many years, and providing other accommodation for them elsewhere. They had consequently been transferred to Burlington House, which they were to occupy for a time. He believed, however, the present arrangement in respect of those societies was a convenient and economical one.

SIR JOHN TROLLOPE wished to know whether there had been a specific agreement with those learned societies that apartments were to be found for them in any of the public buildings. Undoubtedly, office room was wanted for the Department of the Succession-Duty, but he had never understood it to be necessary that if those learned societies, some of whom were wealthy bodies, were removed from Burlington House, the Government were to provide lodgings for them elsewhere. The time had come, he thought, when they should be called on to furnish accommodation for themselves. He did not agree with the right hon. Baronet (Sir B. Hall) that there would be no public advantage in taking down the wall in front of Burlington House. On the contrary, as a matter of taste, he submitted it ought to be taken down, and that if the view of the house were thrown open to the public they might expect to get something for their money. But at present the public only knew that certain learned societies had lodgings in Burlington House.

SIR BENJAMIN HALL said, he should be very glad that the public should be enabled to see all that was worth looking at in Burlington House. It appeared to him, however, that with the exception of the view of the building which was to be obtained from the central gateway, it would present no feature of particular interest, unless the stables which were behind the walls at each side of the gateway were taken down, and in order to accomplish that the Committee must be prepared to vote an additional sum of money.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, the statement to the effect that when Burlington House was first purchased no agreement had been entered into to give it up to the learned societies was perfectly correct. It was, however, a very natural arrangement to make, that as those societies had been deprived of the rooms which, owing to the beneficence of King George III., had been allotted to them at Somerset House, apartments at Burlington House should be placed at their disposal. He should be sorry, however, to find that the temporary occupation of those apartments should be converted into a permanent title to their possession. If Burlington House were to be allowed to remain as it at present stood, he thought an iron railing in front might with great advantage be constructed, but he was at the same time of opinion that the whole plan in connection with it might be reconsidered, with the view of turning the three acres which composed its site to the best possible account.

MR. WILSON observed, that the learned societies in question were entitled to the possession of rooms by royal grant, and therefore that, upon their removal from Somerset House, it became necessary to procure apartments for them elsewhere. They had consequently been located in Burlington House, but only upon the distinct understanding that they should leave it the moment the Government might deem it expedient to turn its site to some other use.

VISCOUNT GODERICH said, that the Royal Society was the only Society which had been removed from Somerset House to Burlington House. The Linnæan Society had removed, at a great expense to themselves, from their house in Soho Square, and he should maintain that that Society ought not to be turned out of its present quarters, unless the Government were prepared to make some compensation for the outlay to which he had referred.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER objected to the item for the buildings for the War Department, which were dispersed over various streets. He could not understand why the War Department should be spread over so many offices. There was a house next door to the Ordnance Office which might be advantageously added to the buildings of the War Department. The same offices appeared to be charged twice. They were found in two items.

SIR BENJAMIN HALL said one item was for rent, and the other for repairs.

MR. SPOONER said, he observed an item for the expenses attendant on the bringing of these learned bodies into Burlington House. He had no doubt, however, that when the time came for their removal, the country would be called upon to pay the cost of getting them out; he should move as an Amendment, therefore, that the sum of £4,725, which the Committee was asked to grant for the purpose of converting the buildings of the west wing of Burlington House into lecture and examination rooms for scientific societies be deducted from the Vote.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £55,661, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary for maintenance and repair of Public Buildings, for providing the necessary supply of Water for the same, for Rents of Houses for the temporary accommodation of Public Departments and charges attendant thereon, for one year, from the 1st day of April 1857 to the 31st day of March 1858."

MR. TITE said, that the Royal Society, the Geographical Society, and the Antiquarian Society, were formerly located in Somerset House, and they were asked by the Government to go to Burlington House. The Antiquarian and Geological Societies declined; the Royal Society, and the Linnæan and Chemical Societies went there, and this charge was for the improving and decorating the hall for their meetings. These societies were not wealthy, and they understood that their location in Burlington House was to be permanent, and they had gone to expense on the faith of that understanding. As the Society accommodated the Government in leaving Somerset House, the Government were bound to provide other accommodation for them if they could not retain Burlington House. The money and some time had been spent, and it would have been wrong of the Government if they had not provided accommodation for the discharge of public duties at Somerset House, by providing another place for the assemblage of the learned societies. It was idle, therefore, to talk of reducing the Vote.

MR. WILSON observed that the Government had, some time since, been charged with neglect for not having provided a sufficient staff of clerks for the purpose of collecting the succession duty, and that, the matter having early last autumn been brought under the notice of the Treasury, they had made a proposal to these learned societies to the effect that, if they were prepared to give up the apartments in Somerset House, which had been allotted to them by Royal grant, the Government would place at their disposal rooms in Burlington House. Now, if the Government had taken a contrary course, it was quite clear that they would have been obliged to pay a considerable rent for rooms in which to accommodate the staff of clerks to which he had just alluded. The Government never contemplated that, by putting Burlington House to this purpose, they infringed the right of these public societies to permanent accommodation. The societies were good enough to go out of rooms in Somerset House which they were perfectly entitled to retain, in order to accommodate the Government, and it was only reasonable that, in the event of leaving Burlington House, when it was wanted for other purposes, they should be furnished with a new building. He quite agreed in the proposition that the Government were bound to furnish other rooms in the event of these societies not being able to retain the rooms they now used in Burlington House, and he thought that great blame would have attached to the Government if they had neglected to make this arrangement.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, he was glad that Government had purchased the garden of Burlington House. It was, however, useless to anybody except the sparrows, and he thought Government ought to produce a proper plan for utilizing it, and making it available to the public. Still, under all the circumstances, he was not sorry to see it applied to its present purpose. So much public feeling attached to these literary and scientific societies, that they ought to be fostered and encouraged by the Government. He would suggest that the house, being very low, should be raised two or three stories, that the unoccupied grounds behind should, if necessary, be built over, and that the collections, which used to be visited by so many thousands when in Marlborough House, should be recalled from their honourable exile, in what had been irreverently styled "The Brompton Boilers." It was obvious that the public offices must be concentrated, but they could find better sites than Burlington House in the neighbourhood of the Houses of Parliament, which was in fact the official and Government quarter of the town.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY observed, that the discussion had been productive of great good, and he was glad that it had been elicited that these societies had a claim on the Government. It was said, however, that the money was all spent, but he believed that the property might be sold at a profit. Burlington House stood on only a small portion of the ground which had been purchased, and it was wasting money to allow those three or four acres in the heart of the town to be unoccupied. Nothing could be more unsightly than the wall, and a light railing, in substitution of it, would be a great improvement.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Tite) had thrown new and important light upon the subject under discussion. It was from the statement of that hon. Gentleman, who was no Member of the Government, that the Committee had first obtained any real information, and from that it now appeared that Her Majesty's Government made offers to many learned societies, some of which were, and some were not found in Somerset House, to give accommodation—and, as they thought, permanent accommodation—in Burlington House. Some one or two of them accepted; some declined; and there was a third class, which had no right to accommodation in Somerset House, which accepted, and now claimed permanent habitation at the hands of Her Majesty's Government. It was said by the hon. Member himself, an "administrative reformer," that it was useless to inquire into the matter, because the expense had been incurred—the societies were there, and would think themselves very ill-used if they were not allowed to remain there. Although, in other instances of small amounts, a note was appended that the money had been spent, this was a most improper exception to the general rule, and he wished to ask the Secretary of the Treasury whether he had any objection to furnish the House with a copy of the document under the authority of which the money had been expended?

MR. DRUMMOND said, the hon. Member for Maidstone (Mr. B. Hope) had declared the general feeling to be, that these learned societies ought to be fostered and encouraged by the Government. Now, fostering and encouraging meant giving public money. If that were the feeling of gentlemen on both sides of the House, and if that were the feeling of the country, for goodness' sake let there be no more nonsense heard about administrative reform, or declamations upon bustings about retrenchment and economy. It was all stuff. Now, with respect to these societies—or, as they really are, clubs—one set of gentlemen, who were travellers, called themselves the Geographical Society; another set of gentlemen, who caught butterflies, called themselves the Linnæan Society. Those were the learned bodies which should be fostered and encouraged. Then there was a Geological Society: but what on earth was the use of a Geological Society? Could not the gentlemen who were fond of discussing questions of strata meet in their own houses? Why should the House go on year after year, providing out of the public taxes, for all these clubs, which they chose to dignify with the name of scientific societies? He protested against this as not only a useless expenditure, but as being no part of the proper business of the State.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON must protest against the doctrine of his hon. Friend who had just sat down, which was founded on views of the duties of a Government which were exceedingly narrow, and quite unworthy of a great nation. Parliament and the country had for years deemed it right to contribute largely from the public revenues for the promotion of art, not simply on account of the credit which a country derived from its successful cultivation, but from a feeling that the development of art added to the creative power of a nation's industry. Yet we had altogether neglected the promotion of science, while other States had devoted great means to its encouragement. Would any man say that science was of less importance to a country than art? The progress of science obviously contributed more directly to the prosperity and power of a country than any ornamental pursuits, however estimable in themselves: therefore, in rendering to these scientific bodies the slight assistance, afforded by facilities for meeting and communicating together, as they did in Burlington House, the Government were guilty of no lavish expenditure of the public resources. Indeed, if the Government were liable to any reproach in the matter, it was for not having sufficiently attended to the claims of science, which was so intimately bound up with the wealth and greatness of the country, and was the spring of so many important improvements. He trusted, then, that the country would not be run away with by any declamation such as that in which his hon. Friend had just indulged, but would continue to feel that, by giving to these societies the small assistance, which enabled them to conduct their valuable pursuits in contiguous apartments, they were doing that which was mainly for the advantage of the country.

Mr. Drummond

MR. STAFFORD said, he also hoped that the country would not be run away with by declamation—not even by that of the noble Lord. This item had no comment of any kind attached to it, and the acute, practised eye of the right hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir F. Baring) was perhaps not aware that it came in the same category as the Vote of £11,000, to which he had called the attention of the Committee on a former occasion. That great Administrative Reformer, the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Tite) exultingly proclaimed that the money was all spent. No doubt the Committee would be curious to hear the explanation of the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury. The Chief Commissioner of Works had told them that he had the authority of the Treasury for the outlay of £14,000 on the ornamental water in St. James's Park; so that the Treasury were the actual offenders themselves in one case and the authority for the offence in another. "Quis custodiet ipsos custodes." Let the Secretary to the Treasury leave all disquisition on the comparative merits of science and art to the noble Viscount, and tell the Committee distinctly by what authority the funds already spent had been drawn.

MR. SPOONER asked what had become of the two societies which, it was alleged, had a right to public buildings, and would not consent to remove to Burlington House.

MR. WILSON could assure the noble Lord opposite (Lord J. Manners) that the Treasury did not execute these works, but had only sanctioned them. They were carried out by the Board of Works. Their execution was not a matter of choice, but one of public necessity. A great revenue department, charged with the collection of millions of money, absolutely required more accommodation; and, if they had hired additional buildings to meet their pressing wants, the rent they would have had to pay would have cost as much per annum as the alterations made at Somerset House. The two societies to which the hon. Member (Mr. Spooner) referred, still remained at Somerset House, and could not be turned out without their own consent. Another body, for which the Government was obliged to furnish accommodation, was the Senate of London University, who used to conduct their examinations in Somerset House; but they now occupied one of the wings of Burlington House. These works had been executed under the authority of the Board of Works. It was true the money had been spent without the sanction of Parliament, but it was impossible that the Government could have allowed the operations of a great department like that of the Inland Revenue to be brought to a complete stand still for eight or perhaps even twelve months until the pleasure of Parliament could be taken on a Vote of £4,700. Burlington House having been unoccupied it was thought the most economical arrangement to remove the learned societies thither from Somerset House. No absolute cession of the buildings had been made to these bodies, as some hon. Members seemed to suppose; but when they were turned out of the apartments to which they were entitled, the Government undertook to provide them with other rooms. The Royal Society thought these various bodies ought to be located together. One condition of the arrangement was, that the public should have access to their conjoint library.

SIR JOHN TROLLOPE said, that this sum of £4,700, did not include all the expenses incurred about providing accommodation for these societies, for the hon. Gentleman had forgotten the capital sum of £140,000 which had been expended in the purchase of the building itself. He also believed that one of these learned societies at least—namely, the Senate of the University of London—had no right to be established there, as that college was originally established by private subscriptions.

SIR FRANCIS BARING observed that he did not think the explanation of the hon. Gentleman very satisfactory, for he had not answered the question. If the act was done, why was it not stated in the Estimates? It was quite possible that in the course of the year an expenditure might become necessary that was not contemplated when the Estimates were voted; but in that case the first duty of the Government in the next year's Estimates was to call attention to the fact by a special note in the Estimates themselves, stating the circumstances under which such excess of expenditure had occurred. The hon. Secretary for the Treasury must have calculated largely on the inexperience of the young Members of the House, he thought, when he talked of the difficulty of meeting such unexpected charges while Parliament was not sitting, for it was well known that there was £100,000 voted for civil contingencies, besides which he had the surplus arising from former years to draw upon in any emergency such as he referred to. It was quite clear that this sum had been paid out of money voted by Parliament for other purposes, and was consequently a most improper proceeding, which it was the duty of the Committee to notice.

MR. MORGAN remarked, that being a fellow of the Royal Society and also of the Society of Antiquaries, he was able to assure the Committee that the distinct understanding on which they removed from Somerset House to Burlington House was that their abode in the latter building should be permanent.

MR. TITE said, that as another fellow of the Royal Society, he could corroborate Mr. Morgan's statement, and would add that the change of residence was consented to on the part of the societies in order to meet the wishes and convenience of the Government. He had been misunderstood with regard to the Vote for Burlington House. He approved the sum proposed for repairs, but not the sum of £4,000 for alterations. He regretted to say that hon. Members were in the habit of twitting him with supporting the Government whether right or wrong. There was no ground for that uncourteous insinuation. He should support the Government when he thought they were right, and reprehend, and probably vote against them, when in the wrong.

MR. LOCKE KING said, no large outlay should have been expended upon Burlington House at the mere will of the Government. The purpose to which that building should be put ought to have been left to the decision of Parliament.

MR. MOWBRAY said, he wished to know whether the sum of £5,205 represented the whole amount of liabilities and expenses in regard of Burlington House, or whether there was anything due beyond?

MR. WILSON replied that it included the whole cost except the purchase-money. And with regard to the interest on that sum the Committee should recollect it would have been the same whether Burlington House were left empty or occupied as now. There was a general Vote for works, out of which the First Commissioner paid wages and other items during the year. If the amount was short at the end of the year he applied to the Treasury, and they, if they saw fit, authorised an advance to meet the deficiency, charging it in the next year's Estimates. He quite agreed with his right hon. Friend that it would be better if a note of such payments were made in the Estimates, and in the next year's Estimates he would take care if any expenditure beyond the sum voted was incurred during the year the fact should be noted and the circumstances explained. The course, however, which had been taken in the present instance was one which had been pursued from time immemorial.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER inquired whether it was intended to purchase the houses next to the old Ordnance Office, in Pall Mall, in order to bring all the offices connected with the War Department into one building? He wished also to know whether any Vote was to be taken for the new buildings near Waterloo Bridge, connected with Somerset House?

MR. WILSON replied that a charge had appeared each year in the Estimates for the Board of Inland Revenue for the new buildings at Somerset House, as they belonged to that Department. With regard to the houses in Pall Mall they had only been attainable within the last two or three months, and after other arrangements had been made; and it being in contemplation to concentrate all the public offices in one spot, it was not thought advisable to make the purchase.

MR. HENLEY said, that as it appeared that in one case the money now asked for had already been expended, he should like to know if there were any other items in the same condition.

MR. WILSON said, he was not aware that there were any other items in the same condition, although he could not say positively that in no case a portion of the money now asked for had been spent on account. Care would, however, be taken in future that no money should, except under circumstances of necessity, be expended without the previous knowledge of the House; and, if it should be necessary that money should be expended, that a clear statement with regard to it should appear in the Estimates.

LORD JOHN MANNERS remarked, that he considered the promise of the Secretary of the Treasury as to the future satisfactory; but his explanation as to the past by no means so. He recommended his hon. Friend, Mr. Spooner, however, to be content with the promise, and withdraw the Amendment.

SIR BENJAMIN HALL undertook that for the future there should be an explanation given of any excess of expenditure in his department.

MR. SPOONER said, that on the understanding alluded to, he would withdraw his Amendment.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, that he did not consider that the declaration of the Government went far enough. The Board of Works and the Treasury together had no right to spend the public money without the sanction of that House, and he trusted that the Committee would receive an assurance from the Government that no money should be expended upon any work without a distinct grant being voted for the purpose.

SIR BENJAMIN HALL said, he could not make any such general promise. It might happen that while Parliament was not sitting the building occupied by one of the departments might get into such a state as to require expenditure to prevent further dilapidation, and surely it could not be expected that the Government should not have the power of expending money in such a case. If, however, a case should arise in which any expenditure became a matter of necessity, an explanatory note would be affixed to the item in the Estimates of the following year.

MR. STIRLING said, he wished to call attention to the lodging of the London University in Burlington House, and to ask if it was to be a permanent or local occupation?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER stated that the University of London was a public institution, established by Royal charter, and apartments for purposes connected with that University had always been provided at the public expense.

Motion by leave withdrawn.

Original question put, and agreed to.

(3.) £36,069, Furniture Public Departments.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY asked whether any portion of this sum had already been expended.

SIR BENJAMIN HALL said that there was an item of £9,157 expended under the authority of the Lords of the Treasury. A portion of this expenditure had been rendered necessary by the re-arrangement of the Treasury Chambers, and other portions had been incurred in taking premises for various commissions appointed to inquire into particular matters.

COLONEL BOLDERO complained that in this and the preceding Votes there were items for furniture required in the military departments to the amount of £16,000, and which, therefore, ought to have appeared in the Army Estimates. Putting them into the Civil Service Estimates was not dealing fairly with the public.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said that the Vote also included £2,000 for the Commissariat.

Vote agreed to.

MR. BENTINCK said, he fully concurred in what had been said as to the impropriety of cutting off portions of a Vote unless there was some good reason for such a course, but he trusted the Committee would understand, that in the objection he was going to raise to an item in this Vote his wish was to vindicate a distinct and positive principle. He was not going to revive the discussion that had taken place as to the authority of the Government to make certain expenditures without the previous sanction of Parliament. There might be expenses that would properly come under the head "emergencies," but he could not understand how it was possible that the portion of the Vote which he was about to object to could come under that head. He could not see how payment for the clearing out and paving a fish-pond could be called an emergency. The principle which he wanted to assert was, that the public money should not be applied with a niggard hand for useful works while it was lavishly expended on works which were comparatively useless. He found in the Vote now before the Committee a sum of £11,985 for removing the mud in the lake in St. James's Park, levelling and concreting the bottom, intercepting the land drainage, sinking a well, and refilling the lake with pure water. He did not think it could be contended that this expenditure was for a sanitary purpose. He thought it should be considered that it was for an ornamental purpose, and what he complained of was the lavish manner in which money was laid out for purposes of, as he might call them, amusement, while grants for objects of national importance were doled forth in the most niggardly manner. A handsome sheet of water in St. James's Park might be a very agreeable sight; but what was the improvement of that lake as compared with the works which were required to save the lives and property that were annually sacrificed for want of harbours of refuge and other coast works? Another objection he had to this item for the Park was, that it was a sum charged on the entire country for beautifying the metropolis. If it was desirable to adorn the metropolis the people of London should pay for it, and not the population of Great Britain at large, many of whom never visited London, and therefore never saw those works for which they were charged. On these grounds he should move the reduction of the Vote by the item of £11,985—the money spent on the lake in St. James's Park.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £63,796, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray, to the 31st day of March 1858, the Expense of maintaining and keeping in repair the Royal Parks, Pleasure Grounds, &c., and other charges connected therewith."

SIR BENJAMIN HALL assured the hon. Member for West Norfolk that his real object in carrying out this improvement was a sanitary one, though undoubtedly it would at the same time have an ornamental effect. In his communication with the Treasury on the subject it would be seen that he did not say one word in relation to the ornamental, but he had felt it absolutely necessary in a sanitary point of view that this work should be undertaken. There was not an hon. Gentleman present who, if he had in his park a piece of water like those in St. James's Park and Kensington Gardens, would allow it to remain in so filthy a state for a single day if he had the means of cleansing it. As to the charge of spending money which had not been voted by Parliament, he hoped the Committee would not think him so arrogant or so presumptuous as to desire to override the privileges of that House in checking the public expenditure. The fact was, he believed it to be necessary that this work should be undertaken; an opportunity offered to carry it out at a much cheaper rate than it could afterwards have been executed for; nobody, he believed, could object to the manner in which the work had been performed, for it had hitherto been entirely successful; and he hoped the Committee would think that he had done wisely in taking advantage of a favourable moment to begin it.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY wished to call the attention of the Committee to the fact that the Vote for parks and pleasure-grounds was in 1855, £69,100; that in 1856 it had risen to £89,000; and that for the present year, including the portion of the Vote already taken and that now before the Committee, it amounted to £116,000. A sum of no less than £42,000 had been spent on the London parks this year. There was in the Estimates now before the Committee a sum of £3,400 for the formation of a sewer from the lake in St. James's Park to the Horse Guards, and thence on some further distance. That sum was placed under the head "emergencies." Now, he altogether objected to this proceeding. A sum of £850 was voted for this sewer in 1855, and the work having been thus recognised by the House in 1855, he was at a loss to know why it should have been left out of last year's Estimates and made this year to figure as an emergency at a sum so much larger than that voted for it two years ago.

SIR BENJAMIN HALL had already referred to the condition of his office about the time in question, and could only say that the omission of the item from the Estimates of last year was occasioned by the state of confusion into which that office was thrown owing to the unfortunate circumstances of which he had apprised the House on a former occasion.

MR. PIGOTT thought that his right hon. Friend spent rather too much money in one year, and that it would be better if he distributed his outlay over a longer period. He hoped that next year the expenditure on the parks would not be so heavy.

MR. H. BERKELEY said, he wished to express his thanks to his right hon. Friend for his sanitary measures in the parks, which had been attacked by the hon. Member for Norfolk. No one who reflected upon that muddy lake, under the very nose of Royalty, who knew the unhealthy state of the houses in Carlton Gardens at certain seasons from the foul state of the water, and who had seen the number of children congregated by that dirty pond, which his right hon. Friend had now cleaned out, but must be thankful to him for the good that he had accomplished.

MR. SEYMER said, that he was not quite happy yet about the cows in Hyde Park. They were told the other day that the cows were desirable on account of the milk that they supplied; but so long as the railways brought in good milk and the water companies laid on plenty of water there was no fear of a deficiency of milk in London. He hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would make some proposition to the Ranger by which the public might have the benefit of a close sward in Hyde Park instead of long grass and the other inconveniences which resulted from the depasturing of cows. The country paid £40,000 a year for the keeping up of the three parks, but there seemed to be doubts as to who had control over the pasturage. He believed that if sheep were placed in Hyde Park instead of cows the change would be found to be a matter of profit.

MR. SLANEY thanked his right hon. Friend for the improvements which he had effected in the parks, which had greatly increased their healthfulness and beauty, and stated that so far from grudging the Vote he thought that it was exceedingly well bestowed.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, that these thanks were justly due, for the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works certainly had shown very great taste and judgment in the improvements which he had carried out in the parks, but he could not help thinking that more money was expended upon them than was necessary. For example, the new lodge at Cumberland Gate was estimated to cost £1,281, and it appeared to him that it was just such a lodge as a gentleman would put up on his own estate for about £300 or £400. He thought that the entrance to the park at Marlborough House also had cost a great deal more than such a work would have cost under the inspection of private individuals.

SIR BENJAMIN HALL said, that he took great interest in the parks, and that he was there nearly every day watching what was going on, and endeavouring to curtail the expenditure as much as possible. Almost every piece of work that was done was put up to tender, and it was in pursuance of this system that he had been enabled to accomplish so much with so little money. The lodge at Cumberland Gate had been submitted to five or six eminent builders, and the sum of £1,281 for it in the Estimates was the amount of the lowest tender that had been sent in. It must be remembered that the whole of the money voted for a work was not always expended upon it, and the new road and entrance at Marlborough House afforded an instance of this. The sum voted for those improvements was £4,500, but the sum actually expended had been only £2,631, being £1,630 for forming the road and walls, paving, and gas works, and £1,001 for the lodge, walls, and paving, which lodge was not included in the original Estimate, but was erected in consequence of a desire very generally expressed by the House that there should be such a building.

SIR JOHN TROLLOPE hoped that the hon. Member for West Norfolk would not press his Amendment to a division. Connected as he was with what might be called an aquatic county (Lincolnshire), he had some experience in waterworks, and having inspected the works in the park, he felt bound to say that they were well conceived and well executed. As a sanitary matter the improvement was greatly needed. The miasma from the old water was like to be very injurious to all who had to live near. For instance, the valuable lives of many of Her Majesty's Ministers were in danger, and though, of course, as a Member of the Opposition, he could not be expected to say that it would be difficult to find as good men to fill their places, yet his opposition was to their measures in Parliament, rather than to their health. The water which had been put in was clear and limpid, and any one who would compare it with that which was there before must confess that the improvement which had been effected was very great.

MR. BLACKBURN said, he also hoped the Amendment would be withdrawn. At the same time he would beg to call the attention of the Committee to the large amount of money voted. Any amount they gave would be spent, but they ought to give a limited amount, and not allow it to be exceeded. The sum was increasing at a rate that they could not afford if they reduced the taxation next year. In 1851 the sum asked for this purpose was only £41,000; in the first year of the right hon. Gentleman's accession to office it had risen to £115,000. Let them take the average of a series of years and fix it at that amount. There was an increase of 66 per cent within five years. He had a great mind to propose an Amendment to reduce the amount in accordance with that Vote. An hon. Gentleman opposite had an Amendment against the Vote for Battersea Park, and here the forms of the House stood very much in the way. If he proposed such an Amendment as he was suggesting what was to become of the hon. Member opposite? He did not object to the maintenance of the existing parks, but he did think the whole country ought not to be taxed for these parks for London. There was a talk of the formation of a new park in the north of London, but he trusted that the expense of its creation would not be thrown on the public at large. All other towns paid for their own parks, and so ought London.

MR. BENTINCK said, that the principle he had to contend for was that money ought not to be spent in ornamental and useless purposes, when it was required for more urgent purposes. As the feeling of the Committee seemed to be against him he should withdraw his Amendment.

Motion by leave withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. GROGAN said, that seeing an item of £8,069 in the Estimate for Battersea Park, he wished to ask if it was intended to charge a toll for passing over the bridge which led to that Park?

SIR BENJAMIN HALL replied that the toll was imposed by a clause in the Act of 1847, under the sanction of which the bridge from Chelsea to Battersea was erected, and it was impossible to forego that toll unless Parliament should pass an Act to repeal that clause.

MR. BLACKBURN said, he should move, for the reasons he had already stated to reduce the Vote by £17,916, which sum being deducted from the Vote proposed (£75,781) would leave the Vote £57,865.

MR. DILLWYN said, that if the hon. Member's Motion should be rejected he should then move to reduce the Vote by the sum proposed to be granted for Battersea Park.

MR. ALCOCK said, he thought it right and just, as there were parks in other parts of London, that there should also be one at Battersea for South London; but he objected to placing a toll bar at Chelsea Bridge to impede the peoples' enjoyment of the new park. If care were not taken, there would be excited in the metropolis as violent a feeling against these tollbars as had been manifested in the Rebecca riots of South Wales some years ago. Besides, the imposition of the toll would be a financial mistake, as it would injure the neighbouring property to a greater amount than would be gained by the impost.

MR. BENTINCK reminded the Committee that the question involved in the Vote on which a division was about to be taken was, whether or not the whole of Great Britain and Ireland was to be taxed for the luxuries of the city of London.

MR. P. O'BRIEN wished to know whether this expenditure for the parks was to be continuous? He thought this expenditure, which was to be defrayed by Ireland, Scotland, and the various counties of England, extremely extravagant, and he would call upon the hon. Member for Lambeth (Mr. Williams), as peculiarly the guardian of the public purse in that House, to say whether he was prepared to consent to an annual expenditure of £8,000 for a park which nobody cared anything about, and which was in fact useless.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £57,865, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray, to the 31st day of March 1858, the Expense of maintaining and keeping in repair the Royal Parks, Pleasure Grounds, &c., and other Charges connected therewith."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 66; Noes 210: Majority 144.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. DILLWYN said, he should now move that the Vote be reduced by £8,069 14s., being a Vote for the maintenance of Battersea Park. The question was whether the country was or was not to be saddled with the maintenance of a park which ought to be kept up by the inhabitants of the district in which it was situated.

SIR BENJAMIN HALL said, Battersea Park was purchased and laid out under an Act of Parliament, and he had done all in his power to get it brought into a state in which it would be available for the purposes intended. It would soon be in a condition to receive the population of that part of the metropolis, and now his hon. Friend stepped forward and proposed to strike out the Vote necessary for its maintenance. The inhabitants in the neighbourhood could not be asked to keep up the park. It was a property belonging to the State, having been purchased by the authority of Parliament, and the State must of course maintain it.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, that he hoped measures would be taken to remove the toll on the bridge at Battersea, so as to enable the inhabitants on the north side of the river to go over to the park free. What Parliament had done Parliament could undo. It was absurd to keep the people out of a park which had been expressly formed for them.

MR. HENLEY said, that, upon the general principle, he was disposed to agree with the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn); still, as the park was the property of the public, and not under the control of the Metropolitan Board of Works, he could not see how otherwise it was to be given up. As for throwing open Battersea Bridge, while he had no doubt that ought to be done, he would remind hon. Gentlemen that they must be prepared simultaneously to open the bridges on either sides of it, for they were equally toll bridges. They should also remember that if it were opened to the public all the traffic from both sides of the river would pass through the park, and the roads would consequently be completely cut up. He was opposed to tolls, but if this bridge were thrown open to the public he considered that it ought to be maintained by the counties of Surrey and Middlesex.

MR. TITE asked whether the proceeds of the surplus property connected with the new park, a portion of which had recently been sold to a railway company, could not be applied to the reduction of the charge upon the public, with the view of rendering the bridge toll free?

SIR BENJAMIN HALL replied that certain portions of the property at Battersea Park were to be thrown open to the public, but about 125 acres, forming a most valuable estate, would be sold or let, and he had within the last few days disposed of about thirty acres upon terms most advantageous to the public.

MR. P. O'BRIEN said, he must object to the poor taxpayers of the country being called upon to contribute to the establishment and maintenance of metropolitan parks, and also express his belief that such proposals as that under consideration were attributable to the fact that the President of the Board of Works was a metropolitan Member.

Motion made, and Question, "That a sum, not exceeding £67,711 6s., be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray, to the 31st day of March 1858, the Expense of maintaining and keeping in repair the Royal Parks, Pleasure Grounds, &c., and other Charges connected therewith," put, and negatived.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY begged once more to impress upon the right hon. Baronet (Sir B. Hall) the necessity of excluding cows from Hyde Park as had been already done in Regent's Park.

MR. MACKINNON (Rye) called attention to a petition which he had recently presented from 200 persons residing near the Marble Arch, Hyde Park, complaining of the erection of another lodge in that park; and urged the right hon. Baronet at the head of the Board of Works to comply with the request of the petitioners that such a building might not be erected.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE observed that he lived in the neighbourhood of the Marble Arch, and he considered that the opposition of the petitioners was most ridiculous.

SIR BENJAMIN HALL said, that when the petitioners complained that the Commissioners of Public Works were about to erect in a public lodge certain public conveniences of various descriptions, and that they begged to be protected against this outrage upon public decency, as such accommodation was not required in the locality—they spoke only for themselves.

Vote agreed to.

House resumed. Resolutions to be reported on Monday next; Committee to sit again on Monday next.

ROCHDALE ELECTION—PRIVILEGE.

The SERJEANT-AT-ARMS reported that Peter Johnson and John Lord had been served with the Order of the House; that John Lord was in attendance, but that Peter Johnson was not in attendance, pursuant to the said Order.

MR. H. BERKELEY wished, before the person in attendance was called in, to ask a question of the Speaker upon a point of form. He found, from the Rules and Regulations of the House, that no Member could examine witnesses except through the medium of the Speaker, and he wished to know whether that regulation was to be adhered to?

MR. SPEAKER: In answer to the question of the hon. Member, I have to say that he has correctly stated the effect of the rule in question; but it has been the custom to allow a degree of latitude for the convenience of the House, and questions put directly by Members have been supposed to be put through the Speaker.

SIR GEORGE GREY: I understand that your order, Sir, has been served upon John Lord, who is in attendance, although Johnson is not. I have, therefore, to move that you, Sir, do issue your warrant that Peter Johnson be taken into custody.

Motion put, and agreed to.

VOL. CXLVI. [THIRD SERIES.]

Ordered, That Peter Johnson, having been served with the Order of this House to attend the House forthwith, and having neglected to attend, be taken into the custody of the Serjeant-at-Arms attending this House, and that Mr. Speaker do issue his warrant accordingly.

SIR GEORGE GREY: As John Lord is in attendance, I beg to move that he be now called in, and that the Speaker do explain to him the nature of the charge which has been made against him, and which, if proved, will amount to a breach of the privileges of this House, and that the said John Lord be informed he is at liberty to make any statement.

Motion put, and agreed to.

Ordered, That John Lord be called in.

Then the said John Lord being called in, was examined at the bar, as follows:—

MR. SPEAKER: John Lord, a statement has been made to this House that yesterday one Peter Johnson offered to one Abraham Rothwell the sum of £50 to induce him to go to New Orleans in order to avoid giving evidence before the Rochdale Election Committee, and that you, John Lord, were present when such offer was made, and endeavoured to induce Abraham Rothwell to accept it. Have you anything to say in answer to such statement?

Witness: I never attempted to induce him to go.

MR. SPEAKER: Have you anything further to say in answer to the statement that has been made?

Witness: I did hear him say if he wished to go away he would pay his outfit as far as £50. That was all I heard him say.

MR. SPEAKER: Whom did you hear say so?

Witness: Peter Johnson.

The witness was then ordered to withdraw, but to remain in attendance until the pleasure of the House should be made known.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: I understand the person in attendance, John Lord, to have said in substance that he never did induce nor attempt to induce Abraham Rothwell to accept any money; but that he heard Peter Johnson offer to Rothwell the sum of £50 to go abroad to New Orleans. I beg to suggest to the House that the question now occurs whether any further inquiry shall be pursued by the House itself or adopted in some other form. If the House undertakes the duty of pursuing such an inquiry, I think it must be aware of the difficulty of managing such an investigation. As to the party now in attendance, I should deprecate any further questions being put to him, because, to a certain extent, he appears to be a party to the charge. He has in some degree denied that charge; but if the House shall determine itself to continue the inquiry, I think the person in attendance should be cautioned that he may decline to answer questions that may tend to criminate himself. But, upon the whole, I would humbly suggest to the House, that if it thinks fit to pursue this matter further, the whole subject should be referred to a Select Committee for investigation. That was the course adopted on former similar occasions when statements had been made to this House of conduct amounting to a contempt and breach of the privileges of this House, and I believe that is the only manner in which inquiries of this description can be satisfactorily conducted. I therefore move that further inquiry into the subject of the charge preferred by Abraham Rothwell against John Lord and Peter Johnson, contained in the petition of John Newall, be referred to a Select Committee, with the usual directions to examine witnesses as to the truth of such charge.

MR. HENLEY: I think the course suggested by the hon. and learned Gentleman is the most convenient one that can be adopted. It would certainly be very inconvenient to pursue the inquiry by this House.

MR. SERJEANT KINGLAKE said that, as a matter of justice to the absent, a full inquiry should take place, and he thought the course proposed would be by far the most convenient.

MR. CHEETHAM also supported the Motion.

MR. BOWYER begged the Speaker to inform the House, whether the course which had been recommended by the Attorney General was or was not according to precedent? No doubt in ordinary criminal proceedings it was right that an accused person should be cautioned; but he contended that it had never been the practice of the House to caution persons called to its bar against replying to questions the answers to which might criminate themselves. It would be narrowing the powers and privileges of the House to subject it to the same strict rules which prevailed in the ordinary courts of justice.

The Attorney General

MR. SPEAKER stated that the course proposed by the Attorney General was in accordance with what took place upon a former occasion somewhat similar to the present.

MR. BOWYER reminded the House, that in the case of the Duke of York certain persons called to the bar were undoubtedly asked questions the answers to which might have criminated themselves, and yet, if his memory served him, no caution was addressed to those witnesses how they replied to such questions. Horne Tooke, also, when he was called to the bar, was asked whether he was the author of an alleged libel; but no caution was addressed to him upon that occasion. By an ingenious device, however, he certainly did baffle the House. He said, "Do you ask me that question as a party or as a witness?" The Speaker replied, "As a party;" upon which Horne Tooke said, "Then, Sir, I plead 'not guilty,' and put myself upon my country." Thus he baffled the inquiry; but still no caution was addressed to him not to criminate himself. If the House were to adopt the proposition of the Attorney General, and hold itself bound by the same strict rules which prevailed in ordinary judicial proceedings, it would to a considerable extent narrow its powers and privileges; and to narrow the powers of that House, which was the great inquest of the nation, would be a very dangerous course, and one which ought not to be taken without the most mature deliberation. He would suggest, therefore, that an inquiry should be instituted into the precedents, and that in the meantime no step should be taken in the direction indicated by the Attorney General.

MR. CHEETHAM asked, whether the witness who had left the bar was in custody?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he conceived that in all matters touching its privileges the House was not bound to abstain from instituting any examination which it might be pleased to undertake, or from requiring an answer to any question which it might think proper to put. But when there was an inquiry touching a matter which not only involved a breach of the privileges of the House, but which might also amount to a crime at common law, the House out of indulgence, as it were, and from compassionate consideration for the persons called to its bar—not recognizing any right or claim on their part—had been in the habit of telling them that they were under no obligation to reply to any questions the answer to which might criminate themselves. He entirely agreed with the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Bowyer), that the powers and prerogatives of that House should be preserved inviolate. With respect to the question of the hon. Member for Lancashire (Mr. Cheetham), it was unquestionably desirable that some steps should be taken to ensure that the person who had left the bar should attend before the Select Committee; but he was not prepared to say that the House was in a position at present to order him into custody.

MR. BOWYER rose to address the House, but he was received with cries of "Spoke," and

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. and learned Gentleman was not at liberty to make a second speech.

MR. BOWYER then moved the adjournment of the House, with the view of putting himself in order; but

MR. SPEAKER said, that the hon. and learned Gentleman, having already addressed the House, could not be permitted, according to the usage of the House, himself to move the adjournment.

Motion agreed to.

Select Committee appointed "to inquire into the matter of the Petition of John Newall, and to report their opinion thereupon to the House."

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That John Lord do attend the said Committee." (Mr. Attorney General.)

MR. CHEETHAM said that, from information he had received, it appeared to be of the utmost importance that John Lord should be detained in custody.

MR. BOWYER intimated his intention to move that the proceedings in this case should be entered upon the journals of the House, in order that it might not be drawn into a precedent, and that the powers of the House with respect to the examination of witnesses might not be narrowed.

MR. MALINS thought it might be dangerous to allow Lord to go at large until the meeting of the Select Committee. He was to some extent implicated in the transaction of which complaint had been made to the House.

MR. CHEETHAM then moved an Amendment, to leave out from the words "John Lord" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "be taken into the custody of the Serjeant-at-Arms attending this House."

Question proposed, "That the words

SIR GEORGE GREY doubted whether the statements before the House would justify it in ordering Lord into custody. That person himself had not pleaded guilty to a breach of the privileges of the House. It might, therefore, be desirable to call him again and interrogate him upon the allegation of the witness Abraham Rothwell, that he was the person who requested him to meet Johnson, and endeavoured to induce him to accept the bribe. If his answers were not satisfactory upon that point, there might possibly then be grounds for taking him into custody. At present there were none.

MR. FITZROY said, that before they could agree to the Amendment, they must decide that John Lord had been guilty of a breach of privilege; otherwise they would be placed in the anomalous position of ordering a man into custody against whom there was no charge.

MR. HORSMAN suggested that Lord should be heard again, and if, by his answers, it appeared that he had been the medium of communication between Johnson and Rothwell, he would be guilty of breach of privilege, and might be taken into custody.

MR. BUTT said, that when a person was charged with a contempt in a court of law, the court examined him for the purpose of ascertaining whether he had been guilty of the contempt or not; and he apprehended that that House was armed with no higher powers than a court of law. The first thing that would be necessary was, to ascertain the fact, and if the hon. Member (Mr. Cheetham) would withdraw his Amendment, he would move that John Lord be recalled.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL reminded the House that this man was not a witness, but an accused party. Having determined that a Committee should be appointed, it would be rather inconsistent in the House now to take the inquiry into its own hands. The question was, whether the House had sufficient grounds for ordering the accused person into custody on the statement of Abraham Rothwell. That statement had been denied by the individual at the bar, and he did not think there was a necessity for any further measures at present besides ordering him to attend the Committee.

MR. CHEETHAM said he was willing to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. SPEAKER said, the question now before the House was, that John Lord attend before the Select Committee.

MR. BUTT moved that John Lord be recalled to the bar. Every step the House was then taking would be made a precedent which might affect the rights and privileges of the House. It was most important to maintain their rights to examine any person called to the bar, and as the hon. Member for Lancashire had expressed a desire to put a question, he should either be allowed to do so, or the House resolve not to do so out of consideration to the witness, at the same time securing its rights. He begged to move as an Amendment, that John Lord be recalled to the bar.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the words "John Lord" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "be recalled to the bar."

MR. CHEETHAM had been anxious to put a question which might criminate the individual; but, after the opinion of the Attorney General, he scarcely felt himself justified in so doing. There was a suspicion that Johnson had got out of the way, never to be seen again, and that Lord would follow a similar course.

MR. MALINS thought it better, upon the whole, to let the man be examined before the Select Committee.

MR. ADAMS said, that a grave charge of breach of the privileges of the House had been made against two persons; and it would be absurd if both these offenders got out of the way. Lord ought, he thought, to be again put to the bar; but, before the question was put to him, it would only be fair, either that he should hear the charge repeated by the man who made it, or else that the evidence against him should be read from the shorthand writer's notes.

MR. SERJEANT KINGLAKE thought it inexpedient, as the House had appointed a Committee, to enter into a partial inquiry of the person accused, whether he were guilty or not.

MR. DILLWYN asked the Attorney General how he proposed to secure the attendance of this witness? It struck him (Mr. Dillwyn) that he would not be forthcoming when the Committee met.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he proposed to secure his attendance by the Order of the House to attend; and if he did not attend, he would be guilty of a breach of privilege, and be taken into custody. Hon. Members talked about sending the man to prison, but he (the Attorney General) wanted to know what offence had been proved against him, and in what manner, to justify the House in ordering him into custody?

MR. AYRTON apprehended no man could be taken into custody by that House except for a breach of privilege; and before the House issued their warrant for taking him into custody, they must find him guilty of a breach of privilege.

MR. BOWYER said, it was true a person who had not been shown to have committed an offence could not be taken into custody for a breach of privilege; but, if he was accused of a breach of privilege, there must be some means taken to secure his appearance before the Committee; otherwise he might not be forthcoming when he was wanted.

MR. SERJEANT O'BRIEN said, the only object of recalling the man was to enable the hon. Member for Lancashire to put a question: but the hon. Gentleman now declined to put it, and there was therefore no use in recalling the man.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the question."

The House divided:—Ayes, 97; Noes 42: Majority, 55.

Original Question again proposed.

Another Amendment proposed, to add at the end of the Question the words, "upon Monday next, at One of the Clock."

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. STEUART submitted that, as it was not at all unlikely that the witness would keep out of the way, means should be immediately taken to prevent his absconding.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, if the witness disobeyed the order of the House he would be guilty of contempt, and the House would order him into custody.

MR. BUTT said, the Motion before the House was, that John Lord be ordered to attend the Committee on Monday next, but he (Mr. Butt) must remind the House that they had not yet nominated the Committee; and unless they at once agreed to suspend the Standing Orders, he apprehended they could not proceed to nominate the Committee that night. If they could that night suspend the Standing Orders he (Mr. Butt) should move that the Committee meet to-morrow. He thought if they gave the witness two days' liberty, after the warning which he would no doubt take from the discussion that night, the result would be that the whole of this proceeding before the House would be a mockery. He would, therefore, move that the Committee meet to-morrow at One o'clock, and that John Lord be ordered to attend at that hour.

MR. MAGUIRE should like to know what was to prevent Lord from leaving London within a few hours by a railway train, and immediately afterwards sailing for America. The Attorney General would under those circumstances find it difficult to secure his attendance before the Committee.

MR. CRAUFURD thought that, as Lord was an accomplice in the transaction in question, he must be looked upon in the light of an accused person, and not of a witness.

MR. MALINS was strongly of opinion that Lord could not be taken into custody for contempt until he had been found guilty of that offence.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, in reply to the hon. Member for Youghal (Mr. Butt), that the House having agreed to refer the case under their notice to a Select Committee, it was not competent for them to enter upon any inquiry with respect to it themselves while that order remained. To the proposition of the hon. and learned Member that the Committee should sit that day at One o'clock he was disposed to assent, and he should, with that view, beg leave to withdraw his original Motion.

Amendment and Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Ordered, That the Committee do consist of the following Members:—Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, Lord JOHN RUSSELL, Mr. HENLEY, Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND, Mr. HORSMAN, Mr. EDWARD EGERTON, Sir HENRY WILLOUGHBY, Mr. ROEBUCK, Mr. MACAULAY, and Mr. SERJEANT O'BRIEN: Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Five to be the quorum.

Ordered, That the Committee do meet this day at One of the clock.

Ordered, That John Lord do attend the Committee at its meeting at One of the clock this day.

Ordered, That Abraham Rothwell do attend the Committee at its meeting at One of the clock this day.

Ordered, That the Petition of John Newall, and the Evidence taken at the Bar, be referred to the Committee.

OYSTER FISHERIES.

PAPERS MOVED FOR.

SIR GEORGE PECHELL moved for an address for copies of any directions given by the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury, the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, and the Commissioners of the Customs, for giving effect to certain rules or bylaws made by the Committee of Council for Trade on the 21st day of May, 1857, respecting the oyster fisheries in the seas between the British Islands and France, as well as on all parts of the coast of Great Britain, within the British fishery limits.

MR. LOWE assured the hon. and gallant Member that the directions of the Board of Trade to the Customs would not make the regulations respecting the oyster trade more stringent than before the by-laws were instituted.

Motion agreed to.

Address "for Copies of any directions given by the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury, the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, and the Commissioners of the Customs, for giving effect to certain Rules or Bye Laws made by the Committee of Council for Trade on the 21st day of May 1857, respecting the Oyster Fisheries in the Seas between the British Islands and France, as well as on all parts of the Coast of Great Britain within the British Fishery limits."

House adjourned at a quarter after Two o'clock, till Monday next.

OPIUM TRADE WITH CHINA—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, that it would be recollected that some time since he brought before the House the subject of the legality of the opium trade, carried on by the East India Company with China, and the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack promised to take the opinion of the law officers of the Crown on the subject. He begged to ask the noble and learned Lord, whether the question of the legality or illegality of this trade had been submitted to the consideration of the law officers of the Crown, in accordance with the promise which had upon a former occasion been made by the Government; and, if so, when that opinion was likely to be given?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that subsequent to the statement which was made by his noble Friend upon the subject in that House a case was prepared upon which it was proposed that the opinion of the law officers of the Crown should be taken. The case thus prepared was submitted to the authorities at the India House in order to ascertain whether the facts set forth in it were correctly stated. It was found upon communication with the President of the Board of Control that the facts were not considered to be so stated, and the document containing the case was at present under revision. The question had, in consequence, been suspended for a short period, but it was by no means the intention of the Government to delay submitting it to the notice of the law officers of the Crown beyond the time which must necessarily be occupied in endeavouring to secure a correct representation of the facts.

CANNON—QUESTION.

LORD RAVENSWORTH said, he wished to put a question to the noble Lord at the head of the War Department. During the late War in the Crimea, when artillery of a heavy calibre was much required, a firm in this country very patriotically contributed a gun of very large calibre, which, having been proved, was presented by them to the Government, on the condition that it would be employed at a very early opportunity against the enemy. Before it could be so used, however, the war was brought to a close, and he believed the gun was now lying at Shoeburyness. What he wished to know was, whether the noble Lord would have any objection to employ this piece of artillery against an enemy with whom we were now at war in another hemisphere—the Chinese? He saw no reason why this gun should not be employed in hostilities in that country, and he wished to ask the noble Lord if he was prepared to redeem the pledge given by employing this piece of artillery in China? There was another point on which he wished to ask a question. He had been informed that six guns of large calibre, constructed upon a new principle for loading at the breech—a principle which was prohibited by patent—had been purchased in America. The manufacturers in this country considered that those arms might just as well have been cast in this country, and he should be glad if the noble Lord would inform him whether the report was correct.

LORD PANMURE said, that with regard to the first question of the noble Lord no doubt the gun had been presented to the Government—or rather to the country—by the firm in question; but he was not aware that any distinct pledge had been given that it should be used soon against the enemy. It had been intended to so use it, but fortunately the return of peace had prevented that intention being carried into effect. It had not, however, remained in perfect inactivity at Shoeburyness, because a variety of experiments had been made with the view of testing its effects at various ranges and with various charges; though these experiments had been imperfect owing to the difficulty of constructing a carriage for such a piece of ordnance. With regard to using it against the Chinese, it was thought that the ordinary artillery would be sufficient for the purpose of that warfare, and that it would not be desirable to give up a vessel for the purpose of conveying that gun to China. With regard to the other question, the facts were, that an American gentleman had discovered a system for loading guns at the breech, and that system had been referred to the Select Committee appointed to inquire into inventions of that character, and was by them very favourably reported upon, and upon that report the Government had purchased the six guns referred to by the noble Lord. It was quite true that if the inventor had been in England those guns could, with his assistance, have been cast in this country; but they could not be cast without his leave, as the invention was protected by a patent. He was not, however, in this country, and therefore those guns had been purchased in America, and he believed that they would prove of considerable service.

THE CASE OF MR. DIXON.

PAPERS MOVED FOR.

THE EARL OF ALBEMARLE rose to move that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for—

“ A Copy of the Memorial of Frederick Beverley Dixon, Esquire, of Castlewood House, Darrow, Queen’s County, to The Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, delivered to His Excellency on or about the 13th of July, 1854, praying for an Inquiry into the Conduct of David Brudenell Franks, Esquire, Stipendiary Magistrate, who illegally arrested and imprisoned the Memorialist’s Son, a Child of between Six and Seven Years of Age, and committed other Acts contrary to Law in connection with the Prosecution of the Memorialist on a false Charge of Conspiracy to murder one Thomas Brophy, of which Charge he was acquitted at the Spring Assizes at Maryborough in 1854: Also,

“ Copy of the Memorial of the aforesaid F. B. Dixon to the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury, dated 6th December, 1856, praying that the Police Tax of One hundred and seventy-four Pounds Thirteen Shillings and Ninepence, which had been levied on his Property under the Crime and Outrage Act, in consequence of the said false Charge, may be refunded: And also,

The noble Earl said that the case of Mr. Dixon was of great importance to the due administration of justice. Mr. Dixon was a native of Norfolk, and had practised for upwards of eighteen years as a medical man in Norwich, where he married a lady named Gardner, the daughter of a Chancery barrister and one of the magistrates for the county of Westmoreland. Mr. Dixon removed in 1850 to Ireland, for the purpose of engaging in agricultural pursuits, and accordingly rented a farm at Castlewood, in Queen’s County, for that purpose. In the year 1854 he got into an altercation with a peasant tenant named Brophy, which resulted in Mr. Dixon giving him notice to quit. Immediately afterwards Brophy brought a charge against Mr. Dixon of a conspiracy to murder him, by firing at him from behind a hedge, on a certain day in February. Absurd as the charge might appear, it found ready credence with Mr. Franks, one of the stipendiary magistrates, and who, appearing to be convinced of the guilt of Mr. Dixon, thought any means justified the desired end—namely, the conviction of Mr. Dixon. Mr. Dixon had two children, the eldest of whom, a child between six and seven years of age, was accustomed to be taken to school, a distance of about two miles from Castlewood House. On the 20th February, Mr. Franks seized upon the child and conveyed him prisoner to the police barracks at Castle Darrow, and from thence to the county gaol at Maryborough, where he was kept in confinement for seventeen days, in order that he might give evidence to hang his own father and mother. The extraordinary trial took place on the 9th of March, 1854, before the Chief Justice Monaghan, and Mr. and Mrs. Dixon were exposed to the public gaze in the felons’ dock on a charge of conspiracy to murder. It appeared that Brophy was in the habit of wearing a close-fitting cap; but on the day of the occurrence he wore a high crowned hat, which was produced in court. There were two holes through it, and the Chief Justice on examining it found that they had been made from the inside, in the Irish fashion. It would be a waste of time to tell their Lordships that, under these circumstances the jury, without a moment’s hesitation, acquitted the prisoners. In reference to that trial the Lord Chief Baron, in another trial connected with the same business, thus expressed himself—

“ I think no jury could possibly arrive at any other conclusion than that of acquittal. For myself, I have not the slightest shadow of a doubt as to the perfect innocence of Dixon. I have read the information of the child, and I have often before seen extraordinary depositions, but I never saw so extraordinary and incredible a one as this.”

When Mrs. Dixon first heard of the unlawful arrest of her child she became in a frantic state, and went to the barracks to recover him. She was there rudely repulsed by the constables. From that period up to the trial she was kept up by excitement, but immediately afterwards she fell a victim to the persecution she had undergone, and died of a broken heart. Prior to the trial, and also subsequent to it, the magistrates of Castle Darrow, in consequence of this charge against Mr. Dixon, petitioned the Lord Lieutenant to send a party of police to the district, under the Crime and Outrage Act. Accordingly, a police force was sent down, although no crime or outrage had been committed by Mr. Dixon or any other person in the townland, and although there was not a tittle of evidence to show that an increase of the police force in that quarter was necessary. He now wished to call attention to the excessive amount of impost which was laid on Mr. Dixon. The townland comprised 337 acres, 212 of which were in the occupation of Mr. Dixon, and the portion of the rate he had to pay amounted to £34 13s. 9d. a quarter, being equal to the whole amount of the rent. The whole sum which he paid in respect of this impost was £174 13s. 9d. In July, 1854, he petitioned the Lord Lieutenant for an inquiry into the conduct of the stipendiary magistrate, and also for the remission of this tax, which was continued after his acquittal from this false charge. Now, he (the Earl of Albemarle) believed that the Lord Lieutenant at that time (the Earl of St. Germans) was incapable of intentionally doing an injustice to any person, but he believed that he had been ill-advised in this case in refusing both the requests of Mr. Dixon. Mr. Dixon was given to understand that if he had any complaint to make against the stipendiary magistrate he must seek redress in a court of law. He accordingly did bring an action against him; but in consequence of the Orange tinge which spread over the politico-religious sentiments of the good Protestants in that part of Queen's County, he wisely and prudently changed the venue to Dublin. The action was there tried by a special jury, and Mr. Dixon obtained a verdict of £500 against Mr. Franks, the stipendiary magistrate. Mr. Dixon did not now seek any reparation against that gentleman, but he wished to have refunded the sum of £174 13s. 9d., with which he contended he had been unjustly charged, under the Crime and Outrage Act. This year an application had been made to the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury to that effect, but it had been refused without any reason being assigned for the refusal. It was with the view of giving some Member of the Government an opportunity of making a statement that he (the Earl of Albemarle) had brought the subject under the notice of their Lordships. The noble Earl concluded by moving the Address for the Papers referred to.

THE EARL OF ST. GERMANS thanked his noble Friend for giving notice of his Motion, as it had enabled him to refresh his memory as to the particulars of the case. So far from complaining of the Motion, or the speech by which it was accompanied, he thought that if, as his noble Friend believed, Mr. Dixon was an aggrieved person, he had done no more than his duty in placing his case for redress before the House; and he had submitted that case to their Lordships in a speech characterized by great forbearance and discretion, as well as by a friendly spirit. It was unnecessary to advert to all the circumstances of the accusation against Mr. Dixon, as the noble Earl did not ask that further proceedings should be taken against Mr. Franks, his sole object being to obtain a reimbursement of the money of which he believed he had been mulcted on account of the extra police force in his neighbourhood, and he (Earl St. Germans) would therefore confine himself to that point. He must say, however, that he thought it was hardly fair to Mr. Franks to make this serious charge against him when he had no opportunity of defending himself. He really believed that Mr. Franks was not actuated in this matter by any unworthy motives. He was a magistrate of great experience, intelligence, and integrity, and totally unprejudiced against Mr. Dixon. But he (Earl St. Germans) wished to show, by reading extracts from certain papers he held in his hands, their Lordships that he did not exercise the discretionary power with which the Lord Lieutenant was vested by the Crime and Outrage Act on insufficient grounds in this particular instance. The first document he would refer to was a resolution agreed to at a public meeting of the magistrates of Queen's County, held at Castle Darrow on February 3, 1854, and presided over by the Lord Lieutenant of the county, Lord de Vesci. That resolution related the circumstances of Brophy of Castlewood being fired at on his way home between eight and nine o'clock at night, and requested the Government to offer a reward for the apprehension of the guilty party; and in consequence of the danger in which the man's life was placed from the threats which had at various times been made to him, strongly recommended the Government to send a party of police to the locality, under the Crime and Outrage Act, to be chargeable on the townland, but suggesting that Thomas Brophy should be exempted from that charge. The magistrates who signed that resolution included Lord Ashbrook, Mr. Deasy, M.P., and others. The Irish Government also received a memorial from

Mr. Dixon, protesting against this measure, and a second one from another party, and these were transmitted to the Lord Lieutenant of the county, Lord de Vesci, who returned answer that he had carefully examined them, and that he entirely differed from most of the allegations of Mr. Dixon; that he held an investigation in conjunction with the magistrates, and, after a long and searching inquiry, they were fully convinced that such an outrage had taken place, and that a shot had been fired at Brophy with intent to take away his life; and his Lordship added that nothing had since taken place to alter his opinion upon the point; and his Lordship repudiated, in the strongest manner, Mr. Dixon's charge that the magistrates had desired the police force to be sent from personal feelings against him. On the 13th of July, in the same year, after the trial he (the Earl of St. Germans) received a deputation consisting of Mr. Dixon and other parties in favour of withdrawing the additional police force in the district; and his answer to them was that it would not be consistent with his duty in preserving the public peace to comply with their request, and that it was a satisfaction to him to find that he was confirmed in that view by the opinions of the Lord Lieutenant of the county, and all the county magistrates, including those resident in the district, as well as by those of the law officers of the Crown, and the Judge who tried the case. On the 24th of August following, Mr. Franks, the resident magistrate, wrote saying the necessity for an extra police force still continued; and on the 24th of December, 1856, nearly three years after this proceeding, he sent another letter to the same effect, and up to the present day it had not been thought expedient by the Government to remove the force. These facts would at least show that he (Earl St. Germans) did not act capriciously, nor in an arbitrary manner, but obtained the best information he could on the subject, and acted upon that information to the best of his judgment. He might mention, also, that although the production of these papers was ordered on the 20th of July, 1854, by the House of Commons, on the Motion of Mr. O'Brien, and were laid on the table on the 13th of August in the same year, up to the present moment, neither that hon. Member nor any other hon. Member had moved that they should be printed. As to the Motion of the noble Earl, he would neither oppose nor support it, being perfectly content to leave the matter to be dealt with by their Lordships as they should think fit.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE said, he thought the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Albemarle) ought to have informed himself more accurately as to the facts before he cast wholesale on so respectable and honourable a body of men as the magistrates of the Queen's County, imputations of this serious nature—imputations which he defied him to prove. As to Mr. Franks, he believed that gentleman to be entirely incapable of the conduct which had been laid to his charge; but what he wished to ask the noble Earl who had spoken last was, whether the Government had paid the damages and costs in the action for false imprisonment, in which Mr. Dixon had recovered £500, because, if they had done so, they adopted the conduct of Mr. Franks and completely exonerated him.

THE EARL OF ST. GERMANS said, that, speaking to the best of his recollection, he believed that the costs and damages were paid by the Government, who believed that Mr. Franks had acted honestly according to the best of his judgment. As regarded the child, he was placed in the charge of the wife of the governor of the prison, in order that he might be separated from his parents.

THE EARL OF EGLINTON wished to know out of what fund the damages were paid? There was a fund in Ireland called "the secret service money" at the disposal of the Lord Lieutenant, and that probably was the fund called upon for the purpose.

THE EARL OF ST. GERMANS believed the money was paid by the Government out of that fund, but not having had notice of the question he was unable to answer it exactly.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE suggested that if the practice was to be that the Government should pay the damages and costs when a magistrate exceeded his duty and a verdict went against him, it ought to be generally known, and the same rule should be applicable to England as well as to Ireland. He hoped the papers would be laid on the table, that they might be able to form a more correct opinion upon the merits of the case.

EARL GRANVILLE said, there was no objection to the production of all the papers relating to the subject.

Motion agreed to.

THIRD REPORT OF THE STATUTE LAW COMMISSION—BILLS PRESENTED.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he had to call the attention of their Lordships to a subject very different from that with which they had just been occupied, but one of very great importance—namely, the Third Report of the Statute Law Commission; and he should conclude the observations he had to make by asking their Lordships to give a first reading to eight Bills, the object of each of which was the consolidation into a single statute of the whole of the law relating to an important portion of the Criminal law, and which were now dispersed over a great number of statutes. These Bills had been prepared by the Members of the Commission appointed in 1854 for the purpose of considering the expediency and possibility of consolidating the statute law of this country. This was a subject that had at all times occupied the attention of lawyers, and one which had been considered of the utmost importance from the earliest times of our legal history. It had been pointed out by Bacon, Coke, and Hale as one that the Legislature ought in some way or other to undertake. But all their recommendations ended in nothing. Finally, about forty years ago—in 1816—a Resolution was passed by their Lordships' House in favour of this work being undertaken, and carried into execution by our most distinguished lawyers. That Resolution was communicated to the other House in it; that House expressed its entire concurrence. There however, he regretted—or rather he was ashamed—to say, the matter ended, for no steps were taken to remedy the evil. If, however, that was an evil forty years ago, he need not say that in our day the evil had become infinitely more pressing; for there were every year added to the statute book from 100 to 150 Acts, so that no lawyer, even the most profound, ever pretended that he was able to make himself master of all the statutes of the realm. In order to remedy this state of things, in the year 1854 the Crown issued a Commission directed to a number of distinguished lawyers for the purpose of investigating the whole question. The first point which the Commission took into consideration was the different modes by which the object they had in view might be attained; and finally they came to the conclusion that it was better far to attempt to do something than to speculate on what might be the best manner of curing the evil. The difficulties which they had to encounter were undoubtedly enormous. It was suggested that they should at once proceed to systematize and consolidate some portion of the law. That appeared plausible, and no doubt was the correct mode of framing a code of laws; but then the duty laid on the Commission was not to frame a code of laws, but to consolidate the law as it now existed. After various discussions, and having attempted in the first instance to take up what were called groups of statutes, and made some progress in that work, they found that it would not do, and that the only way to make any impression on the statute book was to take different subjects and consolidate all the laws relating to each of those subjects. This was not only attended with great difficulty, but with great danger. If they knew that any specified statutes contained all the provisions relating to a given subject, the task would have been easy; but there was not a single subject to which their attention was likely to be directed which was not probably treated of in many enactments; and it was impossible to be sure that every statute, or part of a statute, relating to a subject could be found and consolidated, and that some would not remain undiscovered, and, therefore, unconsolidated. In order, therefore, to proceed with certainty the Commission employed some gentlemen of great information and research to commence a register of the statutes, beginning with the statutes of the previous year, taking statute by statute and clause by clause of every statute, from chapter I of last Session to the end. These Gentlemen went to work, marking every enactment and every section, and every previous enactment to which any section referred, either in the way of repeal or modification. This implied great labour; but he was satisfied, in common with most eminent lawyers, that if the Statute Law Commission had done nothing else but complete this work they would have done something that was extremely valuable, for without such a process it would be impossible to make any progress in the consolidation of the law. It would now, however, be possible to publish an edition of the statutes containing all the enactments actually in force. But beyond that it would scarcely be believed how much that process had reduced the statute book in bulk. With the assistance of a very learned Member of the Bar the Commissioners then proceeded to divide the statutes into classes. He might remind their Lordships that there was a class of statutes which the public in general had very little to do with except in the year in which they were passed—those relating to the army and navy, passed every year, and some relating to the revenue and financial subjects. They next proceeded to divide statutes into classes ranged according to the extent of their operation, those relating to the United Kingdom being placed in one class, those applying to England alone in another, and so on, making in all thirteen classes. In that operation they had not proceeded beyond Her Majesty's reign; but of the Acts passed during the last twenty years it was found that one-third did not form what might properly be called the law of the country, such as the Appropriation Act, and all acts the force of which expired after a limited period. Taking out those statutes, the Commissioners proceeded to ascertain how many of the remainder applied to the United Kingdom. They found that only one-third so applied; and therefore three-fourths of the statutes which had been passed during the twenty years of Her Majesty's reign could form no portion of the statute law book if that book were to consist merely of laws which regulated the conduct of Her Majesty's lieges. The Commission had not gone further back than Her Majesty's reign; but when the operation was extended it would be found that the numbers of statutes to be excluded would be continually increasing, and the labour of consolidation be as continually diminishing; but still they could not be sure of embodying all the statutes upon each subject until they had gone through all the statutes from Victoria to Magna Charta. It might, then, be said that the examination not having been concluded no consolidation could be made. The commissioners had considered that point, and had come to the conclusion that upon some subjects of a popular nature, of which consolidation would be eminently useful, it would be undesirable to postpone action, merely because some prior enactments might possibly be overlooked. They had therefore selected a number of subjects, as to which it appeared probable that the consolidation would be perfect. Amongst these, acting upon the recommendation of a Committee of their Lordships' House in 1854, that the formation of a criminal code should be postponed, but that a consolidation should be effected, they had taken the criminal law. Besides the criminal law, they selected several other subjects in which they considered consolidation could be made tolerably perfect, depending as they did upon recent statutes, such as the laws relating to bills of exchange, to patents, to ecclesiastical leases, savings banks, &c. In all they had consolidated sixty-five statutes, besides nine others, which were now in the hands of the gentlemen who assisted the Commission. It must be understood that although the Commission employed the most skilled draughtsmen they could find, yet they had not asked Parliament to sanction any Bills which had not been gone through with the utmost care by those members of the Commission best qualified to judge of their merits. The Bills relating to the criminal law had been gone through by the noble and learned Lord Chief Justice, by the late Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, by a gentleman who was of the utmost assistance to the Commission, Mr. Greaves, and by Sir FitzRoy Kelly. These Bills he laid upon the table at the close of the last Session; but in the interval before reintroducing them this Session, it occurred to him that improvements might be made in them. They had been framed to include all indictable offences, but some offences became indictable after one or two previous summary convictions, and he thought it would be better to alter the shape of the Bills, and make them relate to offences whether indictable or punishable by some other mode. He (the Lord Chancellor) had gone through the Bills with Mr. Greaves, and he now asked their Lordships to read them a first time. They did not include all the subjects embraced in the Bills of last year, some of which he thought could be deferred without much inconvenience, especially criminal procedure, which ought not to be dealt with pending the inquiries now being made by the Government in consequence of an Address presented last Session to Her Majesty by the House of Commons upon the subject of the department of criminal justice. They had also postponed dealing with the subject of treason and offences against the State, which were not of a pressing nature. The eight Bills which he now asked the House to read a first time related to—1. Offences against the Person; 2. Larceny; 3. Malicious Injuries to Property; 4. Libel; 5. Forgery; 6. Coinage Offences; 7. Accessories and Abettors; 8. The Game Laws; which, although relating to a species of larceny, it had been thought best to deal with in a separate Bill. If he were asked whether those Bills were mere consolidations, he must reply that they were not; for the Commissioners had not felt themselves justified in overlooking the decision of the House in 1854, that in any Bills which might be prepared it was desirable that the Amendments that had been suggested by the Criminal Law Commissioners, and which had met with universal approval, should be embodied. Those alterations, he thought, would lead to no difference of opinion. Such, then, were the Bills which he proposed to lay on the table. There were several others quite ready to be laid before Parliament, but he thought it would be more convenient that they should be introduced in the other House. He thought he ought to tell their Lordships further that in proceeding with their work the Commissioners had come to several conclusions different from those to which they had arrived when they first considered the subject. It was felt that there were many ancient statutes, for example, which could not and ought not to be consolidated. It would be ridiculous pedantry to consolidate Magna Charta, the Act Quia Emptores, and other old statutes of the same class, which formed the basis rather than the superstructure of the statute law. The Commissioners had therefore come to the conclusion that with regard to all statutes of that sort they could do nothing in the way of consolidation. There were also a number of statutes expressed in such curious language and framed in so different a style from that of modern times, that if the Commissioners were simply to consolidate them, retaining as much as possible the old language, they would produce a piece of patchwork which it would not be creditable to lay before Parliament. One of the subjects to which that observation applied was the law relating to landlord and tenant, upon which a Bill had been prepared with singular care and skill by Mr. Bissett, a gentleman of some standing at the bar. There had been enactments upon the relations between landlord and tenant from the time of the Plantagenets down to the reign of Queen Victoria, and the Commissioners found that to consolidate all these into one statute would involve their being entirely re-

written, if it were desired to have the language harmonious throughout. Moreover, the language of the greater part of them had received a judicial construction, and there was great danger that in modernizing it the Commissioners might not be able to adhere to that construction. There were a great number of other statutes which, though comparatively modern, had yet been amended by one or two subsequent Acts, but in which the alterations were so few or unimportant that it would be a waste of time to consolidate them, either alone or in connection with the amending statutes. For example, in 1838 was passed an Act regulating the mode of framing, and in some respects of construing wills; but in consequence of some difficulties which arose in carrying it into operation a few years afterwards an amending Bill was introduced and carried through Parliament. He was not sure whether, in consolidating the law relating to real property, the Commissioners had consolidated these two statutes, or not; but they certainly came to the conclusion that it would be absurd pedantry to consolidate such modern statutes of that sort as had but few additions made to them, thinking it better that the original statute and the subsequent Act amending it should be taken together. So with respect to the statute abolishing fines and recoveries. Again, there were a number of statutes which could not be repealed, and yet which it would be equally absurd to consolidate. The Wills Act, which he had already mentioned, afforded a good illustration of his meaning. Before the passing of that Act in 1838 there was a law of Charles II. which regulated, up to that time, the formalities necessary with respect to wills. That law must still remain in force with regard to all wills made before 1838, but it would be hardly worth while to consolidate it. So with respect to the Tithe Commutation Act, which was fast working itself out, and which it would, therefore, be a waste of time to consolidate. There were other statutes in the same position; but after all deductions there still remained a very great number of subjects which the Commissioners had no difficulty in dealing with, and with which they were determined to proceed until their labours were concluded. He did not think that he could usefully occupy the time of their Lordships by stating more in detail the course which the Commissioners had been pursuing. It had been said that the Statute Law Commission had done nothing at all. If it was meant that they had introduced no Bills which had become law the statement was perfectly true. They could not possibly have done so. The difficulties had been great, but he trusted that they had now found their way to do good service; and if their Lordships would render their assistance in laying before the public that which would at all events be a useful specimen of the labours of the Commissioners, he was in hopes that in the course of a few years they might be able to reduce the forty or fifty volumes of statutes now in existence to ten, two, or three. The noble and learned Lord concluded by presenting the following eight Bills:—

A Bill to consolidate the Statute Law of England relating to Offences against the Person [Offences against the Person Bill].

A Bill to consolidate the Statute Law of England relating to Larceny and other similar Offences [Larceny, &c. Bill].

A Bill to consolidate the Statute Law of England relating to malicious Injuries to Property [Malicious Injuries to Property Bill].

A Bill to consolidate the Statute Law of England and Ireland relating to Libel [Libel Bill].

A Bill to consolidate the Statute Law of England relating to indictable Offences by Forgery [Forgery Bill].

A Bill to consolidate and amend the Laws against Offences relating to the Coin [Coinage Offences Bill].

A Bill to consolidate the Statute Law of England and Ireland relating to Accessories to and Abettors of Indictable Offences [Accessories and Abettors Bill].

A Bill to consolidate the Statute Law of England relating to Deer, Game, and Rabbits [Deer, Game, and Rabbits Bill].

LORD BROUGHAM said, he entirely approved the course which had been taken by his noble and learned Friend. Great misrepresentations had been made with respect to the Statute Law Commission, and he was glad that his noble and learned Friend had described exactly what the Commissioners had done and how far their labours of consolidation had proceeded. He was not prepared at that moment to go into the several subjects which had been broached by his noble and learned Friend, but he could not help remarking that the consolidation of the statute law apart from the consolidation of the common law was open to serious objection. There were many important parts of the law under its different heads which were not contained in the statutes, and to tell the people that they had to obey the latter only was merely to mislead and deceive them. The statement of the noble and learned Lord as to the value of the services of the Commissioners was by no means exaggerated, and if he were asked to mention one or two of the Commissioners who were more especially entitled to the thanks of the country, he would mention the names of Mr. Bellenden Ker, Mr. Coulson, and Sir FitzRoy Kelly.

LORD CAMPBELL said, he had no hesitation in concurring with his noble and learned Friend in approbation of the course adopted by the noble Lord on the woolsack, and he was sure their Lordships would willingly give these Bills a first reading. But he hoped the noble and learned Lord would be contented with that during the present Session, because it was desirable to see the work of consolidation as a whole, and to detect inaccuracies which, even with the utmost care, might still be discovered. He had never doubted that the whole statute law might be consolidated, but such statutes as that of the reign of Edward III. with regard to treason ought to be given in ipsissimis verbis in which they were originally enacted—it would evidently be most unwise to attempt to consolidate them.

The said Bills were then severally read 1<sup>a</sup>.

ROMAN CATHOLIC CHARITIES.

RETURN MOVED FOR.

LORD ABINGER said, that in moving for the Return of which he had given notice, he must in the first place disclaim any disrespect towards the members of the Roman Catholic persuasion, who had been educated in the faith of their forefathers. He must, however, be permitted to say that he thought the Bill which stood on the paper for Second Reading to-morrow (the Roman Catholic Charities Bill) was likely to raise questions similar to those which had recently caused so much agitation in Belgium. There would, he thought, be little difficulty in furnishing the returns for which he was about to move, while he believed that their production would be of the utmost importance in order to enable the Government to legislate upon the subject of Roman Catholic charities with advantage. He was strongly the advocate of inquiry previous to legislation being entered upon, and he felt assured that the Government would act wisely in postponing the Bill he had referred to until such inquiry had taken place, and until they should be in a position to introduce a measure of a general nature, regulating the acquisition of property held in trust for the use of Roman Catholic and Protestant charities alike. It was most desirable, in his opinion, that the acquisition of such property should be fenced round with those precautions and safeguards which would prevent it from being turned to the advantage of insidious and designing persons, and he must contend that if the Bill to which he had adverted were passed the title to the description of property in question would be confirmed, no matter how contrary the form of its tenure to the provisions of the Statutes of Mortmain. It was a mistake to suppose that the interests of Roman Catholics generally were involved in the matter. The fact was that it was the Roman Catholic priests and the immediate agents of the Pope whom the Bill would benefit, and in support of that view of the case he might state that the evidence which had been given by the most intelligent and respectable witnesses who had been examined before the late Mortmain Committee went to show that what was most desirable for the benefit of the Roman Catholic laity was the application of the principles of the law of mortmain to personal property. It became, therefore, expedient to consider whether the uses to which any particular property was devoted were in themselves lawful, and how far it was in accordance with a sound policy to sanction its application to the use of monasteries, for instance, which were illegal institutions. To establish the principle that Roman Catholics might accumulate property for charitable purposes to any extent would be to take the best means of promoting the spread of the Roman Catholic religion in this country, and would be to walk in the path which had been trodden by Austria, by Italy, and by Spain, with what results he need not recall to the attention of the House. Their Lordships might depend upon it that if they were to bring about anything like equality between the power of the Roman Catholics, founded upon the possession of property, and that of the Established Church, they would be preparing the way for the outbreak of civil dissension; and it was therefore that he felt called upon to urge upon the House the necessity of proceeding in the matter with the utmost caution. The noble Lord concluded by moving that there be laid before this House—

“Return of Property in Lands, Mortgages,
Lord Abinger

Houses, and Government Securities held in Trust or otherwise affected to the Use of Roman Catholic Charities in Great Britain, describing the Locality and Extent of such Landed Property and the Amount and Nature of the Securities, the Names of the Trustees, and the particular Uses to which such Property is applicable.”

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that the noble Lord was premature in making the present Motion. At present the Charity Commissioners had no jurisdiction over Roman Catholic charities, and therefore it would be impossible to procure the return moved for by the noble Lord. The Roman Catholic Charities Bill would be brought under the consideration of their Lordships to-morrow, and if that Bill passed into law, the returns moved for by the noble Lord might be procured in future; but at present it was impossible to procure them.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

MINISTERS' MONEY (IRELAND) BILL. COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into a Committee on the Ministers' Money (Ireland) Bill read.

Moved, That the House do now resolve itself into a Committee on the said Bill.

THE EARL OF CLANCARTY: Before the House decides upon putting the Bill into Committee, I beg to submit for the consideration of your Lordships, what appears to me to be a very sufficient reason for your not proceeding further with it. It is, I believe, an understood rule, that the result of any discussion upon the second reading of a Bill decides the question as to the adoption or rejection of the principle of the measure, and upon that question, after full debate, issue was joined upon the second reading of the Bill before the House. Now, my Lords, by the paper I hold in my hand, which is the record of the proceedings of the House giving the division list upon the occasion, I find it recorded that there was a majority of five in favour of the Bill; but the same record also shows, that the majority of the Peers present by whom the principle and provisions of the Bill had been discussed, who had fulfilled the duty of deliberating in this House upon the matters upon which they were to give advice to the Crown, decided by a majority of seventy-one to sixty-five, that the Bill should be rejected. These numbers, however, do not represent the total of those who were present at the debate, and who paired off either for or against the measure before the House divided; I was, myself, one of ninety-four Peers who so left the House, before the debate had ended. So that the majority of six, that was first recorded against the Bill, in fact represented the decision of a House numbering 230 Peers present. How was this decision annulled, and a majority of six against the Bill changed into a majority of five in its favour? Why, by the proxies of those who did not attend, and who very probably knew nothing about the measure, in favour of which their votes are recorded. The number of proxies were thirty-six for, twenty-five against the Bill; so that, in fact, the decision of 230 Peers present and deliberating was overborne and reversed by the vote that was called for of sixty-one absent non-deliberating Peers, probably unacquainted with the subject-matter of the debate. My Lords, such an anomaly can never have been contemplated in the exercise of the privilege of voting by proxy, and calls for consideration and correction in the Standing Orders of the House; but its bearing upon the question of the committal of the Bill must, I think, in reason and consistency be conclusive against your proceeding further with it. The preamble of the Bill, as of every Act of Parliament, winds up by the recital of these words, "be it enacted by the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal and Commons in this present Parliament assembled." Now, my Lords, these words would set forth what is plainly contrary to the fact. It cannot, with truth, be said of this Bill, that its enactment would be by and with the advice and consent of the Lords in Parliament assembled, as their decision was directly the reverse. To be consistent, you must say of this Bill, if it should become law, that it was enacted, contrary to the advice and consent of the assembled Peers, and without their authority, which, of course, you could not do, while the House of Lords is an essential part of the Legislature. Let it not be supposed, my Lords, that I undervalue the privilege of vote by proxy; I consider it a most valuable privilege and calculated to be of great public advantage if rightly used. What I deprecate is its abuse. As a general rule, I hold it to be the duty of a Peer to attend in his place in Parliament to advise upon the measures that may be submitted to the House; but there are occasions when business or sickness may prevent attendance, and some of the sagest and most venerated Members of the House are often compelled, by physical infirmity, to absent themselves. It is, I conceive, important to the conservative character of this House, that where the assembled Peers have adopted any measure of very questionable principle, the absent Peers should be enabled to record their opinions for or against the measure, so that if considered by the majority to be objectionable it may be rejected; and if adopted, it may have the general consent of the Peers absent or present; but it is quite a different thing where the assembled Peers have rejected the principle of a Bill, for absent Peers by their proxies to tender advice for its adoption; where such is the case, the usefulness of your Lordships' deliberations is at an end, and the Crown is deprived of the benefit of the advice and consent of this branch of the Legislature which is supposed to be tendered by those only who are in Parliament assembled. The Bill before the House, which has received a second reading, contrary to the advice and consent of the assembled Lords, involves principles most detrimental to the future good government of Ireland, and as a measure distinctly abolishing, without any compensation, an important branch of the property of the Established Church. I apprehend that the Crown cannot consent thereto consistently with the obligations solemnly accepted at the coronation. Surely, the House should pause before it sends forward such a Bill, and not allow Her Majesty to be advised to assent to it by absent Peers, who are probably ignorant of its provisions and contrary to the advice of that large assembly, whose deliberative voice was given against it. Had those who voted by proxy been in their places, I have no doubt they would have increased, instead of reversing the majority against the Bill; for, though they would have heard the arguments, such as they were, that the noble President of the Council urged in favour of the Bill, they would also have heard the unanswered and unanswerable speech of the noble Earl, by whom it was opposed (the Earl of Derby). Far be it from me to speak disparagingly of the abilities of the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville) in recommending the measures of Government to the House. The noble Earl's addresses to the House are generally characterized by great ability and listened to with pleasure; but I never heard him so weak and so painfully at a loss for argument, with which to carry out the duty that devolved upon him of recommending this Bill to the House. What he said, he appeared to address to those behind, who were in the same boat with himself, or to the bar of the House, where, of course, there was no one to hear him; but he rarely addressed this side of the House, and never once looked towards the Lord Chancellor, the keeper of the Queen's conscience. How different was the speech of the noble Earl on this side; how freely his address was directed to the whole assembly of the House; every argument he used, every sentiment he expressed, every word he uttered, appeared to find an echo with every one that heard him; and, I am sure, had the Peers, whose proxies were called for on the division, been present, many, if not all of them, would have joined with the majority of the House in repudiating the measure. I will not detain your Lordships further, by going into the merits of the Bill, but viewing as I do the statement in the preamble as not borne out by the facts of the case, I think right to move, that the Committee on the Bill be deferred to this day six months.

Amendment moved, to leave out "now" and insert "this day six months."

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, there is no person who feels more strongly than I do the demerits of this Bill, or who more objects to the principle, or rather to the want of principle, by which it is characterized; but I think my noble Friend on consideration will see that the present state of the House would render his Motion, to say the least, injudicious. I must also confess that I cannot altogether coincide in the arguments which have been used by my noble Friend, because they would go to say either that the system of voting by proxy should be abandoned, or—what my noble Friend seemed rather to point at—that proxies might be given on one side but not on the other. Had that been so, we should the other night have had a most satisfactory majority, and might have had no scruples of conscience at availing ourselves of that addition. However, we have the comfort of knowing—what to me is very satisfactory—that of the Peers present and who heard the debate there was a majority against the Bill. At the same time, I cannot flatter myself that listening to the arguments would have had any influence upon the minds of those who voted by proxy in its favour. That is a general principle; and, while my noble Friend has been speaking, I have been confirmed in my fears that such would not have been the case by looking over the list of Peers whose proxies were given. Looking through them generally, a set of Peers less likely to be convinced by argument I never saw. To speak seriously on this matter, however, I cannot help feeling that the difficulty of enforcing the existing law would be materially increased by the fact of a Bill for its repeal having received the sanction, not only of the other House of Parliament, but also of a small majority of this House; and, so far as I am myself concerned, although I continue to regard it as dangerous both in precedent and principle, it is not my wish to take any part in opposing the further progress of this Bill. I adhere to all the objections which I expressed the other evening, and I cannot help pressing on the reconsideration of Her Majesty's Government the very dangerous precedent which is involved in this Bill. For what does it do? By this Bill a tax on the one hand and a right to receipt on the other, which have subsisted for 200 years, and which were confirmed by a Parliamentary sanction only three years ago, are to be abolished, simply for the reason that the parties upon whom three years ago Parliament imposed the duty of collecting the tax tell the Government to its face that they intend to violate the law. I cannot conceive any proceeding on the part of the Government more dangerous to all rights of property, more calculated to shake all confidence in Parliamentary titles, or more likely to remove the idea that Parliament will adhere to what it has done and sanctioned. For some time past there have been many and anxious discussions upon the grant to Maynooth; and upon what ground has that been mainly defended? That, whatever may be the merits of the case, there is an implied contract on the part of Parliament; that there has been a Parliamentary grant which ought not lightly to be tampered with. That grant goes back for a period of only twelve years since it was placed on the Consolidated Fund, for only fifty years from the time when it was first made; and I should like to know how it is to be supported in the face of this Bill which abolishes ministers' money, although it has endured for 200 years. In this case, too, you propose not only to do away with taxation, but also to exempt all persons from the payment of arrears due within the last three years. I know that the Members of the Government will here meet me with the argument of expediency. They will say that these arrears form but a trifling sum, for the collection of which it is not worth while to keep up all the excitement and irritation, and to expose the Government to all the difficulties which now exist. I admit that. But see what you do. You say not only that in consequence of some persons having expressed their intention to violate the law they shall be freed from their obligations, but that persons who have violated the law shall have the benefit of their past violation, while those who have obeyed the law shall be placed in a worse position than those who have disobeyed it. Considering all these circumstances, I will ask Her Majesty's Government on which side the principle of expediency lies? I feel all the objections to this measure which I endeavoured to state—unsuccessfully I admit—the other evening. I think that the grievance of the tax has been altogether done away with by the Act of 1854, more especially by the provisions in that Act which enable the owners of property to redeem this tax at not more than fourteen years' purchase. I must say that I deeply lament, not so much from pecuniary considerations as upon the ground of principle, the course which Her Majesty's Government have—I believe reluctantly and unwillingly, and in the teeth of their former declarations with regard to this tax—pursued. At the same time, I admit that they have carried the second reading of this Bill. If they think fit to persevere with it, as I suppose they will, upon them must rest the responsibility. Liberavi animam meam. The division the other evening will serve as a solemn protest, on the ground of principle, of the majority of those present, and of a considerable minority of the Peers of England.

THE EARL OF CLANCARTY said, that after what had fallen from the noble Earl, he would withdraw his Motion against the Committee; but if the Government persisted with the Bill, he should, on the Motion for the third reading, move that it be deferred until that day six months.

EARL GRANVILLE: The noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby) has dealt so satisfactorily with the arguments of the noble Earl who first addressed your Lordships on this Bill that I shall not add a word in reference to the points on which he touched. Neither am I going to make another speech on the principle of the Bill; but I must say that the course which the noble Earl opposite proposes to take in reference to this Bill is both judicious and consistent. It is judicious, because, as he very justly pointed out, the difficulties which stand in the way of the enforcement of the law would be very greatly increased by the majority which sanctioned the second reading of the Bill the other evening; and it is quite consistent that the noble Earl should still retain all his objections to the Bill, although he does not intend to offer any opposition to its further progress. With regard to the analogy which the noble Earl drew between the abolition of ministers' money and the withdrawal of the Maynooth grant I draw a great distinction between the two cases, for in this case we have provided for the maintenance of the ministers who have hitherto been in receipt of this fund—[Lord REDESDALE: Yes, out of their own pockets.]—whereas the disendowment of Maynooth would leave the professors without their salaries. The principle on which we have acted, and which I believe to be a sound principle, is that it will be greatly to the interests of the Church in Ireland to give up, for the sake of peace and goodwill, a small portion of its revenues, which we see now can readily be made up by a little economy. We thought it would be for the interest of the Church in Ireland to remove the only open sore which is now left; and it is upon this principle, and this principle alone, that I have ventured to advocate this Bill.

Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

THE EARL OF WICKLOW said, that after the course taken by Her Majesty's Government in this House in reference to this part of the subject, he should only bring forward the Motion of which he had given notice pro forma; but he wished, in justice to the petitioners, to point out how the position in which they were now placed differed from that in which they were placed when their petition was drawn up. When this Bill was before the late House of Commons at the commencement of the present year, the Commissioners saw in The Times newspaper that the right hon. Gentleman the then Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. Horsman) had made a statement in that House, in regard to their revenues and the surplus then in their hands, which they conceived to be totally at variance with the truth. They immediately waited on the Lord Lieutenant, with the Archbishop of Dublin at their head, and laid before him a true and exact statement of their revenue, showing that that which had been put down by the Irish Secretary as revenue was not revenue at all. To their astonishment, however, the statement was repeated by the same right hon. Gentleman in the present Parliament, and with an additional exaggeration. Their only resource, then, was to apply to their Lordships to be allowed to contradict this incorrect statement and to lay before them the true state of the case. No doubt the large majority by which this Bill had been affirmed in the other House had been greatly influenced by these very false statements; and he himself, opposed as he was to the principle of the Bill, if it could have been made clear that the Commissioners had such a surplus in their hands would not have voted against the Bill. But Her Majesty's Ministers in this House had taken a very different course, for they had acknowledged fairly and openly that there was no surplus. The Church Temporalities Act had always been considered in Ireland as a final settlement of the affairs of the Irish Church. It was well known that the funds applicable to the various purposes pointed out in that Act were not at that time in the hands of the Commissioners; it was a work of time to realize them:—and, now that the Commissioners were just placed in a position to carry out the intentions of the Church Temporalities Act, Parliament stepped in, snatched these funds out of their hands, and determined to apply them for the benefit of a certain number of the £10 householders in a few of the towns in Ireland. So that the great settlement of the Irish Church question was about to be upset for the clamour of a few £10 householders in Cork and other towns—for he believed that if the £10 householders of Dublin were canvassed upon the question, they would be found to be generally in favour of the continuance of the charge. This measure also, it should be remembered, did not originate with the Government, although Ministers had since adopted it. Looking at all these circumstances, and at the quarter from which the Bill proceeded, he was very much surprised that the Government had taken charge of it. Equally surprised was he at the manner in which the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby) had abandoned his opposition to the Bill. The Archbishop of Dublin—generally a supporter of the Government—was strenuously opposed to the Bill. His Grace expressed it as his opinion that the Bill would commit a cruel injustice by robbing the Church for the benefit of a few householders, and he trusted that at any rate the House of Lords would not refuse the Commissioners a hearing or insist upon legislating in the dark. These were the views of the Archbishop of Dublin, and he had felt it to be his duty to lay them before their Lordships. This was simply a landlord's question; for the owners of property, and not the occupiers of houses would be benefited by the Bill, and if the Government chose to apply to this tax the principle of the vestry cess, and gave the Lord Lieutenant power to collect the money, they would overcome all the difficulties that at present existed to the collection of the tax. He would now move pro forma, That the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for Ireland be heard by counsel against the said Bill upon their Petition (presented to the House on Monday last).

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, though the Government might feel safe as to the further progress of this Bill, he was not satisfied with mere success, but wished to see it admitted that there was nothing unjust in the principle of the measure. In the discussion the other night, the question raised by almost every noble Lord who spoke, with the exception of the noble Lord opposite (the Earl of Donoughmore) was, whether there was or was not a surplus in the hands of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners; and it was said that a discrepancy on this point existed between the statements of the Government in that and the other House of Parliament. Now, if their Lordships looked at the statutory interpretation of the word "surplus," he thought the difficulty which had been raised on this point would be greatly removed. By the 77th clause of the Church Temporalities Act, the surplus was declared to be that which remained after certain purposes and liabilities laid down in the Act had been provided for. The clause stated that "when and as soon as in any one year the Commissioners shall have any surplus after due provision has been made for the several purposes hereinbefore mentioned," &c. The argument the other evening was, that the augmentation of small livings was one of the purposes for which provision was to be made by the Commissioners, and it was said this Bill would interfere with that duty. But the augmentation of small livings was not mentioned in the Act till the 93rd clause, and therefore was not one of the things that came under the meaning of the phrase "hereinbefore mentioned" in the 77th clause. It could not be doubted, that if the towns affected by this tax were polled, the result would be a complete condemnation of the impost. It had been objected that no substitute was provided; but it should be remembered, that the only substitute proposed for vestry cess when it was abolished, was a tax upon the incomes of the clergy. The course adopted by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners was to meet at a certain period, when, after estimating the probable amount of the income for the ensuing year, and the amount of their fixed charges, they struck a balance which was to be appropriated to the repair of churches and other purposes. The only effect of this, if passed, would be to place £12,000 a year upon the fixed charges, and leave the Commissioners £12,000 less to dispose of in other ways. The tax was one which was felt to be oppressive by the Catholics of Ireland, and it was in the real interest of the Protestant Church that the Government had proposed its abolition.

THE BISHOP OF KILMORE said, that an attempt had been made to justify the abolition of ministers' money by what had been done in the case of vestry cess. But the two cases were widely different. But when the Church Temporalities Act abolished vestry cess, it only deprived the Church of the right of taxation, the exercise of which was optional, and did not take away any actual property: the vestry cess could have been practically abolished without any Act of Parliament, had the vestries refused to make any assessment. But by this Bill the Irish Church was deprived of actual property, for ministers' money was property conferred on the Church by Act of Parliament, and sanctioned by an existence of nearly two centuries. At the same time he approved of the intention of the noble Earl opposite to abandon any further opposition to this measure; and he must say that, from the friendly expressions towards that Church which had fallen from various Members of that House during the debate, and particularly from the Government, he hoped that the case of that institution would, on another occasion, receive favourable attention and consideration, and that any attempts which its friends might make to develop its resources would be met in no adverse spirit. It would, indeed, be necessary that something should be done to increase its revenues if this Bill were passed; for, after it became law, while the income of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners was £99,000, the expenditure would be £97,000, leaving only £2,000 applicable to the augmentation of small livings, of which there were 302 under £100 a year, and for the building fund. He believed that the income of the Church might be increased by a more economical management of the parochial church funds amongst the parishioners; but only a very small increase of revenue could be expected from this source. Much more might be anticipated from giving the Ecclesiastical Commissioners the power which they did not now possess, of dealing with the property vested in them in the most advantageous manner, and of raising the fines payable on renewals in the same way which a Bishop, or other private person, might do. He certainly did hope that, if after the passing of this Act, any proposition was made for enabling the Commissioners so to manage the property of the Church, as to derive from it a greater revenue than at present, it would receive the favourable consideration of the Government.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE denied that there was any analogy between ministers' money and vestry cess. There was no force in the argument which the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Argyll) had derived for the language of the 77th section of the Church Temporalities Act, and from the fact that the augmentation of small livings was not mentioned till the 93rd section of the same Act; for by an Act passed in the reign of Her present Majesty the Ecclesiastical Commissioners of Ireland were expressly directed to apply these funds to this purpose. While fully coinciding in the course pursued by his noble Friend (the Earl of Derby) in not further opposing this measure, he must warn the House that it sprung from a settled desire on the part of the Roman Catholics in Ireland to agitate against the very existence of the Established Church, and not to rest satisfied with anything short of its abolition, nor, he feared, would the present Bill in anywise induce them to give up that determination. It was folly to talk of this Bill as a message of peace—as a measure for securing tranquillity—as a means of putting a stop to agitation, and of securing the undisturbed existence of the Protestant Church. The Act of 1833 was based on broad, intelligible, and true principles; it took nothing from the Church. But this measure rested on no principle, for it was a simple transference of the property of the Church to the householders of certain towns, and those not the largest in Ireland. It was perfectly ridiculous to yield to so small an agitation as that which had been got up against ministers' money, and he could only take this Bill as an evidence of want of determination on the part of Ministers to make that stand which must be made somewhere if the existence of the Irish Church was to be upheld against the agitation which the Catholics were carrying on, and would continue to carry on, against it. He still felt the same objections to the measure that he had expressed on the second reading; but as the Government had carried the second reading, he would leave to the majority the responsibility of passing the Bill.

THE MARQUESS OF WESTMEATH said, he believed that so long as there was a Protestant Institution in Ireland the Roman Catholic clergy would never let the Protestant religion exist in quiet. Let not the Government "lay the flattering unction to their souls" that this concession would give religious peace in Ireland. He did not think that the Roman Catholic laity had those feelings of hostility towards the Protestant Church. If they were let alone this kind of religious dissension would not continue. The Roman Catholic clergy would talk against the Church as long as they were permitted, and until they were able to strike it effectually, which they would not fail to do.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON said, he could not agree in the principle of withdrawing any further opposition to this measure. He thought it was a bad measure, and that it ought to be opposed to the last. It appeared to him to be an extraordinary way of displaying a friendly feeling towards the Church to take away one of its supports in Ireland. It was admitted on all hands that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners had not sufficient funds to supply the deficiency that would be occasioned by the abolition of ministers' money. He thought of all dangerous precedents ever established this was one. He thought that this was the most glaring of all acts of injustice. Of all the outrageous acts of spoliation committed against the Established Church in his opinion this was the most flagrant. He regretted exceedingly that the noble Earl with whom it was his pride generally to act had withdrawn all further opposition to the measure. He confessed he was at a loss to understand the reason why he had adopted that course. He viewed this Bill as the first step in the downward movement, which would be followed by the most disastrous consequences to the Established Church in Ireland. The Government were establishing a precedent which he thought was fraught with mischief and glaring injustice.

On Question, Resolved in the Negative.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, he had placed an Amendment before Her Majesty's Ministers. He was not disposed to detain their Lordships by urging arguments in support of it. He would leave it in the hands of the Government to do what they liked with it.

EARL GRANVILLE said, the Bill did not deal with the re-organization of the Ecclesiastical Commission, and, therefore, he did not think that that was a proper time to discuss the Amendment of the noble Earl. The Government would, however, be willing to take the Amendments generally into consideration, with a view of shaping some measure to effect the object they had in view.

THE EARL OF WICKLOW thought, under those circumstances, it would be much better to postpone the further progress of the measure until the Amendments were considered.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he was of opinion that no advantage could result from the postponement of the Bill. The Government were prepared to give due consideration to the Amendments which had been suggested, and he felt assured that in adopting that course they would have the full co-operation of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners themselves.

THE BISHOP OF KILMORE said, that he should be sorry that the passing of the Bill should lead to an agitation upon the clergy of the Established Church against the Maynooth grant, by way of reprisal for the abolition of ministers' money. The adoption of such a course would, in his opinion, be unworthy of their sacred calling.

Original Motion agreed to; House in Committee accordingly; Bill reported, without Amendment; and to be read 3<sup>a</sup> on Friday next.

House adjourned at a Quarter past Nine o'clock, till To-morrow, Half-past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

*Monday, June 22, 1857.MINUTES.] NEW MEMBER SWORN.—For Carmarthenshire, David Pugh, esq.PUBLIC BILLS.—1° Court of Session (Scotland); Public Charities; Crown, &c. Suits (Scotland); Bankruptcy and Real Securities (Scotland); Bill Chamber (Scotland).
2° Reformatory Schools; Sites for Workhouses.ROCHDALE ELECTION — COMMITTEE—PRIVILEGE—QUESTION.

COLONEL FRENCH rose to put a question to the Speaker connected with the privileges of the House. He had always understood that a Committee of that House did not possess any power which the House itself had not; and he believed it would be generally admitted that no Member could be excluded from the debates unless there was some question under discussion personally affecting himself, while, even then, a Member was permitted to make a statement before he retired. As the House was aware, a Select Committee was appointed late last week to inquire into certain proceedings connected with the petition against the return for the borough of Rochdale. There were two forms in which a Committee could be appointed—namely, either as a Select Committee (as in this instance) or as a Secret Committee. If the House thought it advisable that an inquiry should be conducted in secret, it had the power so to order, and it had frequently done so. During the last forty years there had been some twelve cases of the House directing inquiries to be carried on in secret. Now, the Select Committee appointed to inquire into the circumstances connected with the Rochdale Election petition, without any knowledge different from that which the House possessed when it appointed them—because they had not then taken any evidence—had thought fit to convert themselves into a Secret Committee. A great number of lawyers sat on that Committee, and therefore they had skilfully avoided committing themselves; they did not issue an order that no Member should be admitted, but they worded their notification in a peculiar way, to the effect that it was the opinion of the Committee that the public service would be promoted by the Members present being confined to those who had been selected to serve on the Committee. In common with other hon. Members he had been rather anxious to witness the proceedings, and knowing that the Committee had no right to exclude him he went to the Committee-room. He was received with great courtesy by the members of the Committee. It was perfectly competent for him to remain, notwithstanding the unanimous opinion of the Committee; and if they really believed, as he supposed they did, that the presence of any Member would have injured the public service, or prejudiced the inquiry, he thought they had but one course to pursue—namely, to adjourn till that (Monday) evening, and then apply to the House for further instructions. Under the circumstances, he had deemed it better to withdraw from the Committee-room. But he now took the liberty of asking the Speaker whether a Select Committee appointed by that House had power, either directly or indirectly, to constitute themselves a secret tribunal.

MR. HENLEY: Sir, before you answer that question I hope you will allow me to make a suggestion to the House, as the Committee of Privileges did me the honour to ask me to preside over its deliberations. That Committee was perfectly well aware of the distinction between a select and a secret Committee. The hon. Member has said that he thinks the Committee was of opinion that its character ought to be changed, and that our duty was not to have proceeded with the inquiry but to have adjourned until the opinion of the House was asked as to whether it should be a select or a secret Committee. It is in the recollection of those hon. Members who were here late on Friday night, when this Committee was appointed, that the first thing proposed was that it should not meet till Monday; but, in consequence of a strong opinion expressed by various Members of the House, the unusual course was taken of appointing it to meet on Saturday. Many Members were apprehensive that if the Committee did not meet forthwith the ends of justice might be defeated. Under these circumstances the Committee met on Saturday. We were, of course, to a certain degree unaware of the nature of the evidence that might be given by Rothwell and Lord, who were the witnesses to be examined on that day. In exercising the discretion which the House intrusted to us we thought we should best carry into effect the view of the House by resolving that no person but a Member of the Committee should be present during the taking of the evidence. We, however, did not presume to exclude any Member of the House. There were, as the hon. Gentleman has said, many legal gentlemen on the Committee, and I may answer for them—though, generally speaking, it is very unadvisable to attempt to answer for such gentlemen,—that they would not presume to exclude any Member from the room. The view which we took as to what was most conducive to the public service received, I think, a most remarkable confirmation, because all the Members—and there were not a few—who were not on the Committee, but who at first desired to be present, immediately assented to the propriety of our view by abstaining from coming into the room. They, in fact, showed no disposition to come in after they became aware of the opinion of the Committee. After the inquiry was terminated on Saturday we saw no reason why the same course should be pursued on Monday, and therefore the public, as well as hon. Members, have been admitted.

MR. SPEAKER: In answering the question put to me by the hon. Member as to the rule of the House upon this subject, I have to state that cases of late years have occurred, and that a very distinct ruling upon this matter has been delivered from this Chair by my immediate predecessor. On the 23rd of February, 1849, he stated that, according to the rules of the House, every hon. Member has the privilege of attending in a Committee, unless it be a Secret Committee. The usual practice has been that during the deliberations of the Committee other hon. Members have left the room. There have been instances in which hon. Members would not leave the room, and where, on the application of the Committee, the House has granted the power of excluding hon. Members. The rule, therefore, has been very distinctly laid down—and it was assented to by the House—that hon. Members are privileged to attend in Committees. Indeed, there does not appear to have been any difference of opinion between hon. Members and the Members of the Committee upon this subject. The hon. Member does not ask me a question as to an exercise of discretion on either side, and I therefore think it fitting to confine myself to announcing what is the rule of the House.

Mr. Henley

DISTRIBUTION OF THE VICTORIA CROSS. QUESTION.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he would beg to ask the right hon. Baronet the First Commissioner of the Board of Works whether any arrangement had been made for the accommodation of Members of both Houses of Parliament on the occasion of the distribution by Her Majesty of the Victoria Cross?

SIR BENJAMIN HALL: Sir, I am directed to state that the object of the Government is to provide as much general accommodation as possible, and not to give more exclusive accommodation than is absolutely necessary; and I have received instructions to make arrangements as follows—There will be a centre compartment for the Queen; there will be two other compartments, one on the right and the other on the left, to accommodate the members of the corps diplomatique, the great officers of State, both past and present, and distinguished naval and military officers, inclusive of the relations of those officers who are to receive the decorations from Her Majesty. Independent of this there will be wings to these compartments, one on the north and the other on the south, affording room for about 7,000 or 8,000 persons. These persons will be admitted by tickets, which must be applied for at the Quartermaster General's office, Horse Guards, and any Peer or Member of Parliament desirous of attending will receive a ticket on making application on or before Wednesday evening. There will be a large space of ground in the park for the public who do not obtain tickets.

ORDNANCE SURVEY—QUESTION.

MR. LIDDELL said, he wished to ask the Secretary of the Treasury, what progress had been made in the Ordnance Survey for the county of Northumberland?

MR. WILSON said, that the Ordnance surveys of Newcastle, Tynemouth, and Alnwick had been completed, as well as that of the mineral parts in the south-west of the county of Northumberland. The maps would have been published almost immediately upon a twenty-five inch scale but for the decision which was arrived at by the House the other night. They would therefore now be published on a six-inch scale. He had been informed that the maps would be published towards the end of the year. The remainder of the county would be surveyed upon a six-inch scale.

SIR DENHAM NORREYS said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary for War, Whether any communication has been received from Colonel James (the Director of the Ordnance Survey Department) stating that the plans appended to the Army Estimates, which were signed by him in October, and were issued to the Members of the House of Commons in February last, were incorrect, in so far as they represent the county of Durham to have been surveyed and drawn on the scale of six inches to the mile, whereas, in fact, they were drawn to the scale of twenty-five inches to the mile? When such Communication was made, and why it was not communicated to the House previous to the Report on the Army Estimates being brought up? By what authority the Survey of the county of Durham was drawn to the scale of twenty-five inches to the mile; and whether there will be any objections to lay on the Table of the House Copies of the authority under which such Survey on the enlarged scale was adopted, and of any Correspondence relating thereto?

SIR JOHN RAMSDEN said, no communication of the kind referred to had been made by Colonel James before the bringing up of the Report on the Army Estimates. The map contained in the Army Estimates is published in order to show the state of the publication of the survey of England and Wales. It was perfectly true that Durham was drawn on the twenty-five-inch scale, but the drawings would be reduced by the photographic process, and would be published on the six-inch scale. The authority on which Durham is drawn on the twenty-five-inch scale was the Treasury Minute of the 18th May, 1855.

THE ISLAND OF PERIM—QUESTION.

MR. WHITE said, he would beg to ask the President of the Board of Control, seeing that the island of Perim, in the Straits of Bab-el-Mandeb, has been recently occupied in the name of the British Crown, whether the privileges of a free port have been or will be accorded thereto?

MR. VERNON SMITH said, that the island of Perim was occupied by the Indian Government so long ago as 1799; it was re-occupied by the Marquess of Wellesley in 1801, and our possession had been undisputed since that day. The hon.

Member was mistaken, therefore, in saying that the island had been "recently occupied." Perim was described as an island five miles in length, and its re-occupation now was with a view to the establishment of a lighthouse thereupon. As far as he knew no port existed. There was, however, a harbour, and any dues which were levied for the purpose of defraying the charges of the lighthouse would be levied equally on both foreign and British ships. There might be other islands in the Red Sea where it might be advantageous to erect lighthouses, but the present one being in the possession of the East India Company, it had been selected first. For the reason he had stated there was no intention of making it a free port.

CONSTABULARY FORCE (IRELAND).

QUESTION.

SIR EDMUND HAYES said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland whether he intends to introduce a measure during the present Session for the better distribution of the constabulary force in Ireland.

MR. H. A. HERBERT said, that it was his intention to introduce the Bill for the re-allocation of the Irish constabulary which was promised by his right hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Horsman).

FACTORY INSPECTORS' REPORTS.

QUESTION.

MR. COBBETT said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the Reports of the Factory Inspectors for the half-year ending on the 30th of April last, have been received by him, and when they will be laid on the table of the House?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the Reports in question had been received by him, the letter transmitting them being dated the 9th of the present month. It was, however, quite necessary that the Secretary of State should have time to make himself acquainted with their contents previous to laying them before Parliament, but he believed the Reports would be presented by to-morrow or the next day.

THE RED RIVER SETTLEMENT.

QUESTION.

MR. C. FITZWILLIAM said, he wished to ask the Under-Secretary for War whether the Canadian Rifles, now proceeding to the Red River, have been sent at the request of the Hudson's Bay Company; and whether for the purpose of protecting the trade of the Company, in consequence of information received that any portion of the territory north of the boundary line is likely to be, or has already been, occupied by settlers from the United States.

SIR JOHN RAMSDEN said, his hon. Friend was quite right in assuming that the Canadian Rifles had been sent to the Red River at the request of the Hudson's Bay Company. They had not been sent, however, in consequence of any infringement of the British territory by the settlers of the United States, but merely for general purposes, it being considered undesirable that so large and isolated a settlement should be left entirely unprotected. The force now sent was not a new one; it was merely the re-establishment of an old garrison.

OATHS BILL.

AMENDMENTS CONSIDERED.

Bill, as amended, considered.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, that on a former occasion he had expressed his opinion, on the ground both of justice and of propriety, that the clauses which it was now his duty to propose should be inserted in the Bill. At that time he understood, in common, he believed, with all the hon. Members on his side of the House, that the noble Lord at the head of the Government intended to resist these clauses whenever they were proposed. Since he had come down to the House, however, he had been informed that Her Majesty's Government had abandoned that Resolution, and did not now mean to offer any opposition to the adoption of the clauses. That being the case, it became quite unnecessary for him to trouble the House with those observations which it would have otherwise been his duty to offer. He could only congratulate hon. Members near him that it was from the Opposition side of the House that a Motion proceeded which had compelled the Government to do that which all parties appeared to agree in thinking to be right and just. He could also say that, had this Motion been opposed, and had a division been taken upon it, he believed, judging from the assurances he had received from many independent Members, as well as from those who generally supported the noble Lord, that although the Government might have succeeded in their opposition, the result of the division would not have been altogether satisfactory to them. In the present instance, therefore, discretion was the better part of valour as far as they were concerned. As he understood that the Government consented to the introduction of the clauses which stood in his name on the Notice Paper, it would merely be necessary for him now to move their insertion.

SIR EDWARD DERING seconded the Motion.

Clause, "Provided always, and be it enacted, that nothing herein contained shall extend, or be construed to extend, to enable any person or persons professing the Jewish religion to hold or exercise the office of guardians and justices of the United Kingdom, or of regents of the United Kingdom, under whatever name, style, or title such office may be constituted, or to enable any person to hold or enjoy the office of Lord High Chancellor, Lord Keeper, or Lord Commissioner of the Great Seal of Great Britain or Ireland, or the office of Lord Lieutenant, or Deputy, or other Chief Governor or Governors of Ireland, or Her Majesty's High Commissioner to the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, or any place or office whatever of, in, or belonging to any of the Ecclesiastical Courts of Judicature in England or Ireland respectively, or in any Courts of Appeal, or review of the sentence of such Courts, or of, in, or belonging to the Commissary Court of Edinburgh."

On Motion that the Clause be read 2<sup>a</sup>.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: When, Sir, upon a former stage of this Bill, I was asked whether it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government themselves to propose to put into the Bill provisions resembling those which the hon. and learned Member has moved, I stated that it was not our intention to make such a proposition; and the reason was that the contingency which these provisions were intended to guard against appeared to me to be so very unlikely to happen that it was scarcely worth while to make special provision in an Act of Parliament for these assumed cases. But, Sir, we are exceedingly anxious that this Bill should pass. We think it would be a very advantageous measure, both as regards hon. Members who have to take the oaths now, and persons who are at present excluded from this House. If, therefore, as we are led to believe, the adoption of the clauses proposed by the hon. and learned Member would tend in any degree to render more likely the passage of this Bill into a law, we should hold ourselves deeply responsible

if, from any fancied objection, we raised any opposition to that which we felt was so desirable. Therefore, Sir, upon that ground—not ourselves attaching any great importance to the provisions, but thinking them wholly unobjectionable, and believing that by their adoption we may render more probable the successful issue of this Bill—I am happy to give my support to the clauses of the hon. and learned Gentleman.

SIR FREDERIC THESIGER said, he did not know what the result of this extraordinary unanimity would be. Of course, if the clauses were agreed to, there would be an end of the question; but he begged to say, that if any hon. Member divided the House, he did not mean to vote upon the question, because he would not be supposed to sanction in any way the principle of admitting the Jews to Parliament.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the Lord Advocate had suggested an Amendment by striking out that part in this clause, which referred to a Court (the Commissary Court of Edinburgh) which now no longer existed. It would be necessary, therefore, to omit the words "or of, in, or belonging to the Commissary Court of Edinburgh."

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD observed, that he had certainly compared the clause with those in the Roman Catholic Relief Act of 1829, but he had taken the words pointed out by the right hon. Gentleman from a Bill, on the back of which he found the names of the noble Lord the Member for the City of London, the right hon. Baronet the Home Secretary, and the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland. If, therefore, he had been led into error, it was attributable to that Bill.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that that Bill had been prepared some seven years ago, and that the Commissary Court of Scotland had been abolished since.

Amendment agreed to; words struck out.

Clause, as amended, read 2<sup>o</sup>, and added to the Bill.

On the Motion of Mr. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD the following clauses were brought up and read 1<sup>o</sup>.

"And be it enacted, that where any right of presentation to any ecclesiastical benefice shall belong to any office in the gift or appointment of Her Majesty, her heirs or successors, and such office shall be held by a person professing the Jewish religion, the right of presentation shall devolve upon and be exercised by the Archbishop of Canterbury for the time being."

"And be it enacted that it shall not be lawful for any person professing the Jewish religion directly or indirectly to advise Her Majesty, her heirs or successors, or any person or persons holding or exercising the office of guardians of the United Kingdom, or of regent of the United Kingdom, under whatever name, style, or title such office may be constituted, or the Lord Lieutenant or Lord Deputy, or other Chief Governor or Governors of Ireland, touching or concerning the appointment to or disposal of any office or preferment in the United Church of England and Ireland or in the Church of Scotland."

On Motion that the said clauses be read 2<sup>o</sup>.

MR. DILLWYN considered that the Oaths Bill, with the proposed clauses, would be a Bill in the nature of a Bill of pains and penalties, and he should protest against it.

MR. WIGRAM said, that the proposed clauses provided that Jews should not obtain certain distinctions which he did not believe any hon. Member in that House ever objected to Jews, as Jews, arriving at. What hon. Members who made objections to the Oaths Bill wanted was, to make the profession of Christianity one of the qualifications for Members of that House; but instead of that, they were bound by the clauses now before the House to distinctly exclude Jews and Jews only from certain privileges, whereas, if there was any class of the non-professors of Christianity to which he would accord those privileges, it was to the Jews. He certainly should prefer Jews to Hindoos, Mahomedans, and especially to Deists. He really thought they were going to send the Bill to the House of Lords in as absurd a shape as it could well assume.

THE MARQUESS OF BLANDFORD said that, although he gave the highest credit to his hon. and learned Friend for his intentions in having introduced these clauses, his opinion with respect to the measure remained unchanged, and he therefore felt himself bound to persevere in taking the sense of the House upon the third reading.

MR. NEWDEGATE would remind the House that the noble Lord the Member for the City of London, eight years ago, abandoned clauses similar to those now proposed, because he felt that they furnished the most apt illustration of the objections to this Bill which could be afforded. What was the House now about to declare? Why, that the Jew was competent in his legislative capacity, to create or dispose of offices which he could not fill. They were electing him as law-maker, but in the same breath they were voting that he was not fit to administer the law. He begged that he might not be understood to be one of those who had considered that the insertion of those clauses was a removal of the objections to the Bill; but he again repeated that he viewed them as an illustration of the objections to the Bill, an illustration so striking that all attempts to introduce those clauses had been abandoned for eight years.

MR. BENTINCK quite agreed with his hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire that the clauses about to be inserted in the Bill showed the absurdity of the whole measure. In fact, there could not be a stronger illustration of that absurdity. He now wished to observe that whatever might be the result of the attempt to pass the Oaths Bill, there was no hon. Member of that House who was a sincere and determined opponent of the proposition to admit Jews into Parliament, but owed a deep debt of gratitude to his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Stamford (Sir F. Thesiger) for the ability and determination which he had shown in combating the measure. To him they had looked on this occasion, to him they owed their thanks. He believed that that opinion was not confined to that House, but was shared in by the country. The noble Lord had said that he was anxious the Bill should pass, but he (Mr. Bentinck) did not think that the country shared that anxiety; on the contrary, he believed that the country generally was opposed to the measure, and that the approval of it given by the House of Commons was owing to the fact that the noble Lord the Member for the City of London had pledged himself to the constant agitation of the question of the exclusion of the Jews from Parliament.

MR. GILPIN said, that his experience led him to a very different conclusion from that which had been arrived at by the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down; for wherever he had gone he had seen a feeling evinced in favour of this Bill, arising not so much from a consideration for the Jew, as from an earnest and hearty desire to abolish that portion of intolerance which yet remained upon our statute-book—that rag of intolerance about which zealots still howled while they talked so glibly of Christian charity. For himself, he looked upon it that one act of mercy, one deed of liberality, was worth whole cartloads of such arguments as they had heard from

Mr. Newdegate

Gentlemen opposite, from the prophetic denunciations of the hon. and learned Member for Stamford to the ponderous denunciations of the junior Member for North Warwickshire.

Motion agreed to; Clauses read 2° and added to the Bill.

Bill to be read 3° on Thursday.

ASSAULTS UPON WOMEN—QUESTION.

Order of the Day for going into Committee of Supply read.

VISCOUNT RAYNHAM said, that he wished to put a question to his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department with respect to the administration of the law in cases of assault upon females, which he regretted to say appeared to have been on the increase since the rejection recently of his Motion for a Committee of inquiry into the subject. No fewer than three cases of ferocious assaults on women were recorded in that day's paper alone. In one case a man who was charged with a murderous assault upon his wife—having stabbed her in the face with a knife—appeared to be quite indifferent to the charge made against him, and being very properly sentenced by Mr. Combe, the magistrate, to six months' hard labour—being the full extent of the punishment which the magistrate had it in his power to award—he said, laughing, “That's just what I want; that'll serve her out.” In another case a man was charged with a ferocious assault upon his wife, and he also treated the matter with great unconcern. Mr. Secker, the magistrate, in adjudicating upon this case, said—

“It was melancholy to see a man in his respectable position of life charged with committing a series of brutal assaults on his wife. From the state of her body it was clear that he was in the habit of continually illusing her. Under all the circumstances he should not be doing his duty to the public unless he put the law in force with some severity. He must therefore be committed to the House of correction for two months, with hard labour.”

He (Viscount Raynham) trusted, therefore, that the Government would see the necessity before long of making some alteration in the law applicable to such cases; and he would also beg to ask his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary whether, in his opinion, Mr. Secker had inflicted the proper punishment in the second case he had alluded to, and, if in the opinion of the Home Secretary he had not done so, whether any step would be taken to alter the sentence.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that, not having seen the particulars of the cases to which his noble Friend had adverted, he should be sorry to express an opinion as to whether the magistrate in exercising the discretion vested in him by the law with respect to the punishment which he awarded, had acted with sound judgment or not. He had not the least reason to doubt that the discretion exercised by the magistrates in question was a sound discretion. With respect to the operation of the existing Act, he would refer to a letter written by one of the police magistrates to the right hon. Gentleman the Chairman of Committees, in which letter the writer states that the Act had had a very great influence in checking the offences against which it was directed; and that in his district the numbers of cases had diminished from eighty-nine in 1854 to forty-three in 1856.

NATIONAL GALLERY—QUESTION.

MR. JOSEPH LOCKE said, he wished to ask the noble Lord at the head of the Government, whether it was true, as stated in the newspapers, that the Report of the Commission appointed to inquire into the site of the National Gallery had been made; and if so, when might the House expect that it would be laid on the table?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I cannot say whether it has been made or not; it had not been made two days ago.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I think I can state that it is not yet made.

SUPPLY — MISCELLANEOUS ESTIMATES.

House in Committee; Mr. FitzRoy in the chair.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he was afraid that the expenses of the two Houses of Parliament would amount to an awful Bill. In March of last year he referred to the scheme of the late Sir William Molesworth, to the effect that £280,000 would finish the expenses of the Houses of Parliament. There were then looming in the distance new charges to the amount of £500,000, and the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works then gave a pledge that no expenditure should be entered into relating to that sum of £500,000 without a reference to that House. It appeared extremely doubtful whether that arrangement had not already been broken. He therefore wished to know in what position they stood with respect to the expenses of the Houses of Parliament. It seemed clear that the sum of £280,000 he had before mentioned had been already exceeded by £96,000, and seeing that the cost of the works which were originally estimated at £770,000 had already exceeded £2,000,000, he thought it was the duty of Parliament to ascertain when and where this drain was to stop. One cause of the enormous expenditure was the costly nature of the finishings of the Houses, and it had been stated by Mr. Hunt, a gentleman well qualified to form an opinion, that no less than £700,000 had been spent in what were called finishings. A sort of squabble, too, had taken place with the architect as to his commission. The position of the matter was, that Parliament had spent £2,000,000 and odd on the new Houses, and it was now going to spend £162,000 more, and therefore he wished to know whether the Commissioner of Works meant to deviate from the arrangement made by Sir William Molesworth. Were they to be set loose at sea again, and to have these constant demands for money? It was a disgrace to the House that it could not manage properly the expenditure for works going on close to it. He wished to know whether, in addition to the sum of £54,000 which had been paid to Sir Charles Barry, and with which he did not appear to be quite contented, there would be any additional charges for commission from other quarters. He also hoped the right hon. Baronet would inform the Committee what was the amount now outstanding which it would be necessary to pay, and whether any new works would be undertaken without the sanction of Parliament.

SIR BENJAMIN HALL observed, that he was appointed to the office he had the honour to hold on the 24th of July, 1855, and within a few days afterwards he was asked by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire what course he intended to pursue with regard to the works connected with the Houses of Parliament. He replied that he proposed simply to complete the works then in hand, which had been sanctioned by Parliament, and not to undertake any new works, and he had adhered most strictly to that declaration. He hoped the House of Commons would never on any future occasion fall into such an error as they had committed between 1834 and 1840. Instead of having a detailed plan and design before them, or appointing an officer who should be responsible for the execution of the work and the expenditure of the money, Parliament contented itself with obtaining a slight plan which merely shadowed out the general character of the structure to be erected. They appointed a Committee of taste, a Committee of fine arts, a Committee of supervision, a Committee of inquiry, and various similar Committees, without any one person being responsible to the House of Commons for the manner in which the work was executed or for the expenditure. The hon. Baronet had referred to the estimate of £280,000 for the completion of the works, which was given by Sir Charles Barry to Sir William Molesworth in 1854. He (Sir B. Hall) had been given to understand by Sir Charles Barry that the works would be completed for that amount; but when he found from the estimates sent in this year by Sir Charles Barry that a larger sum was demanded than had been proposed to his predecessor (Sir W. Molesworth), he thought it his duty to require some explanation on the subject. He (Sir B. Hall) was now referring only to the plans which had been sanctioned by Parliament, setting aside altogether the new buildings which Sir Charles Barry proposed to erect in New Palace Yard. Sir Charles Barry stated that he required an additional sum of £50,000, in consequence of the increase of contracts, and 34,000 for additional works. This reply was unsatisfactory, and he requested Sir Charles Barry to furnish him with a detailed statement of the purposes for which the outlay was required. He (Sir B. Hall) could assure the House that the pledge which he gave in 1855 and 1856 had been fully carried out, and that he had endeavoured to confine Sir Charles Barry to the plans which had been sanctioned by Parliament. He heard a few days ago that some alterations were in progress in the Speaker's house and court-yard, and he immediately wrote to Sir Charles Barry to inquire why a hoarding had been erected, and what alterations he was about to make. He mentioned this circumstance to show that he was determined, to the utmost of his power, to confine Sir Charles Barry to the works which had received the sanction of Parliament.

MR. W. WILLIAMS wished to have some explanation of the items, "Amount required to be provided in addition to the sums voted in previous years, for commission which has been paid to Sir Charles Barry to the 30th of June, 1856, £23,000," and the "Estimated amount which may be required for further payments to the architect, and for miscellaneous services from the 30th of June, 1856, to the 31st of March, 1857, £5,000." He (Mr. Williams) observed another item in the Estimates of "£5,270 on account of superintendence and miscellaneous charges." He would be glad if the hon. Baronet could inform the Committee when it was probable that the expenditure for the Houses of Parliament would cease.

SIR BENJAMIN HALL said, the question just put by the hon. Gentleman was somewhat difficult to answer, and he was afraid he should only deceive the House if he attempted to give any definite reply to it. All he could say was that he was endeavouring to wind up the concern as quickly as possible by preventing any new works from being undertaken. With regard to the items to which the hon. Gentleman had called attention, if he read a paper which had been circulated a day or two ago, he would find that it contained a full explanation of the mode in which Sir Charles Barry was to be remunerated under the Treasury Minute.

MR. HENLEY said, he had not gathered from the right hon. Baronet's statement how much the present Vote would be in excess of the £284,000. He regretted to hear the right hon. Gentleman talking, no doubt with perfect sincerity, of restraining Sir Charles "as far as he was able." That was a most unfortunate addendum to the right hon. Baronet's statement. As the right hon. Baronet was a member of the Government, it would be somewhat strange if he did not possess authority enough to prevent Sir Charles Barry from expending the public money at his own discretion. Surely he had only to refuse to place in the Estimates the cost of carrying out anything he disapproved of.

SIR BENJAMIN HALL said, as soon as he found that the estimate of 1854 was exceeded he wrote to Sir Charles Barry, desiring to be informed of the exact amount which would be required for the completion of the buildings, and Sir Charles Barry replied that £50,000 would be the excess upon the contracts, and that £34,000 would be wanted for additional works which were necessary. He (Sir B. Hall) was not satisfied with that statement, and he asked for further explanations, but to that communication he had not yet received an answer.

MR. HENLEY said, the Committee was now told that Sir Charles Barry asked the First Commissioner of Works for certain sums, partly for an excess arising on the contracts, and partly for other reasons. But it appeared the First Commissioner was not exactly aware what those reasons were. He (Mr. Henley) thought the Committee ought to take care that they were not by this Vote dragged into sanctioning works of which they at present knew nothing, for they were now asked to vote money on account, but were not told what it was for. There was also another matter to which he wished to call the attention of the Committee. In the plan attached to the Estimates there were buildings shown under the title of "proposed buildings," which had not only not received the sanction of the House, but had been disapproved of by the Board of Works; and he thought the Chief Commissioner ought to have seen that such plan, at all events in its present shape, should not have appeared along with the Estimates. A few years hence, when, perhaps, they might not have so careful a Chief Commissioner of Works as they had at present, Sir Charles Barry might erect these additional buildings; and if found fault with for so doing might say he had submitted his plan to the House of Commons, who had approved of them, and that he had consequently carried them out. He (Mr. Henley) thought, therefore, that unapproved plans having been submitted to Parliament along with the Estimates, they might be the means of causing a considerable additional expenditure.

SIR BENJAMIN HALL said, that he had objected to the plan being attached to the Estimates last year, and it was entirely his fault that it had appeared this year; but he would take care it should not be construed into the sanction of the new works in question. The fact was, the plan was received just before the Estimates were sent to the printer.

MR. BALL said, he was surprised to find an item of £20,000 and upwards in this Vote "on further account of the completion of the Victoria and Clock towers and the fittings and finishings thereof." When the Committee looked at the immense sums which had been expended on those towers and their appendages they would probably think the public was entitled to see a clock of corresponding use and beauty, but instead of that they had a clock which was ashamed to show its face. Again, they were told they were to have a bell of extraordinary power for the Clock Tower. That bell they had got, and a high-sounding name they had given to it, but the public did not know whether its tones were likely to realize the expectations held out respecting them, for the bell had not been raised to its position in the tower.

MR. PALK said, his right hon. Friend (Sir B. Hall) seemed to speak with doubt as to his power over the expenditure of Sir Charles Barry. He (Mr. Palk) imagined that Sir Charles Barry was employed by that House; that the Government were answerable for the works undertaken by him and the expenditure upon those works, and that there could be no difficulty whatever in restraining him from any works which were not likely to be sanctioned by a vote of the House. He would also call attention to the fact, that while the first item in the estimate was £20,300 for the Victoria and Clock towers, further down there were two items—one of £300 and another of £6,000—on account of the Clock tower. He should, therefore, wish to know why one sum had been placed at the top and two other sums lower down?

SIR BENJAMIN HALL said, he could restrain Sir Charles Barry so far as regarded new works, though the difficulty of restraining an architect must have been practically felt by any Gentleman who had ever employed one. What he (Sir B. Hall) hoped was that if the House of Commons should hereafter sanction any new works in the shape of public offices or otherwise, they would make one man responsible for the whole, and have a clear and minute plan, the details of which had previously received the sanction of the House. With regard to the question of the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire (Mr. Ball) he (Sir B. Hall) might say the clock was going, but unfortunately some years ago a wrong course was taken with respect to it. The bells for the tower ought to have been cast before the clock was made, but it so happened that the clock was made before the bells were cast. One of those bells, as was well known, arrived in London some time ago; the other two had been cast, while two others remained to be cast; but it was thought useless to raise the large bell, which had arrived, to its place until they got the others to accompany it. He trusted that when the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Ball) was called on to attend his place in Parliament next Session he would have frequent opportunities of hearing the chimes the absence of which he now lamented. As regarded the items alluded to by the hon. Member for Devonshire (Mr. Palk), he had to state that the Vote of £20,300 at the top of the Estimates was for work done under the direction of Sir C. Barry; while the other two Votes were for the finishing of the clock towers, over which he had no control.

MR. DRUMMOND said, the right hon. Baronet (Sir B. Hall) had complained that the hon. Member for Lambeth (Mr. Williams) had not read a paper which had been circulated with the Estimates, explanatory of the Vote under consideration. He (Mr. Drummond) had read that document, and he found a very extraordinary item in it—namely, a charge made by Sir C. Barry of £1,393 for drawing the designs for the plate, linen, crockery, &c., for the refreshment rooms of the two Houses of Parliament. What on earth could they have been? It was true that the claim had been rejected by the Board of Works when it was first laid before it, and he (Mr. Drummond) had understood that it was the kitchen Committee which had ordered all these things; but was the kitchen Committee going to pay for it? The very mention of such an item was absurd. He saw a gentleman a few days ago to whom he mentioned that charge made by Sir Charles Barry of £1,393, and who thought it a most remarkable thing, for, said the gentleman in question, “I and another person made the drawings in question and got a guinea for our pains.” He (Mr. Drummond) thought, however, that Sir Charles Barry had not been justly treated with regard to his remuneration. It appeared to him (Mr. Drummond) that many of the extraordinary bills of which the Committee complained were run up by Sir Charles Barry to eke out by extra charges for commission the remuneration which Parliament refused to allow him. Then there was another item of £14,000 for furniture for the Speaker's house, and his (Mr. Drummond's) apprehension was that that sum would not be sufficient for the purpose, and that they were likely to have the same sum in the Estimates next year. Some one ought to be answerable for this expenditure.

LORD JOHN MANNERS found an item of £4,500 for the lease of a house in Spring Gardens for the Clerk of the Parliaments. He should have thought an official residence might have been found for Mr. Lefevre in the enormous pile of buildings in which they were assembled. At all events, the item was singularly misplaced in this Vote; it ought to have appeared in the Vote agreed to the other night for public offices.

SIR BENJAMIN HALL said, that Mr. Lefevre had hitherto had a residence in Palace Yard, which was very inconvenient. He agreed with the noble Lord that if any one officer connected with the Houses of Parliament ought to be provided with an official residence in the New Palace at Westminster, it was the Clerk of the Parliaments. He had inquired how it was that no provision had been made for this officer, but he could get no very satisfactory answer. It therefore became necessary to provide an official residence for him elsewhere, and the Vote had been by his direction inserted in the present Estimate, in order that the Committee might see in one Vote everything relative to the expenditure of the two Houses of Parliament. With regard to the furniture for the Speaker's new residence, he had desired an officer of his own department to go over the house and make an estimate. He intended that this work should not be undertaken by Sir Charles Barry, but by his own department, and he would endeavour to carry it out for the estimate.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE recalled attention to the charge of £1,393 for the designs for plate, linen, &c., for the refreshment rooms. There was an additional charge which made this sum amount to £4,327. On that amount Sir Charles Barry claimed a commission at the rate of four per cent, which came to £173. He (Mr. B. Hope) could not understand that matter.

SIR BENJAMIN HALL said, when the Board of Works received the claim in question they could not admit its validity, inasmuch as the first claim on that account was not ordered by that Board.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE then understood that the per centage was claimed by Sir Charles Barry for superintending the drawing of these designs.

MR. WILSON said, the sum of £1,393 was not the cost of the designs, but the cost of the articles themselves; it was upon that Sir Charles Barry claimed his commission.

MR. BRISCOE said, he must protest against the extravagant expenditure upon the new Houses of Parliament. The original sum proposed for building these Houses was £250,000. This estimate soon rose to £760,000, and then reached £1,000,000. There was even now no assurance that the sum of £50,000 to be voted this year would be the last expense. The original sum of £250,000 had risen until the money actually expended very much exceeded £2,000,000, and it was time to require a clear and distinct statement from Sir Charles Barry as to the future expenditure. At present Sir Charles seemed to set the House at defiance. After this experience he had viewed with no inconsiderable alarm the exhibition in Westminster Hall of designs for public offices, and he wished to know what expenditure they were likely to involve. The estimate of the proposed expenditure was £5,000,000, and if they were to judge by their experience of the outlay on the Houses of Parliament the actual cost would exceed £13,000,000. He, therefore, hoped that the House would be warned by the past, and not blindly give its confidence where it was not deserved.

MR. SPOONER said, he wished for further explanation as to the sum of £1,393 already referred to—whether it was for designs or for the articles themselves?

MR. WILSON said, that the item of £1,393 was not for designs at all, but for the whole of the articles themselves which are specified under this head.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he had been anxious on a previous occasion to learn how far the Estimate of £284,000 for completing the new palace was likely to be exceeded, and he now understood the excess on the present Vote to be about £20,000. He wished to strengthen the hands of the First Commissioner of Works, not to weaken them, and therefore he should move that this Vote be reduced to the sum of £20,000. His object was to require another Estimate to be submitted to the House for these works, which should be final.

SIR BENJAMIN HALL said, he hoped the hon. Baronet would not press his Amendment. He (Sir B. Hall) had written to Sir Charles Barry, requesting to be furnished with all the particulars relating to the extra expenditure beyond the £284,000, which he stated in 1854 would be requisite to finish the new palace. Great inconvenience might arise if the sum were now reduced; but before the present Session terminated he certainly hoped he would be able to lay before the House a detailed Estimate of everything required to complete the works according to the plans which had been sanctioned. He could only repeat the assurance he had previously given that he would not, directly or indirectly, authorize any expenditure beyond that which had been sanctioned by Parliament.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON said, he trusted, after what had fallen from the First Commissioner of Works, that the hon. Baronet (Sir H. Willoughby) would not press his Amendment. Before that explanation was made, however, he (Lord C. Hamilton) had himself been inclined to support the Amendment, viewing it in the light of a vote of confidence in the First Commissioner of Works, who ought to be armed with the power of keeping Sir Charles Barry within some bounds. It was very difficult at any time to control an architect; but those who had watched Sir Charles Barry's career for the last eighteen years must have observed that he exceeded, in his ingenuity in devising extra charges, every other member of his profession. Some further explanation was needed as to the sum of £23,000 for Sir Charles Barry, and also as to the next item of £5,000. Last year the total sum stated to be due to that gentleman was £60,000, and it was therefore difficult to understand how this £23,000 had suddenly become payable to him. If that House had exercised a proper vigilance over this expenditure £500,000 might easily have been saved, and probably a far better building provided for the purposes of the nation. They ought to assist the First Commissioner of Works in his laudable determination to exact accurate estimates and specifications. Much of the money required for commission was composed by charges for works which were found unsuited for their object, and had to be pulled down again. No architect ought to be suffered to charge for his own mistakes and want of foresight. Hon. Members might not be aware of the many successive transformations that the chamber in which they now sat had undergone. In the first place, the floor had to be lengthened; then the benches had to be altered, as they had been placed so close that hon. Members could not sit down; next, the galleries for Members had to be changed, the strangers' gallery and the reporters' gallery had likewise to be remodelled; the long lancet-shaped windows at first introduced were also found ill-adapted to the character of the House, and had to be all altered; the arrangements for ventilation had been the subject of numerous changes; and, last of all, it being discovered that nobody could hear in the House, the roof had to be entirely altered. What private firm that carried on its affairs with anything like ordinary prudence would allow an architect to play this game with them, and not even require him to state the expense incurred by such innumerable changes? Before they removed to that House they had a chamber in which they could hear one another, and which was well ventilated. He (Lord C. Hamilton) had once asked Sir William Molesworth to exemplify the system in which Sir Charles Barry had been permitted to run riot, and produce accounts showing the cost of these alterations; but that lamented statesman replied that it was totally impossible to procure the required figures, so dire was the confusion in which the whole matter was involved. He (Lord C. Hamilton) wished to have some explanation of the item of £23,000 for Sir Charles Barry in this Vote.

MR. BARROW said, he concurred in the opinion which had been expressed that the House itself was chiefly to blame for a great part of the expenditure. He doubted, moreover, whether the power of the First Commissioner of Works was sufficient to control the architect of the new Palace, and he thought the Committee would do wrong if it refused to accede to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Evesham (Sir H. Willoughby) for stopping a portion of this Vote until they were furnished with better information.

MR. BRISCOE said, he also hoped the Amendment would be persevered with. He should vote for it, not from any want of confidence in the right hon. Baronet at the head of the Board of Works, but in order to get the Estimate they wanted.

Lord Claud Hamilton

MR. W. WILLIAMS would give an earnest support to the hon. Baronet's Amendment; but he desired at the same time to say that the right hon. Baronet (Sir B. Hall) was the only First Commissioner of Public Works who had attempted to put any sort of check upon the proceedings of Sir Charles Barry. Some steps ought to be taken to stop the extravagant expenditure which had been going on from year to year in the construction of the Houses of Parliament. As he presumed that the greater portion of the £4,000 which was now asked for, in addition to the £16,000 already voted for decorative works in the Palace at Westminster, would be expended in the erection of statues of men eminent in former days, he wished to be informed by the right hon. Baronet whether any provision had been made for bringing into public remembrance the most illustrious man this country ever produced—namely, the Protector Cromwell. Nothing had yet been done by this country in memory of his great character, but he would live in history. The time would come when his merits would be known. It would be a disgrace to the present generation if it did not produce something worthy of his great name.

MR. P. W. MARTIN said, that while he admitted the necessity of some understanding being arrived at with respect to the subject alluded to by the hon. Member for Evesham, he deprecated any vote which would have the effect of placing hon. Members in the ridiculous position of having commenced the building of a house which they could not complete.

MR. WILSON said, that after the question of Sir C. Barry's remuneration had been disputed for many years, Lord Besborough, the then First Commissioner of Works, fixed the remuneration at £25,000 upon an original expenditure of £750,000, which remuneration was £10,000 less than if it had been at the rate of 5 per cent on the expenditure. In the course of time, and under successive Governments, considerable additions were made to the original design as well as extensive alterations; and, from time to time, Sir C. Barry received advances on account of such additions and alterations. In 1853, however, when it was thought right to put an end to those payments on account, and to fix a definite principle upon which Sir C. Barry should be rewarded, it was determined that, in addition to the £25,000 on the original estimate, he should be paid at the rate of 3 per cent on the increased expenditure. Hon. Members were aware that Sir Charles Barry remonstrated against that decision, and still persisted in claiming 5 per cent, according to the usual scale of architects; but the Government resisted his claim, and they were supported by the House in that resistance. When his account came to be settled last year he put in a claim for a large outlay for the measurement of the works, not included in the charge for the building. It was ultimately agreed, with the advice of the Board of Works, that he should be paid at the rate of 4 per cent instead of 3 per cent, in order that the additional 1 per cent might remunerate him for those measurements. When the account came to be settled it was found that the claim of Sir Charles Barry was £23,000. This was the £23,000 now under discussion, and the other sum of £5,400 was for his services in the ventilation and lighting of both Houses and other matters.

MR. MALINS wished to remind the Committee that Sir Charles Barry laboured under the disadvantage of not being permitted to reply to the attacks which had been made upon him with reference to the building of the Houses of Parliament. As there were two sides to every story, he had no doubt that Sir Charles Barry could show that not he, but the House itself, was answerable for most of the alterations that had been made in the original plan. Everybody knew that 5 per cent upon the outlay was the remuneration paid to an architect in the absence of a special contract, and as no contract had been entered into between Sir Charles Barry and the Government, he was entitled to 5 per cent upon the money expended in the construction of the Houses of Parliament. It was no doubt true that less than 5 per cent had been forced upon him, but he always protested against any reduction of his claim. As, then, there was a dispute between the Government and Sir Charles Barry, why should it not be referred to indifferent persons for settlement? The Reform Club had been erected by Sir Charles Barry; the same question arose as to his remuneration; it was referred to arbitration, and Mr. Justice Erle, then at the Bar, awarded him 5 per cent. Sir Charles Barry had received £58,000 for twenty years' services, and, considering the abilities of Sir Charles and his eminence as an architect, this was not a very astonishing sum. But he (Mr.

Malins) had received an assurance from Sir Charles that out of this sum, contrary to the usage of architects, he had had to pay from his own pocket a large amount of money for expenses thrown upon him by this House. The committee would therefore see that Sir Charles Barry had not received perfect justice. He had made no contract; the Government sought to impose their own terms upon him; and because they were more powerful than he they expected him to submit. He (Mr. Malins) contended that the Government was no more justified than an individual would be in imposing their own terms on Sir Charles. The case ought to be submitted to some impartial tribunal—either to a court of law or to arbitrators.

MR. SPOONER said, the right hon. Baronet (Sir B. Hall) had stated that great inconvenience would arise if these Estimates were cut down. Would the right hon. Gentleman state what particular form this inconvenience would assume, and whether it would leave any buildings unfinished?

SIR BENJAMIN HALL replied, that no new work of any magnitude, and not sanctioned by Parliament, had been undertaken with his sanction; but inconvenience would, of course, result if the Amendment were carried as regarded those buildings now in course of completion.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that Sir Charles Barry agreed to build the Houses for a certain sum of money; he deviated from his plan, and then sought to charge 5 per cent upon all the extra work.

Motion made, and Question put, "That a sum, not exceeding £82,801, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge for Works and Expenses at the New Houses of Parliament, to the 31st day of March 1858."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 65; Noes 175: Majority 110.

MR. KIRK said, he wished to direct the attention of his right hon. Friend the First Commissioner of Works to the decay which was apparent in the stones of the new Houses, and which was particularly to be remarked in the mouldings and ornamental front of the river terrace. Unless some means were adopted for preserving the stone the Houses would be in a great measure decayed before they were completed.

MR. HENLEY said, that it was evident, even upon a casual inspection, that the stone was going to pieces in all directions. He had observed, also, something which appeared to him to be very like the rusting of iron in the roof. He hoped he was mistaken in these indications; but if he were not they did not argue much for the future permanence of the building.

SIR BENJAMIN HALL said, he was sorry to say that the right hon. Gentleman was not mistaken in his view of the case; for he had made inquiries some months ago as to the state of the roof, and he found on examination that the galvanized process had ceased to act, and that the rust was coming through, as was almost invariably the case where galvanized iron had been used for structures which were not of a temporary character. All that they could do now would be to cover it over with some chemical preparation, with the view of preventing further mischief; but he was sorry to say that the rust certainly was showing itself in different parts of the roof. His attention had also been drawn to some of the stone, which was decaying in certain places, and some chemical processes had been tried for the purpose of preserving it; but it would be years before the full success of the experiments could be tested.

MR. HENLEY asked whether something could not be done to prevent the rusting of the iron in those parts of the roof where it had not yet begun; because it would be much more difficult to stop it after it had once shown itself than to prevent it in the first instance.

SIR BENJAMIN HALL said, that he was in constant communication with persons upon the subject, but that it was very difficult to determine what measures would prevent the extension of the evil.

MR. KIRK observed that it said very little for the state of architectural science in this country, if some means could not be devised for preventing the decay and defacement of the stones of the river terrace.

MR. WISE asked if the First Commissioner of the Board of Works had any objection to lay upon the table an account of the whole sums expended for the Houses of Parliament. He really was not able to say whether it was £2,500,000 or £3,000,000. A short return showing the gross amount and various items would be extremely useful?

SIR BENJAMIN HALL said, that he proposed to lay upon the table the estimate of Sir Charles Barry for the thorough completion of the Houses of Parliament; and he should at the same time lay upon the table an account of the cost from the commencement to the present time.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE asked if it were intended to abandon the galvanized iron roof, and to substitute a lead roof for it.

SIR BENJAMIN HALL said, that had not been determined on; for to remove the covering of the roof of that immense building would involve a frightful expenditure; but his impression was that galvanized iron ought never to have been employed as a roofing for the Houses of Parliament.

(2.) £443, Port Patrick Harbour.

MR. LIDDELL asked whether a return of the estimated expenses of the large works necessary for the completion of the enormous harbour at Dover, moved for by an hon. Member recently, would soon be laid on the table?

MR. WILSON replied that the present Vote was for the keeping up of this harbour, and not for general works; the proper time to put the question was when the general Vote for harbours was under discussion.

MR. HENLEY gave notice, that on that occasion he should call the attention of the Committee to the expenses of Dover Harbour in reference to its basins.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £77,557, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expense of repairing and maintaining the several Public Buildings in the Department of the Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland, to the 31st day of March 1858."

MR. COWAN said, he wished to call attention to the item of £17,014 required for the execution of works recommended by the Commissioners at certain lunatic asylums in Ireland. He wished to know whether Scotland was to be put on the same footing as Ireland in this respect? Then, again, there was a large sum of money intended to be applied to the erection of a court for the Incumbered Estates Commission. He understood that the labours of the Commissioners were now nearly closed, therefore it was rather late in the day to propose such a Vote as this. Another item to which he objected was that of £1,102, required for alterations in the House of Industry in Dublin. Had Government, he asked, taken upon itself to become responsible for the support of charitable institutions in Dublin; and if so, were they about to be as liberal to Edinburgh, or any other town in Scotland?

MR. MOWBRAY said, he was at a loss to know why 5 per cent upon the items in this Vote should be charged for contingencies. Why was it that these Irish Estimates could not be made out as clearly and regularly as any others? He should be glad also to know how much of the £1,000 to be expended in repairs of model agricultural schools was to be given to the Albert Training Institution at Glasnevin. He believed that the works there were most costly, and would absorb the greater part of the money, to the detriment of the other institutions.

MR. W. WILLIAMS inquired why it was that the whole item of £10,500 for the erection, maintenance, and repairs of the offices and schools belonging to the Commissioners of National Education was not included in the Vote for education? He objected to these separate items, which all belonged to one class, being spread through the Votes in such a manner that it was almost impossible to tell to what department they belonged. He also objected to the large sums he saw put down for guard-houses and stables in connection with "the mock royalty" in Ireland; but, as a Motion to abolish the Viceroyalty was pending, he would not go into that at present further than to express his belief that, if there were no Viceroy, the Queen would, in all probability, visit Ireland oftener, and stay such a period as could not fail to be satisfactory to her Irish subjects. He also objected to the item for lunatic asylums. In England lunatic asylums were supported out of the county rate, and he did not see why Ireland should be exempted from discharging the same duty.

MR. BAGWELL said, with respect to the lunatic asylums in Ireland, that the Irish people paid for them by repaying the money advanced by the Government.

MR. WILSON said that, in consequence of a flaw in an Act of Parliament, the sum advanced by Government, amounting to nearly £200,000, for lunatic asylums in Ireland, was in considerable jeopardy. An Act of Parliament was brought in to correct that flaw; but several Irish Members objected, and said, "We do not object to pay our just debts, with regard to the erection of these buildings, but we have a claim in consequence of the bad manner in which these buildings have been erected." A Commission was therefore appointed to visit all the asylums, and that Commission reported that £17,000 should be expended by the Government in completing works which ought to have been completed before. The cost for the erection of the asylums was defrayed in the first instance by the Government, but was now being repaid by the counties in Ireland. The hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Cowan) thought that if the charitable institutions of Dublin were supported by the Government, those of Edinburgh ought to be supported in the same way; but, with respect to the Dublin hospitals, it was the House, and not the Government that was responsible for the expenditure. The Government were overruled by the House, and were obliged to bow to the decision of the House; but the House had not determined that the same thing should take place in Edinburgh. With respect to the question which had been put respecting the item of 5 per cent for contingencies, he observed that the charge for preliminary expenses and remuneration of architects might have been included in the gross sum, but that the separation of it made no difference in the amount. With respect to the charge for building offices, and offices for the Board of National Education in Ireland, this was the first time it had appeared under the present head; and the reason why it was now included under this head was, that it was much more economical to have the works of different departments executed under the responsibility of the Board of Works for Ireland than by each separate department. There were further charges for the maintenance of fever hospitals in Ireland, and he would suggest that the whole cost of hospitals should be included in one Vote.

MR. COWAN asked whether the estimate of £17,000 for works in connection with lunatic asylums, recommended by the special Commissioners of Inquiry, would complete the claim upon the Exchequer in respect of those asylums? He also wished to know why it was proposed to expend £10,000 in providing a court and offices for the Commissioners for the Sale of Incumbered Estates, when the labours of those gentlemen were approaching their termination. He should, therefore, move the reduction of the Vote by £1,102 10s., the sum required for repairs to the hospitals of the House of Industry, Dublin.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £76,455, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expense of repairing and maintaining the several Public Buildings in the Department of the Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland, to the 31st day of March 1858."

MR. WILSON stated that the estimate of £17,000 for lunatic asylums was the final charge that would be made upon the Government for works which, in the opinion of the Commissioners, ought to have been included in the original estimate. He was glad to inform the Committee that the outlay of £200,000 for these asylums was in course of regular repayment. With regard to the Vote for the erection of offices for the Incumbered Estates Commissioners, his hon. Friend must be aware, from the discussion which had taken place in that House, that the Commissioners did not at present possess even decent accommodation. His hon. Friend was mistaken if he supposed that the functions of those useful tribunals—the Incumbered Estates Courts—would cease, although the Commission itself might do so. The Government had pledged themselves last year to erect buildings for conducting the business of the Commission, in the immediate neighbourhood of the Four Courts at Dublin, and in pursuance of that pledge the Committee were asked to sanction this Vote. With regard to the repair of hospitals, the House had already committed itself to a certain extent to the maintenance of those establishments, and he thought they would not, by a side wind, avoid the responsibility they had undertaken, and reject this Vote.

MR. BAGWELL was understood to say that the Vote of £17,000 for lunatic asylums was not regarded in Ireland as a final contribution for that object.

In reply to Mr. ADAMS,

MR. WILSON said that the Vote of £1,102 for the hospitals of the House of Industry was for the purpose of completing the repairs necessary to give effect to the Act of last Session.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

The following Votes were then agreed to :—

- (4.) £15,100, Kingstown Harbour.
- (5.) £87,967, Houses of Parliament.
- (6.) £35,171, Treasury.
- (7.) £16,466, Home Department.
- (8.) £45,169, Foreign Office.
- (9.) £20,160, Colonial Office.
- (10.) £46,426, Privy Council, &c.
- (11.) £1,700, Lord Privy Seal.
- (12.) £11,510, Paymaster General.

MR. CAIRD said, that he rose pursuant to notice, to move that this Vote be reduced to the same amount as was granted last year. Although the actual amount of this vote was small the department for which it was taken was entrusted with the management of a revenue which represented a capital sum of not less than £12,000,000 sterling. The sum which was brought under the criticism of Parliament was only one-fifth part of the money expended on the Woods and Forests; and it was a remarkable circumstance that while during four years that portion of the expenditure which was annually brought under the criticism of Parliament had increased £1,000 a year, the part which was not brought under the criticism of Parliament had increased by £27,000 a year. The gross average receipts of the whole hereditary revenues of the Crown under the management of this department amounted to £390,000 a year, and during the last year the gross expenditure in the collection and management of that sum, including the usual expenditure on landed estates, such as that for buildings and improvements, was £130,000 or not less than 33 per cent on the total amount of revenue received. Now he believed that everybody who was acquainted with the business which devolved on the owner of landed property must perceive that that was an extravagant charge for its management. Since 1852 the gross hereditary revenues of the Crown had increased very considerably. From the sum of £376,800, to which they amounted in 1852, they had risen in 1856 to £404,500 showing an increase of upwards of £27,500, and yet there was actually paid over a balance to the credit of the Exchequer less by £2,000 than there was in 1853. This department included two branches of property. The more profitable to the public was that included in the Land Revenue Department, which embraced a description of property that during the last few years had greatly increased in value in this country, including land in several counties in England and building sites in the metropolis. Many building leases would soon expire and a great increase of revenue might reasonably be expected from that source, but he had to complain that there was no definite information accessible to Members of Parliament by which they could ascertain or criticise the gradual or probable advantages which this property might be supposed to realize under good management. He was therefore precluded from obtaining any information which could throw light on this subject, and therefore he should confine his attention to the second branch of the Woods and Forests. He found that last year the Forest Department realized £64,800, and that the cost of collection and management was £45,500, leaving, therefore, £19,300 as the revenue from 120,000 acres of land. He might be told that 20,000 of these were composed of land of a very inferior quality, but, taking the acreage at 100,000, as the total amount of profit was £19,300, those 100,000 acres might be said to have realized something less than 3s. 10d. an acre. Since the retirement from the chief office in that department of Mr. Kennedy, one of the most active and honourable men ever employed in the service of any country, inquiries had been instituted into this subject, and improvements had been contemplated which did not seem to have been yet carried into effect. The public had, in fact, never derived the advantages they might reasonably have expected from the Woods and Forests, and in the time of Nelson and ever since, complaints had been made of the small quantity of timber which they supplied for the Royal navy. For what was the extent to which the Royal Forests supplied our dockyards with timber? Why, of £550,000 worth of timber bought annually for use in our dockyards the Royal forests did not supply 1-50th part. The fact was that our ships were not built of British oak. The best oak came from the Continent—from Italy, and from the forests of Central Europe. It was no longer held a matter of importance to make ourselves independent of a foreign supply of any article; but in a country like this, with a limited territory and an increasing population, it was impossible that a crop, which required 150 years to bring it to maturity, could ever be a profitable one. He had no hesitation in saying that, considering the facilities by land and sea which now existed for importing timber from abroad we might be wholly independent of our Royal forests for the necessary supply. In 1852 the office ceased to be an independent department of the Government, and an Act of Parliament was passed which placed it under the Treasury, so that the Commissioners of Woods and Forests could not even complete a lease without the sanction of the Treasury. There was therefore no occasion to keep up an expensive department, and there seemed no reason why the whole of the management of the Woods and Forests should not be carried on at an expense of £4,000 or £5,000 a year. When the change was made in 1852 the intention was that instead of two Commissioners one Commissioner should be appointed as Surveyor General, who should have under him a special officer in the nature of an inspector. He did not object to the appointment of a mineral inspector, but he did object to his salary of £800, in addition to the salaries of the two Commissioners, as this was the very officer whose appointment was contemplated by the arrangement to which he had referred. He also objected to the amount of the legal expenses of the department. The legal expenses were  $1\frac{3}{4}$  per cent upon the gross revenue for England  $\frac{3}{4}$  per cent for Ireland, and no less than 10 per cent for Scotland. He could not understand why so large a percentage should be incurred for law expenses in Scotland. The charges of the Scotch solicitor had gradually increased from £1,000 to £2,300 in the present year, which, with the addition of some other legal expenses, made a total of about £2,600 for law expenses in Scotland. His belief was that if the hereditary estates of the Crown were managed with the same prudence as private property, the net income of these estates would be equal to the amount of the Civil List. As guardians of the public purse, and trustees for the Queen, the House were bound to investigate this subject. The gross income derived from these sources was £410,000, and if the charge for management were reduced to 15 per cent, and if the income could be increased by 10 per cent, the clear net revenue would be quite equal to the whole amount paid over to Her Majesty in the Civil List. The Forest of Hainault in Essex four years ago yielded nothing, but by a new system of management, instituted by Mr. Kennedy, this forest now yielded a revenue of £2,500 a year. Some of the Crown estates were of very little value either for growing timber or as arable land, but there were purposes to which they might be applied, and he was surprised to hear the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston), assert, in speaking of Aldershot the other night, that there were very few spaces of open land which could now be procured for the evolutions of troops and the purposes of a camp. Woolmer Forest, for example, offered a much larger space than Aldershot. It was within a few miles of that place, a royal forest containing 6,000 acres untimbered, and yielding almost nothing to the public, but which was traversed by the direct road from the metropolis to Portsmouth, and skirted by a railway. The ground was finely undulated, and from his own observation, he could state that it was better supplied with water than Aldershot, and was well adapted for a camp. The Government had given £14 an acre for Aldershot, and though they said they could now sell it for a higher price, he doubted whether they could get more than that money for it if the camp were withdrawn. Woolmer Forest was valued for sale not long ago by the Crown Surveyor at £3 or £4 an acre, so that if the Government had fixed upon this, their own property, as the site for the camp they would have saved a great deal of money and very much increased the value of the adjoining land. Again, the New Forest in Hampshire, another Crown property, contained 65,000 acres, of which 30,000 acres were open unoccupied land. It was traversed by a railway, and was within a short march from Portsmouth. If the Government had established their camp there they would have had many applications for leases, and would have raised the value of property which belonged to the nation. The noble Lord had chivalrously taken upon himself the responsibility for the purchase of Aldershot, but he could not have made choice of the ground, and the Crown surveyors ought to have known the capabilities of these Crown estates and the advantages which would have been derived from selecting them. He objected to any increase in the amount payable to this department, believing that the former charge was ample. He trusted that he should have the support, not only of hon. Members who sat around him, but of the hon. Member for Northamptonshire (Mr. Stafford), who had taunted hon. Gentlemen on the Ministerial side with not performing the pledges of economy they had made on the hustings. He hoped he should also have the support of the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Wilson), who had blamed

Mr. Caird

Parliament the other night for voting away the public money. The hon. Member concluded by moving that the Vote be reduced by the sum of £1,481, being the excess over the Vote of last year.

MR. WILSON said, he could not have supposed, from the notice given by the hon. Member, that he intended to raise so large a question upon a Vote for the civil expenses of an office in London. The subject was, no doubt, well deserving of consideration, and he only wished the hon. Gentleman had indicated by his notice that he intended to raise the question of the policy of the management of these estates: for then he would have been prepared to follow him into the details. He entirely agreed with the hon. Gentleman in the high estimate he had formed of the qualifications of Mr. Kennedy. With regard to the gentleman appointed Chief Mineral Inspector, he would observe that he had been selected by Mr. Kennedy, although he had been appointed by that gentleman's successor. In the Forest of Dean, and upon other Crown estates, there was mineral property the value of which was undeveloped, and it would be the duty of the Chief Mineral Inspector to turn the mineral resources of the Crown estates to the best account. The Government thought it necessary to have a competent officer to advise them with regard to the mineral property of the Crown, and Mr. Smith was recommended to them as a person well qualified for the appointment. This was an extensive property, scattered over the whole kingdom, and the Government would hardly have been consulting the interests of the Crown, whose trustees they were, nor the advantage of the public, who were interested in as large a revenue as possible being obtained from this source, if they had not appointed a mineral agent to develop its riches. As far as their experience had gone, the exertions of Mr. Smith had fully borne out the expectations entertained from his selection. Therefore the Committee would scarcely be acting wisely in cutting off the salary of £800 a year paid to an able and efficient officer charged with all the delicate operations connected with ascertaining the value of, and letting, the whole mineral property of the Crown, consisting of coal, iron, and copper mines. It was manifestly impossible that the Treasury officers could discharge duties of so highly technical and purely professional a nature. Moreover, looking at the scale of remuneration neration, paid by private proprietors for analogous services, the salary allowed to Mr. Smith was anything but extravagant. It was to be hoped, then, that the hon. Member would not divide the Committee against so obviously useful an expenditure. As to the largeness of the sum required for law charges, it was entirely owing to accidental circumstances. Several heavy cases involving the Royal prerogative had been taken to the House of Lords on appeal from the Scotch Courts, and were now on the point of being brought to a conclusion. Questions of principle affecting the right of the Crown to its whole property having been at issue in these actions, this litigation could not well have been avoided. This item, however, was merely an estimate for the liquidation of unusual charges. The hon. Gentleman had also animadverted on the great differences between the gross and the net income of the Crown property. With regard to the forests, no one knew better than the hon. Member that the cost of management of such property must bear a large proportion to the receipts. A large portion of the difference to which the hon. Member had referred was to be attributed to the necessity of incurring a large outlay in thinning the trees, and in other works connected with the improvement of the property. The case of the Forest of Hainault was a striking example of the reproductiveness of a judicious outlay of capital. Only four or five years ago, it was covered with timber of no value whatever, but now it was let for £2,500 a year to one of the most improving tenants in this country. A heavy expense had, however, to be first incurred in drainage and other works before such results could be realized. Hardly a year passed but it became his duty to introduce a Bill for the disafforestation of these Crown forests, and the expenditure required for bringing the land into a profitable condition accounted, to a great extent, for the large percentage of the income which was absorbed by the cost of management. This was all the explanation it was at that moment in his power to offer in reply to the observations of the hon. Member for Dartmouth. As to the immediate object of this Motion, it resolved itself simply into a refusal of the salary of the mineral agent, together with the law charges for certain heavy suits now on the eve of settlement.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he thought the Secretary for the Treasury had not dealt quite fairly with this Motion. The country was indebted to the hon. Member (Mr. Caird) for the able manner in which he had brought forward this subject. Other hon. Gentlemen who used to devote their attention to this department had gradually become absorbed into the bench below (the Ministry) and the House had consequently lost the advantage of their special knowledge. The hon. Member did not object to a mineral agent, but merely suggested that, by abolishing one of the other offices, the means of paying that gentleman might be found without necessitating additional expense. Therefore, the whole of the Secretary for the Treasury's elaborate argument fell to the ground. If only five years had been required to obtain so great a return from the Forest of Hainault, why was not so fruitful an outlay made long before? The Committee which had inquired into this department had proved that its affairs were greatly mismanaged.

MR. WILSON explained that, without a Commissioner in London, the business of this department could not be satisfactorily conducted.

MR. WISE said, that while he agreed in other respects with the hon. Member for Dartmouth (Mr. Caird), yet he differed entirely from him as to the item on which he proposed to take the sense of the House. As to the alleged efficiency of this department the documents on the table of the House failed to establish it. Having regard to the various inquiries which had been instituted on this subject, and to the alteration of system which took place in 1852 in the Board of Woods and Forests, much greater changes and improvements than any that had yet occurred might have been expected. He should be glad to see the two Commissioners succeeded by a surveyor and a deputy surveyor who thoroughly understood the duties of their offices. This was a more important subject than at first sight it appeared to be, for if the Woods and Forests belonging to the Crown were properly managed he believed that they might be made to yield a rental of £600,000 a year, or £200,000 in excess of the civil list. He gave credit to the Board of Works for having effected a considerable reduction in the expenditure in respect of Crown lands, but in the Woods and Forests Department there was still that extravagant expenditure of which complaint had been so frequently made. Every one who knew anything of woods and forests would admit that the Crown woods and forests were the worst managed property to be found anywhere. In the department of the Board of Works, the revenue for four years ending in 1852 was £1,216,559, and the expenditure £364,977; the revenue of the same department for the four years ending in 1856 was £1,256,407, and the expenditure £244,762, showing a considerable reduction of expenditure. But what was the case when he turned to the department of Woods and Forests? The revenue there for the four years ending in 1852 was £186,517, and the expenditure £188,101. For the four years ending in 1856, the revenue was £307,487, and the expenditure £245,470. In fact, the revenue and expenditure accounts of the Woods and Forests beat everything which he had ever heard in that way. From the year 1803 to 1856 the receipts of the Woods and Forests were £2,326,546, and the expenditure £1,861,023, leaving a miserable balance on so large an income. The New Forest was valued by Mr. Webster, a competent man, at £2,334,507. Its receipts for five years were £121,963, and its expenditure £74,848. The receipts for one year from the Forest of Dean were £4,501, and the expenditure was £1,195. He had said that he did not object to the appointment of a mineral inspector, but he did object to a deputy gavaller for this forest at a salary of £400 a year; and what could they think too of an expenditure of £200 for gamekeepers in such a forest! He hoped that the Treasury, which had now a partial control over this Crown property, would exercise more vigilance in order to check extravagant expenditure. He wished that the Treasury had complete control over the woods and forests of the Crown, in order that the produce might be paid into the national Exchequer. As an instance of the present management he might mention the case of the forest of Whittle, the produce of which was only £41 1s. 9d. while the expenditure was £303 19s. 2d. He was afraid, too, that the exchange of lands was not always made for the benefit of the Crown, for if he was correctly informed they had given land in Downing Street worth £123,000, for land in New Oxford Street, worth £120,000—a part of the town which did not appear to be so valuable that the Crown should buy lands there. To use an expression of "old Arthur Young," the Crown woods and forests appeared to be maintained merely to afford excuses for paying salaries. They produced anything but oak.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, that he also thought the question one which it was important for the Committee to consider. Some years ago the present Duke of Somerset, then First Commissioner of Woods and Forests, consented to subject the accounts of the Board to an audit; but he (Sir H. Willoughby) thought the House ought not to be satisfied until the affairs of that department were submitted, like those of every other department of the State, in detailed estimates to the House. The receipts of Windsor Park last year were £5,000, the expenditure £16,000. He should not go through all the items of the Windsor Park expenditure, for the gross results were quite sufficient to show the necessity for a change in the present system. He also wished to inquire whether the accounts of the department had been audited up to the 31st March last, as it had been said that the Woods and Forests Commissioners were so contumacious, that it was difficult to get them to bring their accounts before the Audit Board. Were they so still? He trusted that the Government would give some information to the Committee on this matter, and also state what was the objection to these accounts being made matter of estimate.

MR BRISCOE said, if it had been proposed to appoint a Committee of inquiry into the whole management of the Crown property he could not have refused his assent to such a Motion; but he could not give his vote for the Amendment of the hon. Member (Mr. Caird). It was admitted generally that the office of mineral inspector ought to be retained, and he did not therefore see upon what plea the Committee could be asked to vote for striking out the salary of £800.

MR. WILSON stated, in answer to the hon. Baronet (Sir H. Willoughby) that, as far as he knew, there was no question between the Audit Board and the office now under discussion; on the contrary, he believed the audit had been most satisfactory. As to the proposal of the hon. Baronet that the expenditure he referred to should come before the House of Commons in the shape of estimates, he could not say that the Government had come to any conclusion yet on this subject. No doubt some of the expenses might be estimated, but from the nature of the property it would be impossible to do this with other portions, or at all events they would be estimated in a very loose manner. The question, however, should receive further consideration.

MR. COWAN said, he thought that the hon. Member for Dartmouth had done good service to the country in bringing this matter before the House, and that he trusted that the result of the discussion would be the institution of a searching inquiry into the whole management of the woods and forests. The Bill for legal expenses in Scotland was much too large. The privileges of the Crown were often used as a pretext for oppressing the subject; and, in his opinion, the system of giving a solicitor an unlimited power of drawing on the Treasury for money to carry on lawsuits was a direct encouragement to such oppression.

MR. CAIRD said, in the remarks which he had made he had no intention whatever to find fault with the appointment of the mineral inspector, but he must say that the expenses of the whole department were far greater than was necessary. With regard to the legal expenses, he thought it would be much better to place the solicitor in Scotland on the same footing as the solicitor in England, and pay him by salary. In the time of James the Second, the forests yielded a larger supply of timber than they did at the present time. Crops that would not arrive at maturity in less than 150 years were not proper crops for cultivation in this country, particularly when timber could be obtained at a cheaper rate from other sources.

MR. STEUART observed, that there was no doubt great mineral wealth in the possessions of the Crown, and that a mineral inspector therefore was an officer who might prove extremely useful. He Mr. Steuart, was well acquainted with some parts of the New Forest, and believed they might be let in small allotments, or sold with advantage to the public interests. Still, he hoped that the hon. Member for Dartmouth would be content with having brought the subject before the Committee, and that he would not press his Amendment.

Motion made, and Question—

“That a sum, not exceeding £13,664, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to pay the Salaries and Expenses of the Office of Woods, Forests, and Land Revenues, to the 31st day of March 1858,” put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to; as was also the next Vote—

(17.) £217,240 Poor Law Commissions.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, that many years ago Lord Althorp promised that when the administration of the Poor Law should be brought into good working order the Commission would be abolished and the department would be attached to the Home Office. However ably the Poor Law Board was presided over at present, it was impossible to deny that it was very unpopular with the country. He wished to know, therefore, whether there was any hope now, after a lapse of nearly twenty-one years, of reducing the great expenditure of the present department, and of arriving at that happy state of things when the Poor Law Commission might be dispensed with.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that since the period to which the hon. Baronet had referred the subject had been very fully considered by Parliament, and it had been determined that the Poor Law Board should be represented in that House by a President. Under those circumstances the Act passed by which the present constitution of the Board was established, and he thought that every one must acknowledge that the result had been satisfactory. There had been since that time an officer in Parliament responsible for the management of the Poor Law, who was thoroughly acquainted with all the details of its administration, and who could at once give explanations and answer questions which might be addressed to him, without going to any other department to obtain the requisite information. He thought that the present arrangement afforded a much better administration of the Poor Law than the old system, and it was not proposed, therefore, to abandon it in order to recur to a less satisfactory mode of management.

SIR GEORGE PECHELL insisted that it was considered, generally, that the action of the Poor Law Board was not satisfactory, but that there was great room for reform. When the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Leeds (Mr. Baines) was president of that Board the popular feeling which existed against it had become much modified; but the country could not be always sure of having so able a president at the head of that department. It appeared to him (Sir G. Pechell), that the work done by the Board generally was very small, while the salaries to its staff were very large. The Board commenced its Reports with the words "We, the Commissioners," but the Reports were signed by the President only, and they rarely contained anything which was worth knowing or that was not known already. For instance the main feature of the Report of 1856 was a statement that the Commissioners had settled a dispute between the University and the town of Cambridge; and yet for this Board the country was called upon to pay £36,000, just £400 more than last year. He also thought that these Reports ought to be addressed to that House, instead of Her Majesty, the Queen. The Board appeared to have been in hot water with half the unions of the country, the disputes arising out of the most trifling matters. Recently they applied to the guardians of Gateshead for the exact quantity of the suet used in that union to a pound of flour, and the answer of the guardians was a resolution to forward one of the dumplings referred to in the application, to enable the Commissioners to judge for themselves. Again, in another case, that of the guardians of Dudley, the Board held a correspondence and carried on a litigation, extending over many months, about some petty charge of £2 10s. for plum puddings used in the union. There was no end to these cases; but the great evil was the large amount of law charges involved in them, and the House of Commons could not apply its economical principles to a better purpose than reforming this Board.

MR. C. CLIVE observed, that the law expenses under the old system were far greater than under the present Board. He wished to know what had been done with respect to the retiring allowance of Mr. Richard Hall, one of the Poor Law Inspectors, a most useful public servant, who was now broken in health, and consequently compelled to give up his appointment.

MR. P. W. MARTIN said, he could not agree with those who condemned the Poor Law Board as extravagant. It might have its faults, as what or who had not, but he considered it to be the only guardian of the helpless poor, whom it protected from the tyranny of the local authorities, and especially in the metropolitan parishes, as the blue-books would show, with respect to the parishes of St. Mary-le-bone, and Pancras.

Sir George Pechell

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY observed, he was as anxious to protect the poor from tyranny as any man, but he wished to see it done in a constitutional manner, and by constitutional means. He did not complain of the principle of the Poor Law, but of the heavy expenses connected with its administration.

MR. WILSON said, that with regard to the question of the hon. Member, he would remind the Committee that the Poor Law Board was originally an experiment, and the officers were appointed at salaries that did not contemplate any retiring allowance or payment to the superannuation fund. Consequently no deduction had been made on this latter account, and the Treasury, in dealing with Mr. Hall's case, had granted him a superannuation allowance subject to a deduction equivalent to what he would have paid had he contributed to the superannuation fund.

MR. C. CLIVE contended that such an arrangement was not fair to Mr. Hall, who had passed twenty-four years in the service of the Board, and during that period had been one of its most efficient and useful officials. No difficulty could be got over without his assistance—indeed, much of the success of the Board was owing to his exertions, and of all the public servants, he, at least, was the one most entitled to a superannuation allowance beyond a paltry £150 year which appeared to have been granted to him.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that the Poor Law Board in Ireland was much more expensive than that of England. In England there was but one Commissioner, at a salary of £2,000 a year. In Ireland there was a chief Commissioner at a salary of £2,000, and two Commissioners at salaries of £1,200 each. In England there were but forty-four clerks, in Ireland forty-seven. The English Board dealt with upwards of 600 unions, the Irish with but 120 or 130; and the sums expended for the relief of the poor in Ireland were now much less than in England.

MR. KIRK said, he wished to call the attention of the Committee to the fact that, with regard to Ireland, the Consolidated Fund only bore the expense of the Dublin office; all other expenditure being paid out of the local rates, which was not the case in England. For instance, this Vote included £28,000 for the salaries of schoolmasters and schoolmistresses, and £100,000 for medical attendance in England and Scotland, both of which charges were in Ireland defrayed out of the poor-rates.

MR. HENLEY said, he must remind the hon. Member of the charge for the constabulary in Ireland. Previous to 1846 half the charge was paid by the localities, and the other half out of the Consolidated Fund; but, after that year, the whole was thrown upon the Consolidated Fund. Depend upon it, Ireland got her fair share out of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

MR. KIRK said, that the grant referred to was for the benefit of the Irish landlords, who paid but little of the poor-rates, and to whom the second half of the grant was given about the year 1846, as a compensation for the free-trade measures which it was thought would seriously injure them. Instead of being injured, however, they had benefited by these measures.

MR. HENLEY: Then let them show their gratitude for free trade by giving up half the Vote for the constabulary.

MR. GROGAN said, that the plain fact was, that half the charge for the constabulary of Ireland was originally placed on the Consolidated Fund, because the Government appointed the whole of the officers, and had the entire control of it; but, when it was found a convenient policy to repeal the corn laws and establish free trade, the Minister of the day, Sir R. Peel, being aware that that policy would be injurious to Ireland, thought it right to place on the national Exchequer the remaining half of the charge. As the schoolmasters and half the expense of medical officers were paid in England, it was not just that the same payments were not allowed in Ireland.

MR. CROSS said, he wished to advert to the Reports of the Commissioners on Decimal Coinage, and to ask whether, as the florin piece had been struck to pave the way to the establishment for a decimal coinage, the Government would take into consideration the expediency of now going one step further, and of introducing into the currency a coin of the value of the hundredth part of a pound sterling, which seemed on all hands to be fixed as the basis of the decimal system?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the Commission appointed to report on the subject of decimal coinage was composed of very able men, who had collected evidence which was embodied in a preliminary Report, and one of the Commissioners (Lord Overstone) had accompanied that Report by a paper, in which, in the form of questions, was set forth a number of matters deserving consideration by those who wished to see an immediate change in the denominations of the coinage. The Commissioners were still prosecuting their inquiries, and it was not the intention of the Government at present to make any alteration in the denominations of the coinage by introducing such coins as cent and mil, the 100th and 1,000th part of a pound sterling. The cent would amount in value to twopence and two-fifths of a penny, and he would answer the question of the hon. Member by asking him another. Would the hon. Member who desired to see the cent introduced have it in silver or in copper? If the coin were in silver, it would be inconveniently small, and if in copper, it would be inconveniently large. Now, the Government would wait the hon. Member's solution of that dilemma before undertaking to issue a cent.

MR. CROSS said that, if the difficulty stated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer was to be considered insuperable, a decimal coinage never could be established, and the Commission might as well be abolished. He, however, did not see the great difficulty. There was already in circulation a threepenny piece, and the difference between that and a piece of the value of twopence and two-fifths of a penny was almost inappreciable. The new coin would not be so small, if the elaborate work which was put upon coins was dispensed with, and the metal beat out.

MR. HEADLAM thought the course taken by the Commissioners very unsatisfactory, as they recommended neither one thing nor the other, so as to enable the House to deal with the matter. He asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, assuming the objections to a decimal coinage to be, as he suggested, insuperable, it was desirable to maintain the florin-piece in circulation? The florin-piece would be convenient if a decimal coinage were to be established; but, if not, there would be no advantage in retaining it side by side with the halfcrown.

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE thought the course pursued by the Commission was, to a great extent, unsatisfactory to the country. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer would look to a late Report of one of the Inspectors of Schools, he would see how warmly a decimal system of calculation was advocated. He hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would again consider the matter, and see that some determination was come to; and he was sorry to perceive cold water thrown on a proposition which, if carried into effect, would be a great boon to the commercial community. He would suggest that the proposed coin should consist of an alloy, and then there would be no difficulties as to its size.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he wished not to be understood as expressing any definite opinion upon the question of decimal coinage generally, which he considered to be referred to the inquiry of a Commission. All that he did was, to answer a specific question put to him by an hon. Member, and after hearing that hon. Member's remarks in reply, he still retained his opinion that a coin of the value of twopence and two-fifths of a penny, of whatever metal composed, never could be a current coin of this country. But let him remark that the advocates of a decimal coinage were by no means unanimous. There were a variety of theories. One school of decimalists started from the pound sterling, as the unit of value, another from the penny. It by no means followed, that the coinage should be based on one coin being the 100th part of a pound. We might have a coin of 10d., and another coin of 100d., and so on, advancing from 1d., and discarding the pound altogether. That was one of the many schemes for the purpose of considering which the Commission had been appointed.

MR. CROSS said, he had collected from the Reports of the various Committees and Commissions that the pound had really been fixed upon as the basis of the coinage. One step in that direction had been taken by the issue of the florin, and as that had been found to answer so well, his object in questioning the Government was to ascertain whether they had any intention of taking another preliminary step in the same direction, which might probably answer equally well.

LORD JOHN MANNERS asked, whether any steps had been taken to call in the halfcrown?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that no steps had been taken for that purpose.

Vote agreed to; as was also

Sir William Jolliffe

(19.) 14,995, Inspectors of Factories, &c.

(20.) 6,054, Queen's Remembrancer (Scotland).

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he wished to ask, what was the nature of the duties of the Queen's Remembrancer?

MR. WILSON said, that the office of Queen's Remembrancer was one of very great importance, combining some of the duties of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Board of Inland Revenue in England. The whole of the Scotch payments to the revenue passed through his office.

Vote agreed to.

(21.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £6,431, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge of Salaries for the Officers and Attendants of the Household of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, to the 31st day of March 1858."

MR. ROEBUCK said, that this Vote would be one of the items in the bill of indictment which he meant to bring against the office of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. It was quite clear, from the details of the Estimate, that this was mere spending of money for spending's sake. For instance, there was a gentleman usher, a gentleman of the chambers, four aides-de-camp, and two gentlemen at large charged for. Anything more trumpery than the whole affair of the Viceroyalty of Ireland could scarcely be conceived, and he hoped that this was the last time the Vote would ever come before them.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he would move to reduce the Vote by £1,574, charge for Queen's Plates to be run for in Ireland.

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE defended the item, on the ground that it was for a national purpose. All our legislation in this country had been unfavourable to the improvement of the breed of horses. We taxed horses and we taxed carriages, which was, in fact, another tax upon horses, and such plates as these were the only encouragement given to the breed of horses. In all countries which had not such a good breed of horses as ours, great national establishments were kept up at the public expense. Horses in this country had been at a scarcity price, and the foreign dealers got hold of all our best. It was to Ireland that we had to look for horses of all descriptions, and if it had not been for Irish horses in the late war, we should have been very hardly put to it. Looking, therefore, to the great necessity for encouraging the breed of horses, he hoped the Committee would not agree with the Amendment of the hon. Member opposite.

MR. ROEBUCK remarked, he was astonished to hear from the hon. Baronet that these plates had anything whatever to do with keeping up the breed of horses. Surely, the scarcity price at which the foreign dealers were ready and willing to buy our horses was sufficient of itself for that purpose. This was, in truth, a little remnant of that system of protection which had been done away with in the rest of the empire; and he (Mr. Roebuck) must insist that Ireland had come to a pretty pass, if its prosperity at all depended on this Vote.

MR. MILES was afraid that the hon. Members for Sheffield and Lambeth did not ride much, or they would know the advantage of having a horse of good blood and able to get through a long day's work. Nobody knew that better than an old fox-hunter like himself. He could assure the Committee that nothing had done more to encourage the breed of horses than plates of this sort, and from what he had heard from foreign dealers, he believed that such encouragement was much wanted abroad. He admitted that this was a remnant of protection, but it was for a good purpose; but the fact was, that owing to our superior breed of horses, we sold at the dearest price, and the Government by this Vote would assist this result as much as possible.

MR. ROEBUCK said, the argument of the hon. Gentleman was a fox-hunter's argument. The Committee were told that foreigners gave such extravagant prices, that they bought our best horses, and that protection was therefore requisite. If the Vote depended upon that argument, he thought it was doomed.

MR. PALK remarked that he could not admit that the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield was not a good rider, for certainly no man rode his own hobby better or more perseveringly. The hon. and learned Gentleman was an avowed financial reformer, but if this Vote of £1,500 were expunged from the Estimates he would ask the hon. Member what fraction would go into the pocket of any individual in this country? He thought that if the grant of so small a sum tended to improve the breed of horses it was money well spent; but even if, without effecting that object, it kept up a good feeling between Ireland and this country, he considered that, simply upon such a ground, it ought to be continued.

LORD JOHN MANNERS suggested that if the hon. Member for Lambeth wished to maintain a character for consistency he ought not to divide the Committee upon this question, for some four months ago Parliament had, without a division, voted the sum required for two Queen's plates in Scotland, and he thought the hon. Gentleman would bring a hornet's nest about his ears if he robbed Ireland of a similar privilege.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that last year he divided against the Vote for Queen's plates in Scotland, and he intended now to take the sense of the Committee upon a similar Vote for Ireland. If he was defeated on this occasion, he would next year divide upon the Vote for the Scotch plates.

Motion made, and Question put, "That a sum, not exceeding £4,857, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge of Salaries for the Officers and Attendants of the Household of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, to the 31st day of March 1858."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 55; Noes 202: Majority 147.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

The following Votes were also agreed to:—

(22.) £15,358, Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

(23.) £5,118, Paymaster of Civil Services in Ireland.

(24.) £1,783, Inspectors of Lunatic Asylums in Ireland.

(25.) £15,997. Board of Public Works in Ireland.

MR. W. WILLIAMS complained that the number of officers connected with this Board was altogether unnecessary. He especially referred to the number of Commissioners, and the fact that there were two deputy chairmen when one was sufficient.

MR. WILSON said, the Board of Works in Ireland had very heavy duties to perform. The drainage works alone occupied the attention of two of the Commissioners.

Vote agreed to; as were also the following Votes.

(26.) £26,575, Auditing of Public Accounts.

(27.) £11,753, Copyhold, Inclosure and Tithe Commission.

(28.) £8,130, Inclosure, and Drainage Acts.

(29.) £26,300, General Register Office.

(30.) £2,432, General Register Office, Dublin.

(31.) £4,085, Registrar General, Edinburgh.

(32.) £8,921, National Debt Office.

(33.) £1,805, Public Works Loan Commissioners.

(34.) £1,170, West India Islands Relief Commissioners.

(35.) £1,320, Commissioners in Lunacy.

(36.) £684, County Roads, South Wales.

(37.) £1,659, Registrars of Friendly Societies.

(38.) £22,000, Secret Services.

(39.) £300,745, Stationery, Printing, &c.

MR. W. EWART said, he wished to make a suggestion with respect to the expense of printing incurred by the House. It was an indisputable fact that a great many Returns were ordered to be printed on the Motion of Members of the House, parts of which, and in some cases the whole, might already be found in Returns already granted. Some supervision over this department of the public expenditure was therefore highly necessary; and he would suggest that before an hon. Member moved for a Return he should confer with the Statistical Department of the Board of Trade, which had been organized for the express purpose of collecting and arranging the statistics of the country, in order to see whether or not the Return he desired to have was one which could be furnished by that department.

SIR FRANCIS BARING said, the expenditure for printing and stationery was enormous, and he was afraid it was one over which the House had at present very little check. The check must be applied by the Treasury. In 1848 the Treasury set to work and laid down certain checks, with a view to lessen this branch of the public expenditure, and in the course of four years they reduced it by about £80,000. The war came, however, and then the expenditure for printing and stationery was, of course, greatly augmented; and even now it was double what it was in 1852. He thought, now that there had been a return of peace, it was high time that effective measures were taken to reduce this department of the public expenditure, and he could wish to hear from his hon. Friend (Mr. Wilson) what the Treasury had done towards carrying out the recommendations made on this subject by the Controller of Stationery. When he (Sir F. Baring) was at the Admiralty he thought the expenditure for the library there was excessive, and that more expensive books were purchased than were necessary. He observed that the Controller of Stationery had made the same remark, not only as respecting the library of the Admiralty, but also those of every other public department. He (Sir F. Baring) submitted that there would never be an effectual control over this branch of expenditure until each department was rendered accountable for its own particular outlay for printing and stationery.

MR. WILSON said, the Treasury had taken steps towards carrying out the whole of the recommendations of the Controller of Stationery, with one exception, and there would be laid before the House in a day or two a Return which would show in one view the expenditure in this respect of each public department, which, he trusted, would answer as a check to some extent such as his right hon. Friend (Sir F. Baring) desired to see imposed on this part of the public expenditure. With the same view the Treasury were about to co-operate with the Printing Committee appointed by the House. At the same time, he wished to remind his right hon. Friend and the Committee that some new items were added to this Vote which did not appear in the Estimate under this head in 1852, including, among others £40,000 for patents, and £30,000 connected with the transfer from the Inland Revenue Office; so that a very large proportion of the money now included in this Vote was formerly voted under different heads, and that the increase was therefore more apparent than real.

(40.) £88,045, Postage of Letters.

MR. BENTINCK said, he thought that was an item which had better not appear on the Estimates at all, inasmuch as the result was only to play off one public department against another. Instead of having this annual charge for postage, he suggested it would be better that the public departments should return to the system of franking, and of receiving letters free of expense either to them or the writers.

MR. WILSON said, there was no doubt it was a mere transfer from one department to another, and he did not think there was much utility in it, except to show the exact amount of the Post Office receipts and expenditure. When the Penny Post Act was passed, and the privilege of franking was given up, it was thought better that the Post Office should be credited for the business it did for the other public departments.

MR. BENTINCK said, he was one of those who had always thought the Penny Post Act one of the greatest jobs ever perpetrated, and one of the greatest financial mistakes ever committed by the country. It was no use continuing the Estimate merely to test the working of the penny post.

SIR FRANCIS BARING suggested that the hon. Gentleman should try to bring back the old rates of postage, and he would then see what was the feeling of the country with regard to the penny rate. It was thought that the accounts ought to show the amount of service performed by the Post Office, and the charge was brought into the Estimates in order to put a stop at once to the gross abuse of official franks. He was inclined to think that abuse was carried to an enormous extent, and he was afraid, if they gave the public offices the right of franking, the same abuse would recur.

MR. BENTINCK said, he had never been in office, and did not know what abuses were practised by official men. The hon. Baronet was, no doubt, a better authority on that subject than himself. He did not admit the merits of an Act because it was difficult to rescind it.

MR. ROEBUCK said, there were two objects in voting this money—to know what was expended, and to check persons spending more than necessary. The appearance of this item prevented any abuse of the Post Office machinery. The “Ambassadors’ bag” in past times had been sadly weighted. Coats, lace, boots, and other articles, were sent by it, even a pianoforte, and not only a pianoforte, but a horse.

MR. BENTINCK said, it seemed to be quite true that the hon. and learned Gentleman did not know much about horses, since he imagined a horse to be sent in an ambassador’s bag.

MR. PEASE thought it fair to show the amount of work done by the Post Office.

Vote agreed to; as were also the following Votes—

- (41.) £24,130, Law Charges.
- (42.) £250,000, Prosecutions.
- (43.) £105,980, Police.
- (44.) £1,140, Crown Office, Chancery.
- (45.) £2,140, Crown Office, Queen’s Bench.

(46.) £16,319, Sheriffs.

(47.) £6,480, Registrar of Admiralty.

(48.) £7,226, Insolvent Debtors’ Court.

(49.) £109,062, County Courts.

MR. ROEBUCK inquired whether the aggregate amount of the fees derived from the suitors in County Courts was printed in the public accounts?

MR. WILSON replied that the statement of the fees in question was being prepared, and would be laid before Parliament as soon as possible.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he was informed that the fees exceeded the expenses of the County Courts, which consequently paid themselves. As a contrary impression existed, he should like to know the sum which was actually reaped from the suitors in the shape of fees.

MR. WILSON stated that before the fees were reduced last year they were inadequate to defray the expenses of the Courts. They were now, of course, still more inadequate, and the deficiency had still further increased by an increase in the salaries of the registrars. The item of £60,000 in the Vote was an estimate of the deficiency for the present year.

MR. ROEBUCK remarked that he believed that the increased expenses of the County Courts had arisen from the fact of the salaries of the high bailiffs and registrars being raised. He wanted to know whether the Treasury had received letters from County Court Judges stating that high bailiffs were not required, and that reappointments would impose an unnecessary burden upon the country.

MR. WILSON replied that communications to that effect had been received by the Treasury, and he quite agreed with the writers that high bailiffs were an unnecessary expenditure, and that in a short time the House would have to reconsider the constitution of the County Courts as far as high bailiffs were concerned.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he would ask, as such was the opinion of the hon. Gentleman, whether the Treasury had received a letter from a County Court Judge, stating that a vacancy in the office of high bailiff was about to take place in his district, and requesting to be informed what he ought to do, and whether, in answer to that communication, the Treasury had left the whole responsibility upon the Judge, thus abdicating one of its most important functions, which was to guard the public purse.

MR. WILSON replied that the hon.

Gentleman had correctly stated the purport of a letter received by the Treasury, and the nature of the answer. The Treasury was not authorized by the Act to interfere in any way with the appointment of high bailiffs, which was left to the discretion of the Judges.

MR. HENLEY suggested that in future the Estimates should be so framed as to enable the House to see what the actual expenses of the County Courts were, and also what was the entire amount received in the shape of fees. The House would then be able to ascertain whether the Courts paid themselves or not.

Vote agreed to; as were also the following Votes—

- (50.) £19,625, Police Courts.
- (51.) £63,645, Metropolitan Police.
- (52.) £2,715, Queen's Prison.
- (53.) £2,342, Lord Advocate, &c.
- (54.) £11,767, Court of Session.
- (55.) £10,029, Court of Justiciary.
- (56.) £5,550, Criminal Prosecutions.
- (57.) £1,080, Exchequer (Scotland).
- (58.) £50,000, Sheriff Courts.
- (59.) £7,955, Procurators Fiscal.
- (60.) £6,553, Sheriff Clerks.
- (61.) £2,200, Solicitor of the Crown.
- (62.) £11,067, General Register House.
- (63.) £739, Commissary Clerk.
- (64.) £1,878, Bankruptcy.
- (65.) £51,470, Criminal Prosecutions in Ireland.

MR. W. WILLIAMS would express his opinion that this portion of the Estimates required consideration. He had not expected such rapid progress to be made, and had left his copy of the Estimates with marginal annotations at home. He therefore moved that the Chairman do report progress.

MR. P. O'BRIEN observed that he thought it exceedingly strange that directly a Vote for Ireland was proposed the hon. Member for Lambeth should offer a factious opposition.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he hoped the hon. Member for Lambeth would not persist in his Motion. The Votes in this branch were not numerous, and it was desirable to proceed with them.

MR. W. WILLIAMS would admit the Votes were not numerous, but their total amount was large—£762,000, and he was not prepared at that moment to point out several items, which required explanation.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON reminded the hon. Member that he could avail himself of the interleaved copy of the Estimates on the Report.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report progress, and ask leave to sit again," put, and negatived.

Vote agreed to; as were also the following Votes:—

- (66.) £6,979, Officers of Court of Chancery.
- (67.) £1,778, Queen's Bench.
- (68.) £1,801, Common Pleas.
- (69.) £1,510, Exchequer.
- (70.) £100, Clerk to Taxing Officers.
- (71.) £3,232, Registrars.
- (72.) £1,788, Registration of Judgments.
- (73.) £200, Delegates.
- (74.) £1,866, Insolvent Debtors' Court.
- (75.) £167, Court of Errors.
- (76.) £1,100, Police Justices, Dublin.
- (77.) £24,500, Divisional Police Courts.
- (78.) £394,820, Constabulary.
- (79.) £1,479, Four Courts, Marshalsea.

House resumed; Resolutions to be reported To-morrow.

Committee to sit again on Wednesday.

ACCOMMODATION IN SHERIFFS' COURT (SCOTLAND).

On the bringing up the Report of Supply,

MR. COWAN said, he wished to ask the Lord Advocate or Home Secretary if any complaints had been received of a grievous want of accommodation for the administration of justice and for the exercise of the functions of the Sheriffs, Procurator Fiscal, and other officials, in the Sheriffs' Court in the city and for the county of Edinburgh, and if it was the intention of the Government to adopt any measures for remedying the evil? Recent changes in legislation had caused a great deal of additional work in the Sheriffs' Courts, and the accommodation was wholly insufficient. He had received a letter from one of the Gentlemen interested in this question, which, had it not been so late, he would have read to the House. He would, however, content himself with pointing out the extremely inefficient state of the public offices in this respect.

SIR JOHN OGILVY said, he was desirous of corroborating the statement which had just been made, and to bear testimony to the inadequacy of the Courts at Edinburgh and Dundee.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that, no doubt, the evil of which the hon. Member complained was very great, and required a remedy. He had been prevented by the dissolution of Parliament from proposing a general measure on the subject, but he hoped before next Session to direct the attention of the Government to the want of accommodation in the Sheriffs' Courts.

REFORMATORY SCHOOLS BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. ALCOCK hoped, if they meant to discuss the Bill, that the order for the second reading would be postponed, as at that hour of the morning (twenty minutes past twelve) it would be impossible to discuss it.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he was under the impression that no one objected to the Bill. It differed considerably from the Bill which had been before the House on a former occasion, and its main provision was to give certain powers to magistrates for the purposes of aiding in the establishment of reformatory schools. There was a measure before the other House which stood over until this measure should come before that House. It was, therefore, desirable that no unnecessary delay should take place, and, moreover, it would be difficult to name a day for the second reading of the Bill, if it was not proceeded with at that time.

MR. MILES hoped his hon. Friend would withdraw his opposition to the Bill being read a second time. He had no doubt that when the Bill went into Committee, provisions would be introduced to rectify its defects, and prevent the admission of boys of sixteen and upwards into the same establishment with younger children. By such indiscriminate association, the younger children were only corrupted and the discipline of the school destroyed. He looked upon the Bill now introduced as a compromise between the system supported by voluntary efforts and that by which the expense of the schools was provided for out of the county rates; and considering the great benefits which would be obtained by the establishment of these schools, he thought that the Bill would meet with the support of both classes.

MR. ALCOCK was again about to address the House, when he was stopped by cries of "Order."

MR. MAGUIRE trusted the hon. Gentleman would not withdraw his Amendment, because, as there was a difference on the principle of the measure, the Government ought not to press it forward at half-past twelve at night.
VOL. CXLVI. [THIRD SERIES.]

MR. P. O'BRIEN also complained at the Bill being pressed that night.

MR. HENLEY hoped, that when the Bill went into Committee, a provision would be introduced by which the children in counties where no reformatory schools could be established, by reason of the smallness of the number, might be admitted into the reformatories of the neighbouring counties on the payment of a weekly, monthly, or annual sum. He did not wish that there should be any alteration in the principle of the measure.

Motion made, and question put, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

House divided:—Ayes 154; Noes 6: Majority 148.

Bill read 2<sup>o</sup>, and committed for Thursday.

JOINT-STOCK BANKS.

COMMITTEE. LEAVE.

Acts read.

MR. LOWE, in moving that the House resolve itself into Committee to consider the laws relating to Joint-stock Banks with the view of a Bill being brought in to amend those laws, said, that at that late hour (twenty minutes to one o'clock) he would trouble the House with very few words on the subject. The law relating to Joint-stock Banks was in a very unsatisfactory state. Great difficulties were interposed by the law in the way of forming a company, and when it was formed it gained no privilege by its formation except a bare licence to trade, and was still subjected to almost every possible inconvenience which the law could accumulate upon it. Persons desirous of forming a company had first to petition the Crown for the grant of a charter. That petition was referred to the Board of Trade, which ascertained that all the requisites had been complied with. A charter was then granted containing a considerable number of conditions which formed great difficulties in the way of bond fide companies, but which were uniformly eluded, as in the case of the Royal British Bank, by companies not bond fide. That charter, which was obtained after very great delay and expense, gave a mere licence to trade, but no privilege whatever. As long as the company went on prosperously it went on just like every other corporation, but should it fall into difficulties, the unfortunate shareholders were sure to discover that they were not invested with any kind of privilege whatever, but are subject to all sorts of legal processes. They are handed over to be wound up either by a Court of Bankruptcy or by a Court of Equity, or by both together, a fight taking place as to which of the Courts shall have the privilege of winding them up. As if that was not enough, the common law jurisdiction is also put in force against the shareholders, so that, in addition to being wound up by two Courts, they are sued at common law for payment of the debts due from the Company. The object of the Bill which he desired to introduce was to remedy these evils, and the manner was very simple. It consisted, in fact, merely of repealing so much of the Joint-stock Companies Act of last year as enacted that Joint-stock Banks should not come within its operation. In future, therefore, Joint-stock Banks might be formed like any other Joint-stock Company, by a memorandum, and the application of the few simple provisions contained in that Act. There would be a register of the shareholders which would be prima facie evidence of the persons who were to be called upon to contribute. Such a bank would be liable to certain powers of inspection by one-fifth of the shareholders, and in case it came to be wound up, as soon as it was handed over to the Court which was to wind it up all actions against the shareholders would be stopped. It was proposed to retain the present limitation of shares in Joint-stock Banks to £100, and the proposed Bill would not make any alteration in the law, which at present required the liability of shareholders of Joint-stock Banks to be unlimited.

House in Committee.

MR. MALINS entirely approved the general object of the Bill, but regretted that it was not proposed to limit the liability of the shareholders in Joint-stock Banks as well as in other joint-stock undertakings. He hoped that what were understood to be the right hon. Gentleman's own views on this subject had not been overruled; but, if so, he trusted the Government would not consider that this subject had been finally decided. He felt satisfied that it was necessary for the good conduct of Joint-stock Banks, and in order to induce persons of substance to join them, to provide that such persons should not forfeit the whole of their property upon the failure of these undertakings.

MR. COWAN asked whether it was intended that this Bill should apply to Scotland?

MR. LOWE: Yes.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he was surprised to hear that the principle of limited liability was not to apply to Joint-stock Banks. He recollected very distinctly some observations made by the right hon. Gentleman when he brought in his Limited Liability Act. The right hon. Gentleman said then, that for his own part he did not see why that principle should not apply to Joint-stock Banks; and he must have seen by what had since occurred that unlimited liability did not hold out any security to the depositors, and, in fact, worked altogether pure unmingled mischief. Take the case of the London and Westminster Bank. The capital now amounted to £1,000,000; the deposits are £15,000,000. Suppose that bank should fail (which was, however, a very improbable supposition), although unmitigated ruin would fall on the shareholders, did any body believe any advantage would accrue to the depositors from the unlimited liability? In the case of the Royal British Bank the only result had been an amount of misery which should make the House shudder at its own work. From what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman on a former occasion his views on this subject were evidently clear-sighted enough; it was apparent that he thoroughly understood the work he was about; and it was supposed that he would work out the regeneration of the law on this subject. He (Mr. Roebuck) was sorry the right hon. Gentleman had departed from that which, no doubt, in his heart he believed to be right, and had bowed to a prejudice which pervaded a great many minds, but ought not to have influenced his.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY added the expression of his great disappointment that the Bill did not extend to Joint-stock Banks. It was perfectly outrageous that the only Joint-stock Companies to which the principle of limited liability would not now apply should be banking companies.

MR. HENLEY said, it must not be forgotten that the great confidence reposed by the public in Joint-stock Banks, and the vast deposits entrusted to them, arose from the fact that the depositors believed they could come upon the last acre and the last shilling of every shareholder. The public were weak enough to suppose that the proprietary of these banks would be honest enough (he would almost say) to fulfil the engagements they had entered into in the prospectuses they had so widely circulated when the concern was set afloat. If a private banker failed, you "made no bones" with him. His last acre and his last shilling were seized upon, and as far as his estate went the claims of the depositors were satisfied. It was otherwise, however, with a Joint-stock Bank. Directly a crisis came, the shareholder said, "It is very hard that we should be ruined. If we were called upon for £2,000 or £3,000, we would not mind paying it; but sooner than part with all, we will make away with our property or go abroad." The result was that the creditors were bandied about from court to court; the lawyers got a great deal of money, and the creditors and depositors very little. If the creditors of these banks were to be deprived of any means of going against the shareholders, he hoped some clause would be introduced, preventing the latter from making away with their property before the winding-up was effected. As the law now stood, every shareholder in the Royal British Bank had apparently been able to disappoint every creditor, and nobody had paid anybody anything.

COLONEL SYKES was of opinion that unlimited liability was calculated to prevent a man of capital from entering into any speculation, and regarded it, therefore, as impolitic to throw overboard the principle of limited liability.

MR. WYLD said, that in the case of the British Bank, the debts were £500,000, while the assets were £250,000, and that, as the law now stood, the shareholders were liable for the balance between the debts and the assets. The consequence was, that the shareholders endeavoured to shield themselves from the payment of the debts altogether, whereas, if their liability had been limited, they would have come forward and paid their debts.

MR. ROEBUCK said, the difference between the shareholder in Joint-stock Banks and private bankers consisted in the circumstance that the shareholders had nothing to do with the management of the business, while, with respect to the latter, the contrary was the case. He also thought it imprudent to make the holder of a single share liable for all the debts of a bank. Such a system deterred parties from joining in Joint-stock concerns. If the law was inefficient, the depositor had a fictitious security, and all the misery that the unfortunate shareholder endured afforded no substantial benefit to the depositor. If there was a greater liability attached to directorship, it might be beneficial. It might be said, that by making the responsibility of the director too great they would drive from the directory all respectable men. This was a difficulty; but he still thought that the directors who managed a concern ought to have a heavier liability than the mere shareholders, who had nothing to do with the management of the bank.

MR. HENLEY said, the shareholder was unable to obtain credit for the bank by pledging his individual responsibility. He took his share of the profits, and therefore there was no honesty in saying that he would not be prepared to meet his liabilities.

MR. BUCHANAN said, it was well worth while delaying till they ascertained how the limited liability system would work before it was introduced into banking. He believed the system of limited liability was vicious in principle, and that our commercial prosperity was in a great degree owing to the fact that our merchants, traders, and bankers were responsible for any concern with which they connected their names.

MR. HANKEY would express his regret that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe) had departed so far from principles that had been adopted by that House.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he must object to the discussion of such a measure as this at a quarter past one o'clock in the morning.

Resolved, That the Chairman be directed to move the House, That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Law relating to Joint-stock Banks.

House resumed.

Resolution reported.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. FITZROY MR. LOWE, and the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER.

House adjourned at half after One o'clock.

EXPEDITION TO CENTRAL AUSTRALIA.
QUESTION.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE begged to put a question to his noble Friend the President of the Council. When he (the Duke of Newcastle) had the honour of holding the office of Secretary for the Colonies, in 1853, an expedition was organized for exploring Central Australia, through the interior and up the Victoria River to the Gulf of Carpentaria; and he selected for the head of the expedition Mr. Gregory, a gentleman then living in Australia, who had taken part in previous exploring expeditions, and whose experience eminently qualified him for the position. He had heard that Mr. Gregory and his party had returned, and, with the exception of what related to a portion of the interior of Central Australia, the result of the expedition had been highly successful. The subject was one of great public interest, and the question he wished to ask of his noble Friend was, whether the Government had received any Report from Mr. Gregory, and if so, whether they would lay it on the table of the House? or, if there was an objection to that, whether measures would be taken to lay the result of the expedition before the public?

EARL GRANVILLE said, that it would be satisfactory to his noble Friend to know that he had made a most judicious choice when he selected Mr. Gregory for the head of the expedition. A Report had been received from the Colonial Government, in which it was stated that all the persons who went in that expedition attributed it to Mr. Gregory's skill and prudence that they had been brought back safely. It was stated that a great part of the interior was unfortunately found to be very sterile, but a great deal of fertile land had been found in the neighbourhood of the Gulf of Carpentaria, and the result of the expedition, in that respect, was successful. He agreed with his noble Friend that the subject was one upon which the public was entitled to every information which could be afforded, and there was no objection on the part of the Government to furnish all the information they possessed.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES BILL.

THIRD READING. BILL PASSED.

Bill read 3<sup>a</sup>, according to Order.

LORD REDESDALE rose to move the Amendment of which he had given notice—namely, to omit the words, “and Divorce” from the third Clause. His Lordship had further given notice, that in the event of the House agreeing to omit these words, he would move such further Amendments as might be required to deprive the Court of the power of pronouncing decrees for the dissolution of marriage. His Lordship said, that his object was to raise the question of the extent to which their Lordships were prepared to go in legislating upon this subject. There were no doubt great objections to the present constitution of the Ecclesiastical Courts, and it was desirable that they should be reformed and improved, and to the extent to which the Bill went with regard to constituting a new Court, and transferring to it jurisdiction in matrimonial causes, he proposed to offer no opposition. But he thought that their Lordships ought to have an opportunity of recording their opinions as to whether the new court which was created by the Bill should possess all the powers which it was proposed to give to it. It might be said that he moved this Amendment, and expected support, on the ground that it was not permissible to dissolve marriages; but the omission of the words which he proposed to strike out did not touch that question, and many noble Lords who did not think as he did, that marriage was indissoluble, were of opinion that in many respects this measure was premature, and that it was not desirable to invest a new and untried court with such large powers as were proposed to be conferred by this Bill, and to convert what had hitherto been a legislative into a merely judicial proceeding. There was not much discussion on the Bill till the question of divorce à vinculo was raised, and then Amendments were moved and differences of opinion arose, and a difficulty was felt by every one to pass a remedial measure on the subject. It was felt to be a dangerous step to throw open the power of divorce to the whole country; that it was one thing to grant relief in exceptional cases where there was the opportunity of instituting the fullest inquiry, and to grant relief in all cases, when the proceedings must necessarily assume a much looser character. Some noble Lords had changed their opinions during the course of the discussions; and looking at the number of Amendments and alterations that had been made during the progress of the Bill, it was impossible that the true views and opinions of their Lordships could be known. All this showed how desirable it was that the working of the new court in ecclesiastical matters should be known before they extended its powers to the extreme limit of empowering it to grant divorces à vinculo. There had been a great many petitions against the Bill, and he thought that at least a single year ought to be given in order to test public opinion and the feeling of the people with regard to such a change in the law as was contemplated by the Bill. There were no petitions in its favour; and there never had been any discontent with regard to exceptional legislation on the subject of divorce. He desired, therefore, to give the House another opportunity of expressing its opinion on the subject, and with that view proposed to omit the words "and divorce," which would raise the question in the fairest possible manner.

LORD CAMPBELL said, he was surprised to hear the noble Lord say that the country had been taken by surprise by this measure. Five long years ago a Commission was appointed to inquire into this subject; three Bills had been laid upon their Lordships' table, and one had received their assent and been sent down to the other House of Parliament. He denied that the feeling of the country was against the Bill; he said, on the contrary, that the country was resolved against the scandal of actions of crim. con., and the proceedings before their Lordships on Bills of divorce. The noble Lord said that there were few petitions for the Bill, but who was to petition in its favour? Was it to be the injured husband in contemplation? The petitions which had been presented against the Bill had proceeded upon misapprehension, not to say misrepresentation. They alleged that this Bill would introduce laxity of proceeding, and would enable every one to obtain a divorce. Practically speaking, this measure would make no alteration in the law; it would only confide its administration to a different tribunal. Hitherto the two Houses of Parliament had decided cases of divorce nominally legislatively, but really judicially; this Bill would erect a judicial tribunal before which such cases could be judicially considered and satisfactorily decided. It was a poor compliment to those who would constitute that court to say that the cases would be dealt with in a slovenly manner and without sufficient pains being bestowed upon them. The men who were to fill the office of Judges in it were well versed in judicial proceedings; he knew not that any complaint of neglect of their duties had ever been made against them, and it was not likely that they would now forfeit their high reputations.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY confessed he was one who had come to the same conclusion on the matter as that expressed by a noble Earl (Earl Grey) in his speech the other evening upon this subject; and every word he had heard in relation to it only tended still further to prove to him that the difficulty of legislating upon it was much greater than he had at first believed. Although he voted last year for the second reading of the Bill, he had since given the subject much greater consideration than he had ever done before; and he must say, from all he had heard and seen, he was convinced that they were very far from finding a solution of the difficulty in the measure before the House. It was said that this Bill would remove the hardship to which, under the existing law, the woman was subjected; but how was that to be done? By the existing law the woman received her punishment for the crime of adultery, though her offence was not considered in the light of a public sin, but that of a private wrong, and the public showed their feelings by turning their back upon the guilty woman. But what were they doing now? They would bring her before a judicial tribunal, and make her liable to a disgraceful punishment. By the provisions of the present Bill she might be condemned to prison like a drunken prostitute or shoplifter. Then it had been urged that the present law on the subject was a scandal, inasmuch as, under it, public decency was violated, and even morality endangered, by the perusal of such trials in the press. But, had they remedied that evil by the present Bill? He submitted it was impossible in this country, if they wished full justice to be done, to avoid exposure. The Court could not sit with closed doors, and therefore all its proceedings would be published in the newspapers. They could not prevent those publications in a country like this, which possessed a free press: therefore the scandal of a trial in those divorce cases would not be got rid of; the clause in relation to it would rather have the effect of increasing the scandal. A third objection raised against the existing law was, that the lower classes of this country were shut out from the privileges which the law exclusively gave to the rich in obtaining a divorce. He confessed he did not think that the measure before the House brought those privileges nearer to the working classes. A single court in London might, no doubt, be rendered useful to all classes residing within the metropolis; but the people in the provinces would not receive, as far as he could understand, any greater benefit from the measure than they possessed under the existing law. But what he principally objected to in this Bill was, its making the crime of adultery a public crime instead of a private wrong. He felt all the infamy of the action of crim. con., but there was a principle involved in that proceeding—it showed that this was a private wrong, and not a public crime. He knew that some of the right rev. Prelates had argued that, inasmuch as adultery was a great sin, it ought to be considered as a public wrong, and that it should be publicly punished. He admitted the enormity of the crime, but he contended that they could not legislate civilly upon the Decalogue. We boasted of our religious liberty, and therefore could not legislate upon the first or second commandments. On the third we had tried to legislate, but had failed. With regard to the fourth, we had met with such difficulties that our legislation was a mass of contradictions, and absurd in the eyes of the public. The public could not interfere with adultery as with theft or murder. They could take no steps for its prevention. How would a man be treated who went to a husband, and told him that he ought to look sharper after his wife? He protested, not only as a legislator, but with all the natural feelings of a gentleman, against the adultery of the woman being considered a public crime, and against her being dragged before the public and punished by imprisonment. He thought that the fact of a woman being treated in that manner would operate to prevent men from petitioning the Court. Few would like to see their wives dragged to prison, and treated as criminals. He did not go so far as to say that there ought to be no divorce; for it would be very hard that a man should be tied for life to a profligate woman; but a great mistake had been made by this Bill, in the manner in which it treated the question. It was purely a moral question, a question of private wrong, and not a matter of police. The protection of the property of married women was an entirely different matter, but this Bill had confounded the two. No doubt the majority of their Lordships would be desirous of seeing divorce obtainable, under certain circumstances, but in a manner which should avoid all public scandal, and which would not bear the appearance of revenge on the woman. Nothing had surprised him more throughout these discussions than the extraordinary ignorance of human nature and human feelings which some of the most eloquent of their Lordships had displayed in handling this question. For himself, he would only say that, after having supported the Bill of last Session for facilitating divorce, and having supported the second reading of the present Bill, he felt constrained to mark his disapproval of the measure in its altered shape, by voting for the Amendment of his noble Friend.

THE EARL OF WICKLOW said, that when first this question had come before their Lordships he had been induced to support a proposition for facilitating divorces, from a feeling that the rich man ought not to be placed at such an advantage over the poor man in this respect. That he still thought an evil which ought to be remedied; but, on mature consideration, he felt bound to say that the arguments urged against this Bill were infinitely stronger than that single one in its favour. He should rejoice greatly if his noble Friend on the woolsack would consent to the Amendment of the noble Baron opposite. It would be infinitely better that the Amendment of the existing law set forth in the preamble, of which he heartily approved, should be first carried out before attempting to make any new law with regard to so important a subject as divorce. The moment the Bill stepped out of the preamble it was opposed to the existing law of the land and to the law of God. By both of these marriage was indissoluble, and this Bill, if passed into law, would be the first great inroad on that principle. Indissolubility of marriage was the law of the Catholic Church of England and of the Catholic Church of Rome, and the very necessity of requiring that in all cases of divorce à vinculo the parties should apply to Parliament for a private Bill proved that such divorces were contrary to the spirit of the law of England. As the noble Lord who moved the Amendment had said, the public at large were taken by surprise by this Bill. No doubt the question had been under discussion now for some time before Committees and Commissions, but it had never been discussed publicly. It had been said that the argument that by the existing law of the land marriage was indissoluble was advanced a century and a-half too late, because during that time divorces had been granted every year; but every case of a private Bill introduced to grant a divorce only showed that by the common law divorce was impossible. On the religious part of the case he would content himself with saying that he was thoroughly convinced the law of Scripture was opposed to this Bill. There was an opinion abroad—he did not know whether it had found an echo in that House during these debates—that there was a tendency in some portions of the community towards Rome, and that those who had opposed this Bill were of that party. Circumstances had occurred of late years to give a colouring to that opinion, but it was entirely destitute of any real foundation. The general tendency was quite the reverse—it was towards the loose theories of German Protestantism; and he believed that this Bill was entirely in that direction. In Germany, they were told, it was as easy to get rid of a wife as it was to get rid of a servant with us. If this Bill were passed, and the principle of the indissolubility of marriage were once broken through, Parliament would be asked before long to go further in the same direction, and he hoped therefore that their Lordships would resist the first step by affirming the Amendment.

LORD BROUGHAM said, he rose to administer some relief to the two noble Lords who had preceded him, having great respect for their opinions and their scruples, from the burden which this Bill appeared to have imposed upon their minds. The sum and substance of their objection to the Bill seemed to be that a change was about to be made in the existing law, which had always declared divorce to be impossible in proportion as marriage was by that law indissoluble. But, in point of fact, the law was violated and set at nought just as often as their Lordships were called on to do so, and all the conditions required were complied with. He did not say that every marriage was dissolved on such application being made; but the rule had constantly been that as often as certain conditions were fulfilled and certain requisites complied with the party petitioning for a divorce had his marriage dissolved, and that as a matter of course. It was, indeed, just as much a matter of course as that in an action at law the jury should return a verdict according to the evidence and the oath they had taken, and that judgment should be entered on the verdict. Did it not, therefore, amount to a jest to talk of indissolubility in such a case as this? To illustrate the extraordinary character of their present mode of proceeding, he might state that it was a Standing Order of their Lordships' House, not only that no divorce Bill should pass, but that no such Bill should be even presented to the House, unless it contained, among other things, a clause forbidding the subsequent marriage of the adulterer and the adúlress. But what followed? Why, this clause, which the Standing Order rendered imperative, was uniformly struck from the Bill in Committee. Was this a consistent or intelligible course to pursue? Was it consistent with the dignity of their Lordships' House that such a mockery should be practised with regard to a matter so important by one of their Standing Orders? Surely it was far better that the substance should be substituted for the form, and that divorce should be in reality what it now was in practice, simply a judicial act. His noble Friend the Lord Chief Justice had very properly reminded their Lordships that no one could have been taken by surprise by this Bill, for it was the third time that such a measure had been before their Lordships; and, indeed, he could recollect many years ago being upon a Committee with his noble Friend behind him (Lord Lyndhurst), in which they discussed the policy of transferring the determination of all questions of divorce from before their Lordships to a fixed tribunal, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. And the proposal was only rejected on the ground that that tribunal was already overlaid with business. It had been said that if they made divorce in reality a judicial proceeding, to be dealt with judicially like other matters, it would become a matter of course to comply with every petition for divorce; but such an idea would never be entertained by any person who had the least professional experience. He would venture to express the opinion that, if there was any one particular class of cases likely to command greater attention than another, it would be the divorce cases brought before these tribunals. That, he was satisfied, would be in accordance with the experience of all professional men, for the Judges, pure and exalted as they might be, were not exalted above all human thoughts and human feelings, curiosity included; and even the purest and sternest of mortals, in dealing with such questions as these, would not fail to give to them the most careful and deliberate attention. But, independently of the interest that would naturally be excited in such cases, their very importance would secure for them the fullest and most searching inquiry. No court that could be established, no professional man raised to the situation of a Judge, would ever be found deviating from the strict rule of anxiously sifting and searching into the nature of the whole of these cases. Suspicion seized the minds of Judges as well as other men; and the suspicion that all was not so right in the case of the petitioners, and that all was not so wrong in that of the defendant as might be represented, was sure to enter deeply into their minds, and lead them to a thorough and sifting investigation. All circumstances must be proved before the Judges, as at present in that House. Let it not be supposed that there would be any very great increase in the number of divorces, although undoubtedly there might be some slight increase when the hindrances which were presented at present to persons of small means who wished to obtain divorces were removed. If justice were denied by reason of the expense, the delay, and vexation attending the present court, probably more parties would resort to the new tribunal, in order to obtain that redress which had hitherto been virtually denied. But was that an evil? On the contrary, it was a step in the right direction. Look to the example of Scotland upon that point. In no part of Christendom was there a more sacred regard for, or more reverential awe of, the Holy Scriptures than in Scotland; nowhere were there greater safeguards for the people and for the ministers than on this point; yet there, from time out of mind, had divorces been granted upon proper application to the courts. He did not quote the case of Scotland in order to prove that noble Lords who objected to follow her example were wrong in their views, but simply to show the opinion of that most religious people as to the dissolubility of marriage. Quitting, however, the theological question, he thought the example of Scotland was most important in another way. Noble Lords had said, if the law were relaxed, and divorces were made more easily procurable by the poorer classes, the number of applications would be alarmingly increased. But how was it in Scotland, where a law had existed so long, and which enabled an aggrieved person at a moderate cost to obtain the relief he desired? Instead of divorces being frequent, there were only seventeen in one year, and in two other years the number of divorces granted was respectively ten and twenty. He had, therefore, no apprehension that any measure rendering the law somewhat, although not altogether, equal as between rich and poor, would have the effect of inducing a frequency of divorces. But an objection had been urged against the Bill upon the ground that, if it were passed, Parliament would immediately be asked to go further, and there was no knowing where such legislation would stop. That objection might be raised against every change in the law, and the proper answer to it was, "Wait until any unreasonable proposition is brought forward, and then oppose it." There was, however, one point in the Bill which he thought required consideration, and that was the nature of the penalty to be inflicted upon the guilty parties. He was in favour of treating adultery as a misdemeanour, but not as one punishable by fine or imprisonment at the option of the Court. He thought the penalty should be absolutely a pecuniary one, as, among other objections to the infliction of imprisonment for adultery, he could never consent to permit persons to be tried, convicted, and punished, without the intervention of a jury. Besides, after obtaining a divorce, no husband would like to proceed to a prosecution of the woman whom he had put away. The abolition of the action for criminal conversation well deserved the serious consideration of their Lordships. He had received communications from many parties, including persons of high judicial authority, offering objections to this part of the measure, or, at least, insisting upon the necessity of providing some efficient substitute. He was the more disposed to listen to the complaints of his correspondents, because some of the parties suing for divorce belonged to the humbler classes of society, to whom the loss of a wife was a serious pecuniary evil. In the upper ranks it was a question of feeling rather than of personal interest, and it might very well be said, that an injury to the feelings of a party was not a matter for pecuniary compensation. But to a poor man the loss of the services of his wife—the loss of the benefit which he derived from her superintendence of his family, and the arrangement and management of his household, was a serious pecuniary loss, and he could not help thinking that some remedy should be provided for such a case. A proposition had been submitted to their Lordships for defraying the expenses of the husband in suing for a divorce; but he went further and said, that out of the fine the Court should award to the husband some compensation for the loss he had sustained, and he thought that if some such provision were adopted, the objections to this part of the measure would be obviated. He knew that a learned Judge denied that suing for damages was inconsistent with the nature of the injury inflicted upon the feelings of the husband, and he instanced the case of libel where a man's character and honour had been assailed, and where pecuniary compensation was made. He thought, if some such alterations were made, the Bill would go down to the other House with the best possible prospect of success. Far be it from him to hold out anything like a menace as to the course which the other House might think fit to pursue, or the fear of a collision with the other House—that was often talked of, but it was absurd, contradictory to the fact, and there had been no great risk whatever upon any of those occasions; but, at the same time, he would deprecate anything which might, for no good or useful purpose, tend to break the harmony which existed between the two branches of the Legislature. He therefore hoped and trusted that their Lordships would pass the Bill as it now stood, with the exception of the imprisonment of the adulterers. But if the Bill were altered in the direction indicated by the proposed Amendments, he feared the measure would have little chance of passing the other House.

LORD WENSLEYDALE said, there could be no question as to what the law of England was. By the law of England it was, and had been, impossible to pronounce a divorce à vinculo matrimonii. Cranmer, at the time of the Reformation, attempted to alter it; but he failed. It could not be done without the special interference of the Legislature on each and every occasion. But as the Legislature had sanctioned divorce for two centuries, the proposal before their Lordships was to substitute for the present Legislative action a regularly constituted judicial body. The question was, should that proposal become the law of the land. He confessed that although entertaining considerable doubts upon the subject at first, yet, after their Lordships had sanctioned the Bill upon two occasions, after it had been sanctioned by a Commission consisting of many learned men, he had come to the conclusion that he should not be justified in supporting the Amendment of the noble Lord.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, that the Bill might be objected to, if on no other ground than the variety of metamorphoses which it had undergone. The Bill established a new court, provided protection for women who had been deserted by their husbands, and abolished the action for criminal conversation. These were all very important matters; but to them it was proposed to add the power of granting divorces. Now the proposal of his noble Friend (Lord Redesdale) was not to reject the Bill, but to secure that that matter should undergo further and more satisfactory discussion. It had been said that the subject had been exhausted, but he thought the variety of Amendments showed that the matter was far from a satisfactory settlement.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD said, there were many of their Lordships who believed that, whatever doubts there might be as to the general power of remarriage after divorce, there was no doubt that the words of our Lord forbade the adulterous woman remarrying in the lifetime of her husband. If they passed the Amendment of the noble Lord opposite they sanctioned all the Amendments of the law contemplated by the Bill short of that which made such marriages possible; but if the Amendment were rejected and the Bill passed in its present shape, they intentionally and knowingly declared that the law of England should contradict the law of Christ. He believed that this question of divorce had not yet made entrance into the public mind. He had that day received a letter saying that the clergy themselves were only beginning to awake to what were the proposed alterations. He therefore thought it highly expedient, while they organized the new court, to allow the question to rest;—not that he would have the law continue always as at present, a system of privilegia, but that he would avoid a settlement of what the law should be with respect to divorce à vinculo until it had been more thoroughly ventilated in the public mind. Earnestly desiring, as he did, to effect the improvements which the rest of the Bill contemplated, he hoped the Government would not make it necessary for him to move the rejection of the measure on the question that the Bill do pass, by refusing to adopt the Amendment now proposed.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR thought it necessary, before putting the question from the woolsack, to remove the erroneous impresson which would probably be produced by what had just fallen from the right rev. Prelate. The right rev. Prelate said that many Members of their Lordships' House disapproved of that portion of the Bill which enabled the adulterous woman to remarry in the lifetime of her husband, and left it to be inferred that this Amendment would remedy that objection; but the Amendment, in fact, would offer no such remedy, except so far as it would tend to reject the Bill altogether. He must complain of the course which his noble Friend had taken in moving that Amendment. Their Lordships might rely upon it that the forms of their proceedings were founded substantially upon good sense. When it was proposed to read a Bill a third time, any noble Lord would do right to vote for its being read a third time that day six months if he thought that it could never be made, with any Amendments, a proper measure; but if he thought that with Amendments it could be made a proper measure, he ought to allow the Bill to be read a third time, and propose Amendments on the question that the Bill do pass. The course taken by the noble Lord was to propose on the third reading different Amendments which, in substance, were absolutely idle—namely, that the new Court, instead of being called a Court of Marriage and Divorce, should be called a Court of Marriage. If the Amendments stopped there the alteration would be very incongruous, because the object of the Bill was to enable the Court to grant divorces, and therefore it was a Court of Marriage and Divorce. The proposition went further, “and to make such Amendments as shall be consequent thereon.” What was meant by consequent thereon? Did it mean as far only as was consequent upon altering the name of the Court, or did it mean to make the Bill totally different from that which their Lordships had considered in Committee? He thought the course taken by the noble Lord very inconvenient. The question really raised by the Amendment was, were they or were they not prepared to sanction a measure to make divorce à vinculo a judicial instead of a legislative proceeding? He could hardly conceive that any one would gravely state that the measure took the public by surprise. Seven or eight years ago a Royal Commission issued to inquire into the subject. Four or five years ago the Commission made their report. Four or five Bills had been introduced at various times, and a Select Committee of their Lordships looked into the question last year, with a degree of care and accuracy which had been rarely equalled and never surpassed. To be gravely told that the discussion of the Bill at the last stage took the country by surprise was an attempt to draw very largely upon the credulity of their Lordships. If the question were not now ripe for decision, he wanted to know at what period of the world's history would it ever be ripe? He would only add in answer to his noble Friend (the Earl of Wicklow) that if he believed the Bill calculated to lead to those evils which were figured as making the marriage bond too lax in some of the Northern States of Germany, he would throw it in the fire rather than ask their Lordships to sanction it. He thought it would have no such consequences. For 200 years the principle of the Bill had been in operation, and scarcely a single attempt had been made to gain divorce for any cause but adultery. If the feeling of the country had not been altered for 200 years, he did not believe the change from a legislative to a judicial proceeding would have any effect whatever, and the simple question now was whether the character of the tribunal should be changed. A suggestion had been thrown out that the anticipation of justice being made accessible to the poor would not be realized. Now, that he altogether denied. It was perfectly true that the rich enjoyed advantages which the poor did not possess; but that was a state of things which was incidental to the very existence of men in society, and which no legislation could obviate. The rich, for instance, could always command the services of the ablest lawyers, while the poor man was not in a position to avail himself of their aid.

There was, however, no good reason why, in the tribunal which the Bill proposed to establish, the expense of a suit should involve the outlay of one farthing more than if it had been instituted before a Judge whose jurisdiction did not extend beyond actions for the recovery of the small sum of £5. He might add that the poor man, in cases relating to property, might now sue in formâ pauperis in the courts of Westminster, and the Judges of the new tribunal would in framing the rules for the conduct of its business, be enabled to extend the system of suing in formâ pauperis as far as might seem to be expedient. There could be no doubt, at all events, that the effect of the Bill would be to enlarge the area of those persons who were entitled to claim the relief which it provided, and he therefore trusted that their Lordships would reject all Amendments which had for their object, either directly or indirectly, to render valueless that which was the substantial feature of the measure.

THE BISHOP OF BANGOR made a few observations, which were inaudible.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE pointed out the difference which existed in the law of Scotland from that of England, and mentioned that in a case where a divorce had been granted in Scotland on the ground of adultery by the husband, and the woman thinking herself released from the first marriage had married again in England, that second marriage had been declared illegal, and she had been convicted of bigamy. It ought, therefore, even as a matter of expediency, to be settled clearly what would be the effect of such a divorce and remarriage under this Act. He also argued that upon the principles of justice there ought to be no difference in the operation of the law in the case of the husband and of the wife. He therefore proposed in the clause giving divorce to the wife for adultery accompanied by incest, or other aggravating circumstances, to omit the word "incestuous."

LORD CAMPBELL said, the principle advocated by the noble Lord was very popular, but he must oppose it. The Commissioners had come to the conclusion that it would not be desirable to allow the same privilege to the wife as to the husband, which would be altering the state of the law, which had been unchanged for centuries, and they had decided that divorce should not be granted to the wife on the ground of adultery, unless with such aggravation as would render it impossible for the parties to live together. It never had been granted, and he, for one, was not bold enough to alter the universal custom, notwithstanding the example of the law of Scotland.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR rose to move an Amendment in the 31st clause, of which notice had been given by his noble and learned Friend Lord St. Leonards. His noble and learned Friend being unable to be present he had undertaken to move this Amendment for him, concurring as he did entirely in the justness and expediency of it. The proposed Amendment was to be made in the clause providing that the adulterer should be liable to a fine or imprisonment, and the wife to imprisonment. As the clause originally stood, the "fine" applied as well to the wife as to the adulterer. That had, however, been altered, as it was absurd to fine a married woman, who would probably have no property apart from the husband, at whose instance the fine was to be imposed. The clause had therefore been altered so as to leave the wife liable to imprisonment only. It had then occurred to his noble and learned Friend that it would be throwing a great obstacle in the way of the object of the Bill if the wife were to be subjected to imprisonment; for a husband, however ill a wife might have behaved, would hesitate to proceed for a divorce the necessary consequence of which would be the wife's imprisonment. In this view of his noble and learned Friend he concurred, and he therefore moved an Amendment, the object of which was to free the wife from this liability to imprisonment.

Amendment moved—

"To omit (pass upon the guilty Parties, or either of them, Sentence of Fine and Imprisonment, or Fine or Imprisonment, as though such Party had been convicted of a Misdemeanour at Common Law, and the Court may further order the guilty Parties or either of them;") and insert

The Earl of Donoughmore

("Impose upon the Adulterer a Fine, and order him").

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD said, that if these words were struck out, the last guard of purity of married life would be removed, as far as the poorer classes were concerned. There would be nothing to prevent a woman who desired a new husband, and whose husband desired a new wife, from going to live with the man whom she preferred. Her husband would then proceed against the paramour, obtain a divorce, and marry again. The woman would marry her paramour, and assume precisely the same position as before her divorce, moving, as before, in the society of her equals, who would consider her as being, to use their own expression, made an honest woman again, and she would suffer no loss of caste whatever. The law would leave no check whatever upon the woman, and the most unbridled licentiousness would prevail among the lower classes.

EARL NELSON moved an Amendment upon the 54th clause, which permits the remarriage of divorced persons, providing that in case of the remarriage of divorced persons such marriage should take place in the office of the registrar, or in some building registered under the Marriage and Registration Act, and according to the form and provisions of that Act. The object of this Amendment was to save the consciences of the clergy, of whom many were averse to these marriages, and to provide that, as this matter had been argued on purely civil grounds, so the remarriage, if it took place, should be only a civil marriage. Unless this Amendment were agreed to, a very large portion of the clergy of the Established Church (with the Archbishop at the head) who believed that marriage was indissoluble, and that the marriage of the adulterer and adulteress was sinful, would be obliged to perform that marriage and to read the solemn service established for that ceremony by the Church of England. There had been some question, as to whether the law of the Church was opposed to this legislation; but, be that as it might, there occurred in one of the prayers for the marriage service these words, "that it should never be lawful to put asunder those whom Thou by matrimony hast made one," and the marriage service itself referred to the married parties as so knit together, that it should never be lawful to put them asunder. Could any conscientious clergyman who believed that this legislation was contrary to the law of God, celebrate such a marriage; or could he pronounce God's blessing over the parties, and thus confirm them in their adultery? The clergy had entered into a contract with the State, they had signed the Thirty-nine Articles, and yet the State, without consulting the clergy, broke that, imposed a Fortieth Article without obtaining their assent to it, and demanded from them the discharge of a duty which they had not contracted to perform, and which they considered directly repugnant to Scripture. It might be said that, under the present system, clergymen had already married divorced persons; but these would naturally go to be married at places where they were not known, so that the clergyman would have no opportunity of finding out what they were. It was said, too, that in relieving the consciences of the clergy, the consciences of the laity might be endangered; but surely, as this privilege of divorce had been obtained on civil grounds, the parties who had obtained it might remain content with a civil marriage. But, even then, the Marriage and Registration Acts allowed parties who had been married by the registrar to be remarried by a clergyman, and this course was open to persons remarried after divorce if they could find a clergyman ready to perform the religious ceremony over them. Those who put the conscience of the registrar in comparison with the consciences of the clergy clearly did not understand the position in which the clergy were placed by this Bill. The registrar had merely to perform an official duty of registering certain names in a book. He had not to pronounce the Church's blessing over the parties, nor to do anything which gave a religious character to the ceremony. Besides, if he objected to performing these marriages, he was not obliged to be a registrar, all the other professions were open to him; but a clergyman, if he had such objections and acted on them, must starve. It was said that this Amendment would endanger the union between Church and State; but the only union which it would endanger, would be that which would give us a clergy without a conscience. The union between Church and State might be kept up by doing justice to the Church, and by the Church obeying where she was pledged to obey; but by this Bill the State was proposing to do that towards the Church, which would be looked upon as dishonest in transactions between man and man. It was true that not many petitions had been presented on the subject; but he had received many letters from clergymen expressing very strongly their feelings with reference to it. He considered that his Amendment was based upon Christian principles, and it had always appeared to him that in arguing this question the supporters of the Bill had placed themselves between the horns of a dilemma, because they undertook to make a change in the ecclesiastical law, while all the arguments brought forward to support that alteration were of a civil nature. When making an alteration in the ecclesiastical law, they ought, at all events, to see whether it was borne out by Scripture. He contended that if they did away with an ecclesiastical statute on purely civil grounds, by which marriages not hitherto legal were made so, they were bound to relieve clergymen from the performance of such marriages.

Amendment moved,

“To insert after the words (‘to marry again,’) the following words (‘in the office of the registrar, or in any building registered under the Marriage and Registration Acts, according to the manner and form, and subject to the provisions contained in the said Acts.’)”

THE EARL OF WINCHILSEA said, that there could be no doubt whatever that the great majority of the clergy entertained the most conscientious scruples to the marriage of an adulterer or adulteress, during the lifetime of her husband, as being in direct opposition to the expressed Word of God; and it was on that ground that he rested his opposition to this measure. They were attempting to introduce an alteration which was in direct opposition to the religious feeling, not only of the clergy, but of the mass of their fellow-countrymen. He objected also to the proposed tribunal, which would be accessible only to the rich; for it was not to be expected that the poor people would be able to afford the expense of bringing up their witnesses to the metropolis from Cumberland or Cornwall. If there were no other objections to the Bill, instead of being so many, he thought the objections to the machinery ought in themselves to ensure its rejection. He denied entirely that it would give the redress which was the only excuse of its enactment. To be applicable to all, rich as well as poor, it should, at least, be equal in its operation, which would not be the case for the reason he had pointed out. But, above all, he objected to this Bill, because he thought the Legislature was not justified in wounding the consciences of the clergy by compelling them to celebrate such marriages, and to administer to them the most sacred rites of the Church; and he, for one, would never give his assent to it.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR complained that this question should be again argued at this stage of the measure, when the House had already twice declared an opinion adverse to the Amendment, once in the Committee by a very full House, and again on the recommittal of the Bill, in the self-same words, on the Motion of the noble Earl. It was now mooted for the third time. Undoubtedly his noble Friend had a right to call upon their Lordships to reconsider the matter; but he (the Lord Chancellor) thought that unless they were satisfied that some strange oversight had been committed, or that they had not properly understood the question before them, they ought not on slight grounds to disturb the decision to which their Lordships had arrived, after mature consideration. It appeared to him that the plea that the consciences of the clergy would be interfered with could not stand for a moment, for the simple reason that if a tender conscience was to justify a man in his disobedience of the law, there was no knowing where it was to stop. It was only two or three years ago since the case of the tender conscience of a clergyman who refused to bury certain persons was brought before the House, and it was then after debate by their Lordships expressly decided that no man could set his opinion up above the law, and therefore act in disobedience to the law—that clergymen were bound by the law of the land, and must obey it. For his part, he saw no difference in principle between the two cases. If the law of the land declared it to be lawful that certain parties might marry, it was a law that must be obeyed. If persons were separated by a divorce, and the law gave them the power to marry again, what reason was there why they should not be allowed to marry in the same manner as the rest of Her Majesty’s subjects. An attempt had been made to meet the difficulty by proposing that the marriage should take place only at the registrar’s office in such cases; but many persons might feel a repugnance to that. An objection also was that the Registration of Marriages Act gave the power to persons who had been married at the registrar’s office to demand to be subsequently married in a church if they were so disposed; and therefore the conscientious objection of the clergy would not be set at rest. He did not, however, altogether coincide in such a view of the case, because it was extremely doubtful whether, if a marriage took place under the present Act, the fact of its being in a registrar’s office would entitle the parties to take advantage of the Registration Act, and demand to be married again in a church; indeed, if it were declared that divorced parties should be allowed to marry at the registrar's office, the implication would be that they should be married there only. But on the short grounds that the law of the land must be paramount over religious scruples, and taking into consideration that by the law persons divorced under this Act would be in the position of unmarried persons, and were therefore entitled to be married in the same manner as Her Majesty's other subjects, he called upon their Lordships to reject the Amendment.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD said, the Amendment had been drawn with a view to meet the objection of the noble and learned Lord. The words were "in the office of any registrar, or in any building registered under the Marriage and Registration Acts, according to the manner and form, and subject to the provisions contained in the said Acts." No new power of marrying by a registrar was created, but the power was to be subject to the provisions contained in that Act, one of which was that the religious ceremony might be afterwards performed if the parties chose, and could find a clergyman to officiate. The noble and learned Lord had compared the scruples of the clergy to marry divorced persons with those which were entertained by some respecting the reading of the burial service in particular cases, but in truth there was a vast difference. Every clergyman who held an office in the Church accepted such office with the knowledge that he was to act in accordance with the law of the realm; but the hardship which he complained of in the present instance was that, after clergymen had taken upon themselves an office which they could not vacate, the Legislature was about to alter the law of the land, and to compel them to act in a manner which they considered to be contrary to the laws of God. He did not wish to prolong a needless discussion, for he gathered from what had passed, that a majority against the Amendment had been secured; but he desired to impress upon their Lordships the deep interest with which the question was viewed by many of the most estimable clergymen of the Church of England. He had on a previous evening read a letter from an archdeacon in the diocese of Gloucester, a most respected and aged clergyman, and holding what were known as Evangelical opinions, in which he declared that the Bill, if passed, imposing the necessity of administering the sacred rite of marriage to a person who had been divorced for adultery, would be a cruel and oppressive act towards the Church of England. It had been urged against the Amendment that there was no precedent for it. But that was a mistake, for in the Marriage Act of last year a similar clause had been introduced; and in 1850, when a highly respected Friend of his (Mr. S. Wortley) introduced a Bill to legalize the marriage of a widower with a deceased wife's sister, he expressly declared that he did not seek to force the clergy to perform those marriages, but to leave it to the clergy to celebrate those marriages or not, according to their own consciences, without any respect to civil consequences, the law of the Church being left as before. He contended, therefore, there were precedents for such a clause as was now proposed, and he besought their Lordships to follow those precedents, and for the sake of the Church of England not to tamper with the conscience of those men who were placed in the position of its teachers. It was true that the Government had a majority, but even were the clause rejected, the question would still remain unsettled. Dissatisfaction would be spread throughout the Church at an alteration in the conditions upon which conscientious clergymen held their offices, and which put them to the alternative of yielding their benefices, or of acting, as they believed, contrary to the word of God. Surely the conscientious scruples of clergymen of the Church of England were not to be less regarded than the conscientious scruples of any other class of Her Majesty's subjects. They had undertaken to obey the law of the land, which was in accordance with the word of God. It was now proposed to change that law in a manner they conceived to be contrary to God's word, and yet they were called upon to sacrifice their consciences or give up their offices. He hoped their Lordships would pause before they inflicted so great a wrong upon the clergy of England.

LORD CAMPBELL wished to point out that the right reverend Prelate was mistaken in supposing that this Amendment had reference solely to the adulteress. It was levelled against the innocent husband, who might have been a pattern of fidelity. If the husband had had the misfortune to be united to an unfaithful wife, having cherished her, and done all that was required of him by the vow which he took at the altar of God, and if his marriage with her had been dissolved, by this Amendment he would be stigmatized, inasmuch as, in the event of his remarrying, he could only be married before the registrar, a form of marriage which might be utterly opposed to his conscience. Noble Lords who said so much about the consciences of the clergy should show some respect for the conscience of the innocent and exemplary husband, who might consider marriage before the registrar profane and degrading.

LORD REDESDALE said, he thought that the hardship was more imaginary than real, although he should certainly not consider himself married unless the ceremony was a religious one, and if he were married before a registrar would have the ceremony afterwards performed by a clergyman. But what position were the clergy to be placed in? They were to be called on to declare that God had joined together persons whom they believed to be not so joined, and while all the time they were convinced that the marriage was nothing but a hollow mockery. He complained that the Government had made the Bill a party measure, and therefore had ready all that machinery which was brought into requisition when it was necessary, in their opinion, to pass a measure the responsibility of which they had undertaken. But on the other side it was not treated as a party question, and he earnestly trusted that in the divisions which took place their Lordships would be guided only by their conscientious convictions on the subject.

THE BISHOP OF EXETER observed, that, on the whole, considering the special difficulties in which this subject was involved, he thought the plan proposed by the Government was the best. He agreed with the noble and learned Lord Chief Justice that it would be a cruel indignity to the injured husband to compel him to be married before a registrar; he could not consent to confound the innocent with the guilty, and must, therefore, oppose the Amendment. He reminded the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack that the case which he had referred to, and which occurred in the diocese of Chichester, was a case in which a petition was presented against a clergyman, and not a case in which a clergyman petitioned to save his conscience. He had refused to bury two persons, one of whom he considered to be excommunicated, and another who had committed suicide, and against whom the coroner's jury had returned a verdict of felo de se. It was a petition presented against the clergyman which raised the debate in their Lordships' House, and which terminated as had been stated.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON said, he could not consent to confound the innocent with the guilty, and was, therefore, constrained to vote against the Amendment.

THE BISHOP OF EXETER said, he should acquiesce in the decision of their Lordships by which the Amendment of the most rev. the Archbishop of Canterbury, to prevent the guilty party marrying again, was rejected, although he regretted

it. But he did not think they were called upon to do more than not to exclude guilty parties from matrimony, and he could not consent to their being married with the most solemn ceremony of the Church, which from first to last presumed, not only the sacredness of marriage, but the fitness of the parties who offered themselves. Adultery rendered persons liable to the censure of the Church, and the title of these persons to marriage was simply their adultery. The celebration of such marriages, according to the rites of the Church, would be making the holy offices the merest instruments of State policy. He should, therefore, move, that the following proviso be added to Clause 54:—

"Provided that, after Sentence of Divorce shall have been duly pronounced in any Suit by reason of Adultery committed by either Party, it shall be lawful for the Party by reason of whose Adultery the said sentence shall have been pronounced, in case of his or her intending to intermarry with the Party with whom such Adultery has been committed, to make and subscribe a Declaration in conjunction with such last-mentioned Party before any One of the Judges of the Court of Marriage and Divorce, or by any Person to be commissioned by the said Court under the Official Seal to receive such Declaration, in the terms of the Schedule hereunto annexed; and upon such Declaration being made as aforesaid, it shall be lawful for the Judge, or the Person so commissioned, to declare the said Parties to be lawfully married; and such Marriage shall be good and lawful to all intents and purposes whatsoever: Provided always that nothing herein contained shall make lawful any Marriage between any Parties who are now disabled by Law from contracting Marriage together by reason of Consanguinity or Affinity.

SCHEDULE.

I, A. B. do take C. D. to be my wedded wife.
I, C. D. do take A. B. to be my wedded husband.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, as the Amendment was somewhat similar to that which they had already rejected, he thought that the result of the right rev. Prelate's Amendment, if adopted, would be to create a new marriage tribunal, utterly unknown to the law before—namely, marriage by the Court of Divorce. There were already very strong objections against the marriage before the registrar, but the present proposition was open to far stronger objections. He hoped that their Lordships would not sanction the Amendment of the right rev. Prelate.

LORD CAMPBELL said, the Amendment imposed an obligation on any Judge of the Divorce Court to declare the parties married. He (Lord Campbell) was one of the Judges; now, suppose he was a conscientious person, and had an objection to marriages of this kind—yet he or any one of the Judges might be compelled, under pain of losing his office, to declare such parties lawfully married. This was quite as hard as that any incumbent of the Church of England who had conscientious objections to marrying such parties should be compelled to marry them.

THE BISHOP OF EXETER observed, that, notwithstanding the very extreme supposition of the noble and learned Lord that he had a conscience, he could not understand how the noble and learned Lord could object to carry into execution that which the law of the land had declared to be legal. To adopt the course of having the marriage ceremony under the circumstances of the case, performed in the Church, would be to inflict a grievous wound upon her, and would be contrary to the very essence of the sacred service.

On Question, Whether the said clause shall be there inserted? their Lordships divided:—Contents 24; Not Contents 38: Majority 14.

LORD WENSLEYDALE moved the omission of Clause 55 relating to actions of crim. con.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that as the House had decided upon the enactment of this provision he trusted that the noble and learned Lord would be content with proposing his Amendment and entering his protest.

Amendment withdrawn.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR moved that the last clause of the Bill be struck out in consequence of an intimation received from the Chief Rabbi of the Jews that it would interfere with their marriage settlements.

Motion agreed to; Clause struck out.

Moved, That the Bill do pass.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD said, he did not wish to re-open the whole question, but he rose to offer a last protest to the passing of the measure. He believed it was contrary to the law of God, contrary to the law of the Church of England, and, as he believed, fruitful in future crime and misery to the people of England. He believed that in passing it they were dealing a more fatal blow to family purity than they could by any other act. Entertaining these views he could not suffer the Bill to pass without dividing the House, in order that the names of those who opposed it to its last stage might stand on record to posterity. He wished them to observe that they had been led on to this course of legislation at first by following the example of Scotland, but they had removed all the guards which had prevented the full working of the evil in Scotland. Yet they quoted Scotland, and the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack had quoted her again that night, as an instance that they had nothing to fear from the social effect of the Bill, although every one must see that those guards were necessary to protect the sacredness of married life among the lower classes from the pollution which this Bill would introduce into it. The Bill professed to extend the same relief to the poor as to the rich; but it did no such thing—it was impossible that that object could be attained by a single court sitting in London. The Bill was a law for the rich; it was an immunity for the adulterers and the adulteresses in the high places of England. Equality to the poor could only be given by granting the settlement of that nice question to the courts of inferior jurisdiction, but that equal justice to the poor would be purchased at the price of the introduction of unlimited pollution. On every ground of policy and morality he begged their Lordships to refuse their assent to the passing of the measure. The Bill, which provided none of the securities by which it was originally accompanied, was to be launched out first to give an unjust advantage to the wealthy, and afterwards so miserably to increase collusion as to destroy the morals of the people. He knew that as far as that House was concerned, his words might as well be left unuttered. Yet he did once more, in the face of the Church and of the country, implore their Lordships not to pass the Bill into law.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON said, he would once more reiterate his opposition to the Bill, which he regarded as one of the most mischievous ever submitted to Parliament. His firm conviction was, that it was calculated to undermine all the moral principles of society.

On Question that this Bill do pass? their Lordships divided:—Contents 46; Not-Contents 25: Majority 21.

Resolved in the affirmative; Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES BILL.

PROTESTS.

Dissentient—1. "Because the effect of rejecting this Amendment will be to confine the dissolution of marriage upon the adultery of the husband to the four cases stated in the Bill, which we consider to be not only inexpedient, but, as contrasted with the relief upon the adultery of the wife, partial and unjust.

2. "Because, as the clause is framed, although the husband should be living in the most open and notorious adultery, and should even bring his mistress into the family residence, insulting the wife by her presence, and should endeavour by ill usage to compel her to submit to this disgrace, such a case would not come within its provisions.

3. "Because the adultery of the husband, accompanied with the commission of the greatest crimes, and even the most infamous vices, would not entitle the wife to relief under this clause.

4. "Because the adultery of the husband, although coupled with his condemnation to penal servitude, even for life, and the consequent degradation and misery of the wife, would not, under the provisions of this Bill, enable her to obtain a dissolution of the marriage.

5. "Because many other cases of similar injustice and hardship are excluded from relief under this clause.

6. "Because to allow a divorce for the adultery of the wife, and to refuse it in those and other cases of adultery by the husband, coupled with acts of deep injury inflicted upon the wife, is manifestly unjust.

7. "Because, although the adultery of the wife may lead to the imposing a spurious offspring on the husband, and entitle him to a divorce for a reason which would not apply to the case of adultery by the husband, other circumstances may, and frequently do, occur in connection with the adultery of the husband, giving the wife an equal claim to this remedy.

8. "Because no distinction is made in Scripture between the case of the man and of the woman in the commission of adultery. The sin is the same in both—both are included under the same prohibition.

9. "Because the whole tendency and spirit of the Christian religion is manifestly calculated to raise women to equal rights and equal responsibilities with men. 'It has,' in the words of an eminent writer on general law (Chief Justice Story) 'elevated woman to the rank and dignity of an equal, instead of being an humble companion or a devoted slave of her husband;' and accordingly we find that as Christianity extended itself, and its influence was brought to bear upon social and civil affairs, so the condition of woman was improved, and her rights to protection and redress were acknowledged. With respect to marriage and divorce the rule of the Roman Catholic Church applies to both sexes equally, while all Protestant Legislatures (except our own), in declaring that marriage may be dissolved for the cause of adultery, have accorded to the wife the same rights and remedies as to the husband.

10. "Because by our ecclesiastical law (the only law at present applicable to this subject), the same judgment is pronounced in the case of adultery, whether the crime be committed by the husband or wife. And there appears to us no reason why, in extending the remedy, the principle should be changed.

11. "Because as to the objection that the extension of the law to cases of adultery by the husband will give occasion to a great number of suits for divorce, we think such apprehension is altogether groundless. The proceedings can originate only with the wife, and she has, both as to feeling and interest, so much at stake, so much to relinquish which must be most dear to her, that we think there is little fear of her resorting to this remedy, except in extreme cases, and after all hope of amendment has ceased.

12. "Because by the law of Scotland the adultery of the husband with respect to divorce is placed on the same footing with the adultery of the wife. This law is found to be attended with no inconvenience. The evidence on the subject is above all exception, and we deem it most desirable that laws which so deeply affect the social and moral condition of the people should, in contiguous parts of the same empire, be in accordance with each other.

"HUTCHINSON.

"HARRINGTON.

"LYNDHURST.

"TALBOT DE MALANDRÉ.

"BELMONT."

Against the rejection of the Amendment to omit the 55th clause.

Dissentient—1. "Because the abolition of the action for criminal conversation would cause a great anomaly in the law of England, which has hitherto been perfect in one respect at least, as it provides a remedy for an injury to every legal right. If a man has his estate taken from him wrongfully, he may be restored to the possession of it; if a specific chattel he may recover it in specie, by a recent improvement in law rendering that remedy more effective; he may in some cases compel a specific performance of a contract; but in all others the law gives a compensation in money only, for it is impossible in the nature of things to give any other.

2. "Because to deny this the only possible remedy for the grievous injury to a husband by the loss of the right to the society and assistance of his wife in his domestic affairs and the education of his children—on the ground that it is irreparable, would be most unjust—and the other reason assigned, that it would be disgraceful to the husband to receive the price for his own and his wife's dishonour, is a misapplication of terms, as it treats the sum recovered by law as if it had been the subject of a bargain with the adulterer.

3. "Because the same inaccurate reasoning would apply to many other injuries of a similar nature incapable of pecuniary estimate, actions for atrocious libels, for infamous slanders, for assaults attended with contumely and insult, and for the seduction of a daughter, all of which are capable of the same opprobrious designation of disgraceful bargains with the wrong-doer.

4. "Because the reason assigned that sometimes the wife may be totally ignorant of the charge made by the husband against the adulterer, and it would be unjust that she should have no opportunity of vindicating herself, is insufficient, because such a case is scarcely possible, and laws are to be made for matters of frequent not rare occurrence, and the remedy, if one should be required, would be not to deprive the husband of all remedy for his violated right, but to provide that he should give notice to the wife, and that she should be at liberty to intervene for her own interest.

5. "Because the husband has almost always interests of a material nature and capable of pecuniary estimate that are injured by the adultery. In the higher classes of life, a wife may have a sum settled to her separate use, the benefit of which the husband would in part enjoy—in the lower, the earnings of the wife in an art or trade may contribute to the maintenance of the husband and his family. In almost all the wife has duties to perform in superintending the household and educating the children, which have analogy to those of a servant, and in the lower classes closely resemble them. All these are properly the subject of pecuniary compensation, and yet the husband is to be deprived of it altogether, and that for the benefit of the adulterer.

6. "Because the maintenance of this action tends to the repression of adultery, the repeal of it to its increase.

"WHELESTDALE."

As to 85th Clause.

DISSENTIENT.—1. "Because many noble Lords supported the 85th Clause of the Bill, solely on account of a power of imprisonment (not imperatively but discretionally to be acted on)—being contained in some part of the Bill.

2. "Because a Jury is more likely to obtain the confidence of suitors (who may possibly not even wish for a divorce), than the Judges of the newly constituted court.

3. "Because by an Amendment of the practice of the courts of common law counsel may be heard in support of the fair fame and interest of wives accused of adultery.

4. "Because the vexatious Suits Act (if passed into a law) will tend more than ever has heretofore been practicable, to prevent frivolous charges from being brought forward.

5. "Because the action for criminal conversation is strictly analogous to the action for loss of services in actions on the case for seduction.

6. "Because in all actions for assault, Her Majesty's subjects can proceed both civilly and criminally in all cases whether of a common or of an aggravated nature, and ought to have equal rights under this Bill.

"DESMAN."

Against the Third Reading.

DISSENTIENT.—"Because the Bill authorizes the intermarriage of the adulterous parties, but does not relieve the clergy from the legal obligation of celebrating matrimony in such cases with the office of the church. Yet that office expressly declares that holy matrimony, instituted by God in the time of man's innocence, signifies the mystical union between Christ and His church, whereas adultery is constantly spoken of in holy Scripture, as symbolizing apostasy from that church and the violation of that blessed union. In contempt of this sacred truth the Bill not only sanctions the marriage of parties whose ability to marry is founded altogether on their being adulterers, but it also compels the clergy to marry them in profanation of the most sacred words of Scripture, and with perdition of the most solemn truths of the Gospel. For, even if the use of the office could be tolerated in the marriage of adulterous parties who are repentant of their adultery, yet no security is given or can be given by any statute that the parties concerned are really penitent; and yet these parties have by their adultery incurred the church sentence of excommunication, which, if duly pronounced, would render them incapable of being married with the rites of the church. If the circumstances of the times prevent the due exercise of the church's discipline, yet the least that might be expected from a Christian Legislature is, that it be careful to protect the State from the guilt of countenancing such fearful profaneness and to respect the conscientious feelings of all faithful churchmen, who cannot but be shocked by such wanton trifling with the gravest spiritual matters; and especially of the clergy, who, if the Bill shall finally pass, will not be able to perform what belongs to their office without violating their sense of duty to God, and cannot refuse to perform it without incurring the heavy penalties of human law. The enactment is the more grievous because there already exists a mode of contracting matrimony between such parties, which not only leaves the rights and sanctions of the church unviolated, but would also relieve the parties themselves, if truly penitent and sensible of their own degradation, from the anguish and misery which they must feel in repeating vows to God which they have already broken, and hearing pronounced over them the curse of God against all who have, as they already have, put asunder those whom God has joined together."

DISSENTIENT.—1. "Because the contract of marriage is the most solemn engagement into which a man can enter, and in which he promises to love, comfort, and honour the woman, and keep her under all circumstances of sickness or of health, and adhere to her as long as they shall both live.

2. "Because the purposes of this engagement, as deduced from Scripture, are of the deepest interest and importance—namely, for the birth of children to be brought up in the love and fear of God, for a remedy against sin, and for mutual society, help, and comfort, both in prosperity and adversity.

3. "Because by wilful desertion not only is this sacred promise impiously violated, but all the purposes for which this ordinance of God was instituted are wholly frustrated. Even in the most ordinary contract, the breach of it on the one side puts an end to the obligation on the other, and we see no reason why a different rule should be applied to the contract of marriage, and more especially in a case destructive of the entire objects of the union. It appears to us to be contrary to all principle, and most unjust, that the husband should be permitted to set at nought an engagement followed, as it must be, by such consequences, and that the woman should continue to be bound by it.

4. "Because we feel strongly the extreme cruelty of such conduct towards the deserted wife, in the utter disappointment of all her confident expectations of happiness from the promised love, comfort, and society of her husband, and leaving her without hope to the contemplation of a long, dreary, and desolate future.

5. "Because divorce from this cause is justified as Scriptural by the highest ecclesiastical authorities. It is well known that at the Reformation the subject was anxiously and carefully considered by prelates and divines eminent for learning and piety, and that they came to the conclusion that wilful desertion was a scriptural ground for divorce. We find the names of Archbishop Cranmer, of the Bishops of London, Winchester, Ely, Exeter, and others; of Latimer, Parker, &c.; of Peter Martyr, Martin Bucer, Beza, Luther, Melancthon, Calvin, &c., among those who maintained this opinion, and which was adopted by the whole body of Protestants on the continent of Europe. Accordingly, this has been the acknowledged doctrine of all their churches to the present day. We find the same doctrine expressly stated and adopted in the 8th Article on Divorce in the Reformatio Legum Ecclesiasticarum, compiled under the authority of Henry VIII. and Edward VI., which body of laws, although it did not receive the confirmation of the Crown, in consequence of the early and unexpected death of King Edward, has always, as the Commissioners on the Law of Divorce, in their Report, justly observe, been considered of great authority. We also find that at a more recent period a right rev. Prelate, eminent for learning and talents (Cozens, Bishop of Durham), in his celebrated argument delivered in this House, in the case of Lord Roos, maintained the same opinion. His words are these:—'The promise of constancy in the marriage ceremony does not extend to tolerating adultery or malicious desertion, which dissolve the marriage.'

6. "Because, by the law of Scotland, wilful desertion, as in all the Protestant churches on the Continent, is considered to be a scriptural ground for divorce, and the law in this respect is regarded by all the first authorities in that country, not only to be free from inconvenience, but as just and highly beneficial. We further deem it to be most desirable, that upon such a subject as marriage and divorce, affecting as it does the whole social system, the same law should, as far as practicable, prevail in both parts of the kingdom, and the more so as continued experience has shown the great inconvenience occasioned by the difference and anomalies of the two systems.

7. "Because, as to the objections to the proposed extension of this measure on the ground of its tendency to demoralize society, this is not only disproved by the example of Scotland, but a careful examination of the state of society in Roman Catholic countries will, we think, lead to the conclusion that the principle of the indissolubility of marriage is far less favourable to morality than the opposite doctrine, accompanied with a cautious exercise of the power of divorce in such extreme cases as those of adultery and malicious desertion.

8. "Because, as to what is urged with reference to the law of our Ecclesiastical Courts, we answer that the object of the present Bill throughout is to amend that law, and to render it more consistent with reason and justice; and, with respect to the Church of England, we will merely repeat what we find stated in the argument of the learned Prelate to which we have already referred—namely, that 'We cannot see why they are to be styled the Church of England who join with the Council of Trent, rather than those who join with all the reformed churches, and plead against the canon of the Church of Rome, which hath laid an anathema upon us if we do not agree with them.'

"LYNDHURST.

DISSENTIENT—1. "Because the Bill contains provisions authorizing in certain cases divorce à vinculo matrimonii of Christian marriage, and is thus in direct opposition to what our Lord has declared both in His own words and in the unvarying teaching of His Church.'

2. "Because the harmony and stability of the family relations, upon which the well-being of the State is ultimately based, will be unsettled and impaired by the facilities which are offered for divorce.

"NORFOLK (E. M.)

STAFFORD,
VAUX OF HARROWDEN,

DISSENTIENT—1. "Because, in opposition to the Word of God, which is embodied in the law of our Church, the Bill sanctions the remarriage of a divorced husband or wife during the lifetime of the divorced wife or husband.

2. "Because, in direct contradiction to the plain teaching of our Saviour Christ, the divorced adulteress is permitted to remarry during the lifetime of her husband.

3. "Because the Court of Divorce provided by the Bill will, as a general rule, be accessible only to the rich, and thus what is treated in the Bill as the right of every injured husband is by it withheld from the poor, and such legislation will almost inevitably lead to committing the decision of causes involving the sentence of divorce à vinculo matrimonii to many and inferior local courts, and so to the risk of the wide spread of collusive adultery.

4. "Because the permission of intermarriage, as granted in the Bill to the parties through whose adultery the divorce has been caused, tends to promote a dissolution of manners throughout that large class of society in which no conventional law severely punishes the divorced woman.

5. "Because the whole tendency of the Bill is to dissolve the sanctions and endanger the purity of God's great institution of family life throughout this land.

6. Because it will lead to the clergy of the Church of England being required to pronounce the blessing of Almighty God on unions condemned by their Church, and repugnant, as many of them believe, to the direct letter of Holy Writ, and to employ at unions founded on dissolved marriages, from the marriage service of the Church of England, language which is in its plain sense inconsistent with the dissolubility of marriage

ROMAN CATHOLIC CHARITIES BILL. SECOND READING.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR in moving the Second Reading said, the object of the measure was to remedy a doubt which had been raised with respect to an Act passed in the reign of William IV., rendering lawful educational charities for Roman Catholics, as to whether that Act was retrospective or not. Doubt still existing in spite of decisions, it had been thought desirable to introduce the present Bill, so as to put an end to all doubt on the subject. The Bill provided that it shall be lawful for the trustees of Catholic charities to enrol them within a year after the passing of the present Act, and should thereby have the same rights as if they had been registered from the beginning. It enacted also that in the case of what were called "Charities for Superstitious Uses," the Court of Chancery should decide how much was applicable to lawful and how much to unlawful purposes. There was also a clause which provided that where there was a doubt about the charity, the usage of twenty-five years should be conclusive. Such being briefly the object of the Measure, he hoped their Lordships would offer no opposition to its being read a Second Time.

LORD REDESDALE would not oppose the Second Reading of the Bill, but he was understood to express a hope that the Bill would not pass without some discussion in Committee.

Bill read 2<sup>a</sup>, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

House adjourned at a quarter to Ten o'clock, to Thursday next, half-past Ten o'clock.

FINSBURY PARK (No. 2) BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he was very sorry to feel his duty, in deference to the wishes of a large body of his constituents, to move that this Bill be read a second time that day six months. The inhabitants of Cornwall would derive as much benefit from this park as his constituents residing in Lambeth, and he thought therefore they ought not to be taxed to provide it. A further objection was that the body under whose auspices this measure had been brought forward—the Metropolitan Board of Works—had laid down no scheme for the formation of parks in other parts of the metropolis. The people of Newington and Camberwell, and other populous districts in the borough of Lambeth, desired to have parks in their neighbourhood, but there was no intimation given of any probability of their having them, and they thought it therefore objectionable that they should be called upon to pay for a park for Finsbury. He wished to know whether the Government were going to grant £50,000 out of the public funds towards the formation of this park? The former Bill contained such a provision, and as he found no mention of a similar one in the present Bill, he would like to know whether the Government had withdrawn their promise or not. In Lambeth a park had been made by the contributions of the inhabitants of that locality. He regretted that the Board of Works should have taken up an undertaking of this kind before completing the main drainage of the metropolis.

SIR JOHN SUELLEY seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. COX said, that the borough of Finsbury, of which he had the honour to be a Representative, had increased its population 200 per cent in twenty years, and now contained 350,000 persons. Unless the present Bill passed there would never be an open space in the borough for the health and recreation of the inhabitants. In 1851, when it was found the borough was so crowded, application was made to Lord John Russell, then at the head of Her Majesty's Government, who directed plans to be prepared, and notices given for the formation of a park for Finsbury. Before, however, a Bill could be brought in, a change of Ministry occurred. Subsequent attempts were made under the Government of Lord Derby to obtain a park for Finsbury, but again a change of Ministry frustrated the design. When the Metropolitan Board of Works was established it was felt that they were the proper body to deal with the question of new parks for the metropolis, and Parliament gave them, by a special Act, the power to form public parks. The present Bill was the first step towards carrying this Act into effect, but it was not true that there was any intention of confining the measure to one district of the metropolis, for the Metropolitan Board of Works designed to form three parks—one for Finsbury, a second for Bermondsey, and a third at Hampstead Heath. They had not been able to give the requisite notices for taking land in time for the two last mentioned parks, but it was their intention to proceed next Session with a Bill for a park for Bermondsey, and for securing Hampstead Heath for public use. The rate necessary for the present park, if spread over twenty years, would not amount to more than a farthing in the pound per annum. To this the Government had promised to recommend Parliament to add a Vote of £50,000. He believed that the ratepayers of the metropolis would be glad to pay so small a sum, since they would save more than double the amount in doctors' bills. He did not believe the House would have heard any objections to this Bill if the people of Lambeth had not already obtained their Kennington Common enclosure and their park at Battersea.

MR. CLAY said, he would support the Bill. The hon. Member for Lambeth had been urging upon the House the rejection of this measure upon the supposition that, now his district was provided for, all other metropolitan improvements were to be given up. The whole metropolis gained by the construction of parks in any part of it. He should, for his own part, like to see it surrounded by a belt of parks, for when he saw how fast it was walking away to Dover on one side, and Oxford on the other, he thought that for the sake of the health and comfort of those who were then living, they were bound to look forward to what might be the possible size of the metropolis twenty years hence, and the consequent difficulty to its inhabitants in escaping into the country. The sooner such improvements as this were made the cheaper would be the cost, for the value of land was increasing every year.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he did not oppose this Bill because he objected to a general rate for this park, and he must disclaim any selfish wish to prevent the district of Finsbury possessing "lungs," or to deprive its inhabitants of opportunities of health and recreation. But when the Metropolitan Board was established Parliament said that, if they wished to spend more than a given sum, they should come to Parliament for its sanction, which, he took it, meant that Parliament was to express its opinion upon the measures which involved such an expenditure. Now he did not deny that a park was required for Finsbury; but he contended that the site suggested for this park was not the best that might be chosen. Of the 250 acres of which it was to be composed 230 were beyond the boundaries of the district embraced in the jurisdiction of the Metropolitan Board. This, he thought, was in itself an objection, but it was not the most serious one that might be taken against the proposed situation of the park. He found that, taking Finsbury Square as the centre of one of the most crowded parts of Finsbury, the site of the new park was three miles distant, while Regent's Park was only two miles and a half off; St. James's Park, two miles and a quarter; and the Victoria Park, one mile and three quarters. It was clearly a mistake to fix the new park in a situation actually more remote than those already existing for the crowded parts of the borough. It was proposed, moreover, to include in this park the filtering reservoirs of the New River Company, which contained 1,750,000 gallons, and supplied 94,000 houses on the north side of the town. Now this Bill contained powers to build in the park, which must also be drained. And he thought when they considered how liable filtering reservoirs were to receive injury, it would be better for the ratepayers of the metropolis not to run the risk of having to pay a large compensation to the New River Company for drainage to their reservoirs. He also felt considerable objections to the proposal for bridging over the New River. Knowing the difficulties with which the Metropolitan Board of Works had to contend, he thought it was much to be regretted that their first proposition should be one of so objectionable a nature. Powers such as those now asked for should, under any circumstances, be regarded with jealousy, and he felt bound to resist the present application for them.

LORD ROBERT GROSVENOR would support the Bill. He was very sorry that the metropolis should exhibit the unseemly spectacle of a house divided against itself on the first occasion when the Metropolitan Board of Works came down to propose a scheme for providing parks for the metropolis out of a general rate. Constant complaints were made against the carrying out of metropolitan improvements at the expense of the country, and now when a proposition was made to improve the metropolis by a rate on its inhabitants, the plan was objected to by two of the metropolitan Members. He could not help characterising the opposition to the Bill as an impudent attempt on the part of Lambeth and Westminster, which had already parks created at the public expense, to escape from contributing their fair share towards providing a park for the unfortunate denizens of the district of Finsbury. The test of distance from Finsbury Square proposed with respect to the site of the park by the hon. Baronet was most fallacious, for Finsbury Square was not the centre of the borough or of its most thickly populated districts. The hon. Baronet was only caught by the name. It was true that the site of the park was out of the district embraced in the jurisdiction of the Metropolitan Board. But it was impossible to get a site nearer London, and if they waited a single year longer they would have to go still further off. If Hampstead Heath was enclosed and new parks made for Finsbury and Bermondsey, the total cost would not amount to a rate of more than three farthings in the pound over the whole metropolis. He was surprised, therefore, that any one should propose the rejection of this Bill. But he was sure there would not be half-a-dozen hon. Members found to vote against it.

MR. SPOONER observed that, without entering into the quarrel of metropolitan Members, he wished to know whether the statement of the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. Cox) were correct—namely, that the Government had promised, if this Bill passed, to recommend to Parliament a vote of £50,000 from the national exchequer towards the completion of this park. If the public taxes were devoted to such a purpose, every other large town in the kingdom proposing to provide itself with a park would have an equal claim to a similar contribution.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, that he believed that no positive engagement had been entered into by the Government to give £50,000 towards the construction of this park; but that certainly there was an understanding, that if £250,000 out of the whole estimated cost, which amounts to £300,000, were raised by a general rate, they were prepared to ask the sanction of Parliament for the remaining sum. This plan had been approved by all previous Governments. He believed, that if the Government of Lord John Russell had not gone out of office, they would have formed the park without putting the metropolis to any expense. The Government of Lord Derby were also willing to aid in the construction of a park. And that of the Earl of Aberdeen, in like manner, offered to recommend a vote of public money for this purpose, provided a sum of £250,000 were raised by the metropolis. The question had since been referred to the Metropolitan Board of Works, and the Board had come to a resolution, proposing to make a rate for £250,000 over the whole metropolis. The park had been called a Finsbury Park, but in reality it was a park for the whole of the northern part of the metropolis which was increasing every day. Let them look at the increase in the population in the parish of Islington alone. When he represented the borough of Finsbury in the first reformed Parliament, that parish had 2,000 or 3,000 registered electors, and 30,000 or 40,000 population. It had now 10,000 electors and a population of 130,000 or 140,000. The park which it was proposed to construct under the authority of this Bill would accommodate a population of from 500,000 to 600,000 people; and he thought that nothing could be more unreasonable or ungenerous than the opposition to it raised by the representative of Lambeth, which had had Battersea Park constructed for it at the public expense out of the Consolidated Fund, at a cost of between £200,000 and £300,000. And even this very year a sum of £8,000 had been voted by the House for the completion of the Battersea Park, which the hon. Member had got for himself and the Battersea boys to disport themselves in free of cost. It had been asked, what use would Finsbury Park be to the inhabitants of Lambeth? He might retort by asking what use Battersea Park was to the inhabitants of Finsbury? It was, indeed, sought to form a park at Finsbury, for the very reason, that from the distance it would be of no use to the inhabitants of Lambeth. He believed that the ratepayers of the metropolis generally were in favour of this measure; nor did he think that even the unreformed corporation of the City of London would come forward to oppose a park for the recreation of the people. He did trust that the House would not decline to send to a Select Committee a Bill, whose object was to provide a place of recreation for the inhabitants of the crowded districts of St. Luke's, Clerkenwell, and of the northern parts of the metropolis. If that Committee did not approve of it, on full consideration of its provisions, they could, of course, reject it.

MR. HENLEY said, he would very much rejoice to see a park formed, not only at Finsbury, but in every place where there was a crowded population. But the difficulty they were placed in, arose from the statements of the hon. Members for Finsbury, that the funds of the country were to be called upon to contribute to its cost. They were told this park would only cost the metropolis a rate of a farthing in the pound. And yet, the hon. Members for Finsbury told the House that some inappreciable part of this farthing was to be made up by the taxes of England. Now, upon this point, he thought they ought to have some explanation. The right hon. Baronet the Member for Marylebone had conferred great benefit upon the metropolis by the creation of the Metropolitan Board of Works, for the management of the affairs of this vast metropolis. The right hon. Gentleman took especial care to vest them with ample taxing powers, which he (Mr. Henley) was quite certain would secure their popularity. Well, let them tax themselves. He was sure they would exercise a sound discretion in the matter. He was sure that no one would grudge paying his share of rates for providing so great a source of enjoyment as this park for the inhabitants of the metropolis generally. He could not think there would be any substantial opposition, if they had a satisfactory assurance from the Government on the point to which he had referred. As to the opposition of Lambeth and Westminster, he quite agreed in what had been said, that what was a benefit to one part of the metropolis was a benefit to all. It was all the better for Lambeth and Westminster if they had got parks at the public expense, but then let them not refuse to contribute their fair share to provide parks for others.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that a deputation from the ratepayers of Finsbury had recently waited upon his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, with reference to the proposed park; but that in the absence of his right hon. Friend, he (Sir G. Grey) was unable to say, whether any promise had been given by the Government to submit to the House a vote in aid; but if there had been any such arrangement, of which he had heard nothing till this day, of course it was open to any hon. Gentleman, who was so disposed, to vote for the second reading, upon the understanding that no such promise had been given by the Government, and oppose the Bill at the next stage, if he should find that the Government had at all bound themselves in the matter.

SIR DE LACY EVANS said, that as the people of Westminster had been placed in the position of opponents of this Bill, he felt called upon to exonerate himself from that charge. He entirely concurred in the observation of his hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury, that it would be ungenerous in any particular portion of the metropolis to oppose Bills for the improvement of other portions of the metropolis, on the ground that that particular portion might not profit by them. The people of Westminster ought to be the last to oppose such a Bill as this, because Westminster, without one farthing of expense to the ratepayers, and entirely by means of the Imperial exchequer, had obtained the best lungs in the metropolis. No representation had been made to him by any of the ratepayers of Westminster to induce him to oppose the Bill, and, even were the case otherwise, he should feel it his duty to support it. But the hon. Member for Warwickshire had raised a very different question. That hon. Member had talked of the injustice of taxing the country generally for the formation of parks in the metropolis, and had contended that any large country town was quite as much entitled as London to grants of the public money for the formation of a park. But it was ridiculous to put a country town on a par with London, for London was the metropolis of the whole empire, and every part of the empire was interested in the well-being of its capital. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire, and the hon. Member for Warwickshire had said, that they represented parts of the country which received no benefit from the London parks, and which ought, therefore, not to be taxed on account of those parks. He hoped, then, that those Gentlemen would never present themselves in the metropolitan parks, for, according to their arguments, they really had no right to enjoy fresh air in them. Millions had been already voted this year for different parts of the country; but did any metropolitan Member rise in his place when the votes, for instance, for Dublin hospitals and ports in various parts of the kingdom were proposed, and exclaim against them on the ground that the metropolis would derive no immediate benefit from the expenditure of the money? On the contrary, he, for one, thought the House took the wiser course in not refusing all votes for local purposes, but in granting them to different parts of the country, and relieving London particularly, not from all local charges and expenses, but only to some extent. Nothing could be more just than to extend such relief to her, whether by rates such as were now referred to, or by bearing a portion of the expense of the police, when they considered how very different was the position of the metropolis from other towns, and that there was hardly any person in the kingdom who was not obliged occasionally to repair here, and thus enjoyed the benefit of any improvements which were made, or of any expenditure of the public money which took place.

MR. WALPOLE said, he thought there ought to be a clear understanding, whether in assenting to the second reading of this Bill, the House would be committed to the arrangement, that a part of the money required for this park should be advanced by the country.

Sir De Lacy Evans

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he regretted that he was not in the House when this discussion began, for he might then have prevented some misconception as to the scope of the Bill. There had been for a considerable time communications between the Government and the parties interested in the creation of this park. They represented (and his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer and himself felt the full force of their representation) the great advantages which would accrue to the inhabitants of a very thickly populated part of the metropolis, not situated close to any outlet, if this park were formed; that it would afford them the same facilities for recreation, and the same benefits as regarded health which were enjoyed by the inhabitants of other portions of London situated near to parks already existing; that it would be almost impossible to raise by local rates the whole amount of money required for the purchase of land and its formation into a park; and they urged, that if the Government could induce Parliament to contribute £50,000 towards the expenses this would render easy, if not certain, the operation to which they attached so much importance. They represented, moreover, that if the arrangement were not at once made, every successive year, by extended buildings upon ground now open, would tend to render the undertaking they had in view more difficult, or even to defeat it altogether. His right hon. Friend and himself ultimately agreed to the proposal, and said, "If you bring in your Bill and it is likely to be carried, we will propose to Parliament—subject, of course, to their decision—to give you this £50,000 in aid." He was not quite sure, whether the arrangement was to form part of the Bill, or whether the proposal was to be made contingent on the passing of the measure. He rather thought it was to form part and parcel of the Bill, but be this as it may, of course the Government could not engage to issue any sum out of the Consolidated Fund without the sanction of Parliament. All they could do was, to recommend to Parliament to agree to a grant upon the grounds he had stated. He thought it exceedingly desirable that this park should be made. He quite agreed with his hon. and gallant Friend (Sir De Lacy Evans) that it was preposterous for hon. Gentlemen to object to grants of this kind, simply on the ground that the advantage derived was but local. If that principle were to be adopted as a guide for the conduct of Parliament, no general or public improvements would be made, and they would be reduced, as he stated on a former occasion, to a parochial subdivision; nothing would be done in any part of the United Kingdom, unless it could be accomplished by a rate upon the inhabitants of the parish in which the improvement happened to be proposed. He quite agreed with his hon. and gallant Friend that Parliament ought to take a larger and more liberal view of these things, and that the whole country was interested in these metropolitan improvements. London belonged to the empire at large, and it was quite a perversion of terms to suppose that great improvements in the metropolis only concerned the persons who happened to live upon the spot.

MR. NEWDEGATE observed that he could not bring himself to believe that this great metropolis was so poor as not to be able to find means for effecting its own improvements. All that had been said of the grants already given in aid of metropolitan improvements was an argument to show that the people of the country should not give any more money for such objects, as in them might be detected the growth of a system which was gradually tending to the exemption of the metropolis from all liability in this respect. The hon. and gallant Member for Westminster had referred to the fact, that the county Members and Members for provincial boroughs spent several months of each year in the metropolis, and that as they therefore had a share in the enjoyments with its inhabitants, they should not object to an imperial contribution towards those improvements. Now, had it not struck the hon. and gallant Member that the county and borough Members who resided in the metropolis for the purpose of attending those Parliamentary duties paid for any enjoyments which the metropolis afforded them by the contribution which they, by their residence, made to the general wealth of the capital? In his (Mr. Newdegate's) opinion, that was quite a sufficient contribution for the enjoyments they received. He objected to this apparent tendency towards the adoption of the imperial system in France, involving, as it did, the neglect of the principle of old—always recognized in this country—that local wants should be supplied by rates levied upon the people more immediately benefited. Such a system was not English. The parochial system was the one under which England had thriven, and if a division were taken on the second reading of the Bill now before the House, he should feel it to be his duty to vote against it.

MR. BARROW remarked, he really thought that the present was an attempt to obtain money under false pretences. If it was proposed that money should be paid out of the public funds, such proposition should come before Parliament in a public and not in a private Bill. He should oppose the second reading of the Bill, for, if they passed, it would be used as a precedent next Session. They would be told that, with full notice of the object of the Bill, they had voted for it, and thereby established the principle to which the House seemed so much opposed.

THE MARQUESS OF BLANDFORD said, he thought the House ought to be informed whether, in the event of any other application being made for the establishment of parks, the Government would propose a similar arrangement? It appeared to him that, if they voted this £50,000 for the Finsbury Park, they could not refuse to do the same to either of the two other metropolitan parks which it was proposed to form; and as those proposed parks were intended to be of more extensive character than that, the subject of the present Bill, the grants towards them should be proportionately larger. Another objection which he had to the proposal now before the House was, that it was an appeal ad misericordiam. The principles on which that House should proceed in a matter of rating were those of justice and equity; and he could not think this Bill founded on either justice or equity. It certainly was not just nor fair to make the people of the United Kingdom pay for improvements in Finsbury. A good deal had been said about the difficulty of raising, by rates, the entire sum necessary for the park; and the House was reminded that £50,000 was a small sum when coming from the Imperial Exchequer, but not one word had been said about the increased value which this park would give property in its vicinity. In plain terms, the proposal was one to tax the inhabitants of distant localities for that which would increase the value of private property in Finsbury. He could not congratulate the Metropolitan Board of Works on this achievement; and, anxious as he was to see the people of towns provided with parks, he should vote against the second reading of this Bill.

MR. DILLWYN observed, he should like to know on what system they were to vote this £50,000. Were they in future to vote grants to every town or district in the country that wished to establish a park; or was it only to those localities which could bring pressure on the Government that they were to give these favours? If so, he very much feared that the people of poor towns would stand a bad chance in their candidature for a share of grants for parks. He thought that Finsbury did not come within the metropolis proper; it was not a district of the metropolis that people coming from the country enjoyed much advantage from.

MR. AYRTON said, he thought the question whether Finsbury should or should not have a park had been remitted by common consent to the Metropolitan Board, but, that being the case, he certainly thought the Metropolitan Board ought to pay for it. He wished the House to understand the question now under its consideration. If it had been simply a question of whether Finsbury should have a park or not, he should not refuse to support the Bill. The point on which they were going to divide was the great question of, whether the Government, holding the public funds at their disposal, were to be at liberty to say to every deputation that waited upon them, "We'll give you £15,000, or £20,000," and so on. Against all such proceedings he should always be prepared to give his vote, and he thought that it was the duty of the metropolis to set an example against going to the central Government for aid for local purposes.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he thought that the issue proposed by the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just spoken was not that which fairly arose upon the question that this Bill be read a second time. Any opposition with respect to a grant of money in aid of this park would properly arise upon a clause in the Bill, and not on the second reading; and, as an apprehension appeared to exist that the Government were under some engagement to advance money to other parks, he begged to state that no such engagement or understanding had been come to with respect to any other park whatever. It should not be forgotten that the constituents of the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets had had a park provided for them at the public expense.

MR. J. L. RICARDO observed, that he looked upon this proposition as the first step towards a grant of £50,000 for the construction of a park in Finsbury; and as his constituents were anxious to make a park for themselves, and were subscribing money for the purpose, he feared that he should not be able to persuade them that there was any justice in calling upon them to give money for a park in Finsbury, when the Finsbury people subscribed nothing for making a park in the Staffordshire potteries. Seeing the immense sums of money that were being expended in museums and galleries in the metropolis, he should on every occasion set his face against grants of public money for the local purposes of the metropolis.

SIR BENJAMIN HALL said, he believed that there would be no opposition to the passing of this Bill, but for an implied understanding that an advance of £50,000 was to be proposed by the Government. As he felt that it would be extremely unadvisable to stop a Bill of this kind, which was the first production—if he might use the expression—of the Metropolitan Board of Works, he should like to test the opinion of the House on the question of whether a Vote of £50,000 ought to be submitted to the House or not. He would suggest, therefore, that some hon. Gentleman, who was opposed to the grant of £50,000 should move that the debate should be adjourned till that day fortnight, and that the decision come to should be taken as a test of the opinion of the House with respect to the grant. He proposed this course, because it would be very hard to throw out the Bill on the ground of an objection to the grant, and nothing else. If the House then should decide against the grant, it would be for the Metropolitan Board of Works to decide whether, under those circumstances, they would proceed with the Bill.

MR. SLANEY said, he would support the Bill, on the ground that the proposed park was one which had been recommended by a Board of Commissioners, to be formed in the metropolis for the recreation of the working classes of the metropolis.

MR. MILES said, that there could be no objection to the formation of this park by means of local taxation, but he had very great doubts as to the propriety of that House voting £50,000 out of the public funds for a park at Finsbury. However, he agreed with the right hon. Gentleman (Sir B. Hall) that it would not be well for the House to altogether set themselves against this first and ricketty production of the Metropolitan Board of Works, and he should therefore move, as an Amendment, that the debate be now adjourned.

MR. JOSEPH LOCKE observed, that he had a strong objection to voting public money for local purposes; but he should not like, on that account, to stop the progress of this private Bill. He had no objection, therefore, to the postponement of the Bill for a fortnight, in order that the House might save itself from the bad principle of voting public money for local objects.

MR. HENLEY said, it would be understood, then, that the principle on which the debate was adjourned was, that those who voted for the adjournment were against paying £50,000 of public money in aid of this park, but that they did not want to throw over the Bill if the persons interested in it would construct the park for themselves, without Government assistance.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE, who was nearly inaudible, said, they ought to read the Bill a second time, and discuss the clauses in Committee, otherwise there was no hope of getting the Bill up to the House of Lords in time to be within the Standing Orders.

MR. SPOONER said, that he hoped that, in the Vote about to be given, the hon. Members who, like himself, were opposed to this grant, would be distinctly understood to express their opinion that the public money ought not to be voted for such purposes, as that contemplated by the Bill. They were about to give the Government an opportunity of bringing the measure again before the House, and, at the same time, to give them an opportunity of knowing that they would emphatically resist any such proposition as that now under discussion.

SIR BENJAMIN HALL said, that that was distinctly the understanding.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY wished to say that he had been misunderstood. He had not spoken against metropolitan parks in general, but merely against the site selected for the Finsbury Park.

MR. COX said he wished to point out that the present proposition was simply to make a park at the cost of the metropolis. It would be for the House to deal as it chose with the proposition to vote public money in aid whenever that proposition should be submitted to the House.

MR. GRIFFITH, taking out his watch, said, that if the House would indulge him for five minutes he should not detain them beyond that time. He merely wished to say that in voting for the second reading he did not consider he was pledging himself to the grant of £50,000. He certainly thought the House should read the Bill a second time, and he would vote accordingly.

Motion made and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."

The House divided:—Ayes 214; Noes 123: Majority 91.

Debate adjourned till Thursday.

ARMY OFFICERS ON HALF-PAY.

QUESTION.

GENERAL WINDHAM, said he would beg to ask the under Secretary for War if it be the intention of the Government upon reinstating officers in their former regiments, who have been compelled to go on half-pay, to put them back into that position they would have held in the regiment had they never been placed on half-pay? Should the officers who have been compelled to go on half-pay, for the convenience of the country, be put into regiments in which they had not previously served, does the Government intend letting them take regimental rank according to the date of their commissions previous to being placed on half-pay?

SIR JOHN RAMSDEN: Sir, with regard to the officers to whom the hon. and gallant general has referred the Government do not purpose to allow them, when restored to full-pay, to take regimental rank according to the date of the commissions which they held previous to their being placed on half-pay. I may, however, state that the Government are making every exertion to remedy the hardship which must necessarily result from any large reduction of the army, such as that which has recently taken place, by bringing these officers back into active service whenever opportunity offers.

DISBANDING OF NATIVE INDIAN TROOPS.

QUESTION.

MR. BRYDGES WILLYAMS said, he wished to ask the President of the Board of Control whether it is the intention of the Government to disband any of the Native troops in India, and if so, what number?

MR. VERNON SMITH said, the 19th Regiment of Native Infantry had been disbanded in India in consequence of mutiny, but there was no intention of disbanding any others, unless—which he trusted and believed would not be the case—a similar insubordination should be manifested.

DISTRIBUTION OF THE VICTORIA CROSS. QUESTION.

GENERAL CODRINGTON would ask the Under Secretary for War whether the Regiments and Battalions ordered for the parade in Hyde Park on the 26th instant will be those which served in the Crimea; and, if not, what objection there is to battalions in the neighbourhood of London, or detachments from them, being brought up for that purpose?

SIR JOHN RAMSDEN: Sir, in answer to the hon. and gallant General's question, I beg to state that the great majority of the battalions and regiments which are to be on the parade in Hyde Park on Friday next are those which have served in the Crimea. There will be present a park of the Royal Artillery, a troop of Horse Artillery, two field batteries, two regiments of cavalry—namely, the 6th Dragoons and the 11th Hussars—three battalions of the Guards who were in the Crimea, and two regiments of the line—namely, the 79th, and the Rifle Brigade who had also been in the Crimea.

FISCAL AFFAIRS (IRELAND BILL).

LEAVE.

SIR DENHAM NORREYS said, that he was about to ask leave to bring in a Bill for the better management of the fiscal affairs of counties in Ireland, though he must at the same time admit that he had little hope of being able to remove the prejudices of the Secretary of Ireland in favour of the present fiscal system. The object he had in view was to carry out in Ireland the recommendation which had been so strongly urged by a Royal Commission appointed a few years ago to inquire into the management of county rates in England; namely, the formation of Central County Financial Boards. Now, if for some years back there had been considerable agitation in this part of the kingdom in favour of the establishment of such Boards, and if, with the present system of managing the county rates in England, there had arisen a demand for reform, how much greater was the necessity for such reform in Ireland, where the system was so inferior to that in England. Instead of the management of the county rates being vested in the magistrates, men of position and character, and whose office was continuous, under the system which prevailed in Ireland, taxes amounting to nearly a £1,000,000 a year, were imposed by a few gentlemen selected as a grand jury at the caprice of the high sheriff? Now it might be supposed that the gentlemen who served on a grand jury were popular in the county; but that was far from the fact, that the most popular men were those who were least likely to be placed upon it. The body, too, was an ephemeral body. Its existence numbered only a few days. No responsibility whatever attached to its proceedings, for its members might never be required to serve in that capacity again. One of the most extraordinary of their functions was, that they appointed another Board, called the Board of Associated Ratepayers, which had to act to a certain degree in controlling the grand juries themselves. The grand jury were selected by the high sheriff, and the associated ratepayers were selected by the grand jury. In this way the grand jury selected from 100 of the highest ratepayers in every barony a certain number of persons to be the representatives of that barony. Of the number so nominated, one half are selected by ballot, who, together with the magistrates, are called the associated ratepayers. There was, therefore, no responsibility on the part of the grand jury, except to the high sheriff; and no responsibility on the part of the associated ratepayers except to the grand jury. In fact, to use the words of the Commissioners, these associated ratepayers were the nominees of the body which they were called upon to control; for there is nothing to prevent the grand jury from nominating those only who were of the same opinion with themselves on any one question whatever. With such a body in control, and such a body to make presentments, it was in the power and management of the high sheriff to accomplish any job which he wished to accomplish. Indeed, in his younger days it used to be a matter of courtesy on the part of the grand jury to pass any job that the high sheriff wanted. The whole system was one of clanship and partiality. He held in his hand a book written by a county surveyor containing many condemnations of the system, and such descriptions of its operation, that, as an Irishman, he was ashamed to read them. He did not hesitate to say that the grand jury system had done more to demoralize Ireland than any other institution could have effected. It was to put an end to such a system, under which £1,000,000 of money was expended, that he asked for leave to bring in a Bill on the subject. The House of Commons, the Municipal Corporation, and the Colonial Legislatures, had been reformed, and they had even made a feint at reforming the Corporation of London. What then was there so sacred about the grand jury system in Ireland that they dared not attempt to improve it? Now, there was an organization in existence in Ireland which managed an expenditure similar in amount to that at present regulated by the grand juries, and which was found to work harmoniously. He alluded to the poor law system and to the boards of guardians; and he saw no reason why an analogous system to that should not be adopted on this subject. This would be a very simple arrangement, and one with which the people were well acquainted; and under it every man would vote for his road warden in the same way as he now did for his guardian. In the boards thus formed every part of the county would be represented by its warden; and instead of being ephemeral bodies like the grand juries they ought to be continued in office for a period of three or four years, in order to give them a feeling of responsibility. When men were elected by their fellow citizens to manage their roads and bridges, and would feel that a serious public responsibility rested upon them, and there would be some security that they would act fairly. An additional guarantee for their impartiality and efficiency would be afforded by the association of the gentry and the educated classes of their district, the magistrates being ex officio members of the board. If ex officio guardians frequently neglected their duties, at least this class of guardians were as inefficient in England as in Ireland, as was proved by the Return of the Preston union; but he believed that if a system of the kind he proposed was established there would always be a sufficient attendance on the part of magistrates and gentlemen interested in keeping down the expense of the roads of the country. A system, exactly similar, was now in existence in Belgium, and worked admirably; and since the year 1848 a like system had been in operation in Canada—in the last named country every township containing 100 or more freeholders was constituted a body corporate, and endowed with very full powers. His proposal, therefore, was nothing new. He believed that as the proposed councils would represent the property, the intelligence, and the honesty of the country, much larger functions than those connected merely with roads and public buildings might safely be entrusted to them. He was in favour of confiding to them, under certain restrictions, some of the powers now exercised by Committees of that House, which were often necessarily ignorant of the wants and feelings of the particular localities on the interests of which they had to adjudicate. This, however, formed no essential part of his Bill, into which it would be open to hon. Members to introduce such Amendments as they deemed expedient. All he asked the House to do that night was to pass a vote of censure upon the present grand jury system, and to affirm the principle that representation should be combined with taxation.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That leave be given to bring in a Bill to provide for the Management of the Fiscal Affairs of Counties in Ireland by Electoral Boards."

COLONEL FRENCH said, he was prepared, notwithstanding the hard words which the hon. Member for Mallow had spoken against the grand jury system, to meet him face to face in its defence. The Irish Members had frequently permitted the hon. Member's Bill to be printed, but never till now was there an opportunity for debating it. There was no chance of the hon. Member obtaining a second reading for his Bill, and he (Colonel French) would therefore meet the present Motion with a direct negative. It was very generally admitted that, in some minor respects, Ireland possessed advantages over this country. One of the greatest of these advantages was its excellent fiscal system for county purposes. That system, which began about a century ago, and was improved some years since, was simple and economical. It had given satisfaction to the country gentry, the large landowners, and the small occupiers; but the hon. Member proposed to destroy it, and substitute a cumbrous and expensive system, of which it was evident that he himself (Sir D. Norreys) had not a clear idea, and of whose expensiveness he defied him to make even an approximate calculation. The hon. Baronet had referred to the management of the highways, but he (Colonel French) thought that no better evidence could be afforded of the efficiency of the system than existed in connection with this point. The present system had enabled Ireland to construct and keep in repair her roads better and more cheaply than any other country in Europe—whether France, in which country the roads were first made by the State, or Belgium where they were made by communes, or this country, in which they were made by private subscriptions. Under it Ireland kept in excellent repair 43,000 miles of road, in respect of which not one shilling was due, while in this country, under a different system, 26,000 miles of road were in a bankrupt condition for the sum of £9,000,000. The amount annually raised in Ireland for the construction and maintenance of highways was only £367,000; and, while the preliminary expenses attendant upon the making of a road in this country were £600 or £700, in Ireland they were only about 50s. The hon. Member for Mallow had said that the Irish grand jury system was nothing but a vast “job,” but he (Colonel French) denied that any jobbing did exist, or could exist under that system. Of the whole sum annually levied with the consent of the grand jury—namely, about £900,000, only a small portion of it (between £300,000 and £400,000) was under their control. All the private, as well as the main roads, were kept in good repair under the existing system, and instead of there being that extravagant expenditure of which the hon. Member spoke, it was really surprising that so much work was done with so small a sum. The grand jury could not originate anything. They had no independent power of levying any money. They could merely exercise the power of vetoing the propositions of the associated ratepayers. Ample opportunity was given of appealing against those propositions. If the appealing party were not satisfied with the decision of the judge appealed to, the matter might, by means of a traverse, be submitted to the opinion of a jury of the district proposed to be benefited. The levying of the road rates was, in fact, in the hands of those who were most interested in the roads being kept in an excellent

state of repair, and in an economical expenditure of the rates; he alluded to the chief farmers of the country, whose object was to have their produce despatched to market quickly and economically. The construction of works was submitted by advertisement to competition, and the lowest tender had to be accepted. Presentments were made in open court, in the presence of the residents of the barony, of the county surveyor, and of an officer appointed by the Executive Government. Under such circumstances jobbing was impossible; in fact there was no room for it. No system was so perfect but he admitted that it was open to improvement; and he (Colonel French) had no objection to reform, but this Bill did not reform; it only substituted a cumbrous and expensive, for an easy and inexpensive system: and while, in appearance, it admitted the representative principle, by its provisions for divisional councils and other arrangements of the same character, in reality it was one of the most autocratic measures ever propounded in that House, for it would hand over altogether the power of the grand juries to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. The cost of working the measure of his (Colonel French's) hon. Friend would be £140,000 a year, in addition to heavy law charges and expenses for 288 travelling Members of these councils, together with compensation for reduced offices as a matter of course. His hon. Friend was entitled to great credit for industry and ingenuity, but he had collected together a set of most unmanageable details, and had succeeded in producing the most objectionable measure he (Colonel French) had seen during an experience of twenty years. He trusted, therefore, that the Government would not sanction the measure, and for his own part he felt bound to meet it with a direct negative.

MR. BAGWELL said; he thought this question relating to grand juries was one which must be very soon entertained by Parliament, and which could not remain much longer in abeyance. In reality the system was perhaps the greatest anomaly which existed at the present day. Grand juries could at any time overrule the cesspayers, and the result was that in this case there existed a system of taxation without representation. Under these circumstances, though it was too late to attempt to legislate on this subject in the present Session, he did hope that now they had as Chief Secretary for Ireland an Irish gentleman who had been for many years conversant with this subject, the right hon. Gentleman would either himself bring forward or would support such a measure as would meet the wishes of the people of Ireland on this subject. He was sorry that he felt obliged to vote against the Motion of the hon. Baronet the Member for Mallow (Sir D. Norreys), but that hon. Gentleman would make a bad system ten thousand times worse by his proposal.

MR. M'MAHON said, that the hon. and gallant Member for Roscommon had not applied himself to the question before the House, which was, not "Aye or No, is the proposition of the hon. Member a good one," but "Aye or No, is the grand-jury system worthy of support?" Now, from Thom's Statistics, it appeared that this species of taxation had been constantly increasing. From 1836 to 1849, when the charge for the constabulary force was removed, the county cess was never less than £1,000,000, and sometimes much more. Now, although a charge of £500,000 for the constabulary force had been removed, the amount of cess in 1855 was as much as £978,000. In 1854 the entire revenue of Ireland was about £5,000,000, so that the tax in question was a fifth part of the whole revenue of the county. It was more than the whole revenue of Switzerland and twice that of Greece. He was firmly persuaded that there was not a man out of Roscommon who was satisfied with the present grand-jury system, and he could quote to almost any extent from the evidence of witnesses from Armagh, Tyrone, and other parts of Ireland, given before the Devon Commission, to show that the county cess was a most intolerable grievance, which required to be remedied. But the greatest number of complaints against the present system came from the county of Kerry, which was represented by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland. Even in the province of Ulster the county cess was considered the greatest grievance of the country. Mr. O'Hara and Lieutenant Colonel Blacker gave evidence against it. Mr. Sproule said it was the most grievous tax the country laboured under, and an intolerable burden which required redress. The House must recollect that the cess was imposed by gentlemen who happened to be chosen by the High Sheriff; and even the High Sheriff could not always exercise his own discretion in the appointment of those gentlemen, for it was not many years ago that a High Sheriff had been horsewhipped for not putting a person on the grand jury. The fact was that this was an old standing grievance, to remedy which little or nothing had been done for upwards of a quarter of a century. So long ago as 1830 the Select Committee on the state of the poor in Ireland expressed their decided opinion that, in order to impose some check upon the expenditure, the occupying tenant should be released from the burden of paying the whole of the county assessment, and that such assessment should, in whole or in part, be paid by the landlord. That was the view which was all but universally entertained in Ireland, the people being quite agreed either that the landowners should pay half the cess, or that the class who imposed the rate should be elected by the ratepayers. In England there was a representation as a check on the expenditure, but that was not the case in Ireland. It had been said that a great improvement had taken place in the system since the appointment of associated cesspayers, under the 6 & 7 Will. IV., in 1836; but the fact was, that those persons were named by the grand jurors, who usually nominated, not the best financiers in their neighbourhood, but the men who were the most facile and most likely to concur in any job that might be proposed. Previously to 1835 the county cess in Ireland had never, but upon one occasion, amounted to as much as £1,000,000; but since that year it had always exceeded that sum, and in 1849 it reached £1,300,000. The cesspayers, therefore, so far from contributing to reduce the rate, were only made the cloak for more jobbery and increased expenditure. He was satisfied that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Ireland could not confer a greater benefit on the country than by acceding to the Motion of the hon. Member for Mallow; and, if he did so, it would be then open to the Government to appoint a Committee, or a Commission, in the vacation, to consider the whole subject. Whatever the House might do, however, he trusted that they would not, by agreeing to the arguments of the hon. and gallant Member for Roscommon, proclaim that the present grand-jury system of Ireland met with their approbation.

MR. COGAN observed, that he should vote for the Motion of the hon. Member for Mallow without committing himself to all the details of the proposition. The affirmation of that Motion would be merely an expression of disapproval of the present system of grand juries in Ireland, and that a representative system should be substituted. In the presentment sessions it was notorious that the voice of the elected ratepayers was always overborne when any question came forward in which the gentry of the county were interested. On a recent occasion a presentment for a large sum of money, £3,000, was applied for in the county he represented. The elected ratepayers for fourteen baronies appeared, and out of the fourteen baronies nine voted against the presentment and five for it; but thirty-five magistrates came down, many of whom had seldom or never attended petty sessions, and the presentment was passed, against the wish of the ratepayers. Therefore some remedy ought to be applied to this state of things, and he suggested that some system might judiciously be adopted similar to that of a board of guardians, composed partly of elected and partly of ex officio members. The expenditure would then be more economically administered, and great advantage would result from the association together of different classes of the community. He thought the county cess should be distributed between the occupier and the owner. He trusted the Government would give an assurance that the grand-jury system would receive their consideration, and that they would at some future period introduce a measure to remedy the evils which on all hands were acknowledged to exist.

MR. H. A. HERBERT said, that the hon. Member who introduced the present Motion described him as entirely prejudiced in favour of the grand jury system, and said that he was so accustomed to rule everything according to his own way in his own county, that he would hardly fail to cling to a system, the incidents of which were demoralizing and under which jobs of every description were sanctioned. He must deny altogether the possession of any such influence. There existed in his county a body of gentlemen quite as independent as himself, and therefore incapable of being influenced in the way described. He was not prepared to state that the grand jury system was all perfection. It had certain defects, and he should be glad to do all in his power to remedy them, but he could not agree that they were of such a nature as to justify the very strong description given by the hon. Gentleman. He had been for twenty years a member of a grand jury, and he had seen, year by year, great improvement in the condition of the roads in his own county, combined with more economical management of expenditure. The system, with all its imperfections, worked on the whole exceedingly well. He was quite willing to admit that, with respect to the formation of baronial-road sessions, he should like to see a more popular system of election introduced, and therefore the hon. Member would see that he was not so bigoted as the hon. Member had supposed in favour of everything connected with the grand jury system. He would be satisfied if they got for those sessions as popular a system of election as was established for boards of guardians; but if the hon. Member meant to say that no such thing as a job was perpetrated by the Poor-law Boards, he must express his dissent, while admitting that the poor-law system had generally worked well in Ireland. At the same time it must be recollected that, according to the existing practice, all works originated with the road sessions, and not with the grand juries. While stating that he was ready to accede to a liberal modification of the grand jury system in the point he had adverted to, he would guard himself against being supposed to adopt the views expressed by the hon. Mover of the present Motion on that part of the subject. With regard to the incidence of the tax—theoretically it might not be quite just; but if a new arrangement of it were made it would have to be on a principle different from that under the Poor Law. He did not think it would be fair to take away all power from the grand jury, and at the same time to fix them with half the taxation. It was true that that principle was adopted with regard to the poor-law taxation, but in that case there was this distinction, that the poor-law rate was an entirely new tax, whereas the grand jury cess was an old one, and lands were let and taken subject to it. The hon. Member was also unfortunate in his allusions to England, because not only were the highway rates in that country paid by the occupier, but also the whole of the poor rate. The hon. Member had alluded to the Report of the Commission; but if he had read more of it he would have found that the Commissioners were far from recommending the extensive change which he proposed, and that what they recommended was something totally different from the sweeping away of the whole system and the substitution of another in its place, a change the benefit of which was extremely doubtful. The want of continuous action between one grand jury and another had been also referred to. It was perfectly true that when grand juries were broken up they could not supervise the expenditure of the counties, but the remedy recommended in the Report was not the abolition of the grand jury system, but the creation of financial committees, to be entrusted with certain powers. He must remind hon. Gentlemen that the grand juries had no power whatever of originating taxation, and that when they appealed to English notions with regard to the abuses of the grand jury system, they spoke of a system which no longer existed, for the Act of 1836 provided that all taxation should originate with the body of cess-payers, and much embarrassment was frequently occasioned by the stringent wording of the law, which rendered it impossible for grand juries to take the initiative with regard to measures of taxation. The Bill of his hon. Friend was so voluminous that he would not attempt to enter into its details. He (Mr. Herbert) did not mean to say the grand jury system was perfect and incapable of improvement, but it was impossible that so voluminous a measure, containing 190 clauses, introduced on the 23rd of June, could have any chance of passing into law during the present Session; and, if his hon. Friend was simply anxious that his propositions should be known and considered, he had already had the opportunity of printing and circulating his Bill. If, therefore, his hon. Friend pressed the Motion, he (Mr. Herbert) would deem it his duty, without any discourteous feeling, to vote against the introduction of the measure.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he had expected more from the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Ireland. The admissions of the right hon. Gentleman, however, proved that the hon. Member for Mallow has rendered a public service in bringing this subject, Session after Session, under the attention of the House. He (Mr. Maguire) believed, however, from the experience he had had on such matters, that, if any amendment was to be effected in the grand jury law of Ireland, it must originate with the Government, and he thought it was the duty of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Herbert)—whom as an Irishman he (Mr. Maguire) was glad to see in his present office—in conjunction with his hon. and learned Colleague who was well acquainted with the subject, to devote his attention to it during the recess, with the view of preparing a measure which might be submitted to Parliament next Session. His hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Roscommon had intimated that the grand jury system was popular in Ireland, but he (Mr. Maguire) ventured to say, that there was scarcely any institution in that country which was at the present moment more unpopular. In proof of this fact, he might mention that at the last election nearly forty Liberal Members were returned, who were pledged to their constituents to endeavour to effect some improvement in the grand jury law. He (Mr. Maguire) could state, that the associated ratepayers regarded their functions as a mere farce, and were disposed to shrink from their discharge. The fact was, that they had no real power, for six, or eight, or ten, associated ratepayers, might be overridden by a "whip" of some thirty or forty magistrates. The great principle of the British constitution was, that taxation and representation should be co-existent, and he believed that if the principle were fully carried out, the ratepayers would discharge their duties as anxiously and as assiduously as the humblest members of the boards of guardians. It would be well for the public interest, if there was a popular form of election; and he called on the Secretary for Ireland to put a Bill on the table next Session in which that principle was recognized, believing, if the right hon. Gentleman did so, that every Irish Member on both sides of the House would give in his adhesion to such a measure. He (Mr. Maguire) could conscientiously say, on his own knowledge, that the existing system was unpopular, and that the right hon. Gentleman would do a most meritorious act, if he gave this subject his serious consideration in the recess, and came prepared in the next Session of Parliament with a matured measure for dealing with it. He (Mr. Maguire) should feel it his duty to vote with the hon. Baronet (Sir D. Norreys) if he pressed his Motion on this occasion to a division, but he thought at the same time that the hon. Baronet, having done a great deal to advance the question, might fairly yield to the suggestion of the Secretary for Ireland, and withdraw his Bill, without seeking the additional triumph of a small minority.

MR. GREER said, he could assure the House that the grand jury system was quite as unpopular in that part of Ireland with which he was connected, as it had been described to be in other districts of the country. He had hoped that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Ireland would have been prepared to announce that the Government was about to take up this subject and deal with it in some way calculated to allay the existing discontent. Not a single hon. Member who had spoken during the debate, not even the hon. Member for Roscommon, had ventured to deny that it was capable of reform. He (Mr. Greer), while approving the principle of the Bill of the hon. Baronet (Sir D. Norreys), thought, at the same time, the hon. Baronet would do wisely not to press his Motion to a division after the speech of the Secretary for Ireland. But, inasmuch as the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Herbert) had said, the grand jury system required reform, he (Mr. Greer) thought the right hon. Gentleman was bound to urge the matter on the attention of the Government, so that a remedy might be applied to what he admitted to be a manifest grievance. With respect to the associated ratepayers, he did not think so ill of them as some hon. Members who had taken part in the debate. He believed that in some districts they were useful in many respects, and especially in preventing jobs, but they were not a sufficient check on the profuse and unnecessary expenditure of money by the grand jury. For his part, he should like to see the grand jury itself an elective body, chosen directly by the ratepayers, after the example of the poor-law system, which had worked so well in practice. There was also another matter to which he wished to direct attention. Many items of expenditure the associated ratepayers had no control over. For example, there was in each county a treasurer, at a considerable salary, although the money was received and all payments made by the Bank, and the treasurer never received a farthing of the funds. This abuse and many others connected with the grand jury system called loudly for some remedy.

MR. BOWYER said, that after reminding the House that he himself brought in a Bill on this subject during the last Parliament, he wished to observe that the Secretary for Ireland had admitted that it would be desirable to introduce the principle of representations into the road sessions. In doing that, the right hon. Gentleman had conceded the principle of representation; but if that principle were right and proper with regard to the road sessions, why should it not be so with respect to the grand jury itself? He was told that the expenditure originated with the road sessions, and that the grand jury had no power to originate anything; but it ought to be remembered that, under the existing system, the Lord Lieutenant, as the representative of the Government, appointed the sheriffs, the sheriffs appointed the grand jurors, the grand jurors appointed the associated cesspayers, and the associated cesspayers had to determine what were the proposals which should be submitted to the consideration of the grand juries. Now, that system appeared to him to resemble a vicious circle; and he certainly thought that it ought to be amended at the earliest possible moment. It would, no doubt, be an improvement if the associated cesspayers were elective, but he wanted to know why the grand jury should not be elective also? It had been said during the debate that the grand jury system was one of great purity, but in answer to that he could state that in the county of Louth, with which he was connected, it had not that reputation, but, on the contrary, gave great dissatisfaction. He contended that if even it did not give opportunities for jobbery, the system was wrong in principle. He was told—though he was not in the House at the time—that the hon. Member for Roscommon, while opposing the Motion before the House, still conceded the principle of representation. Why, that was the very principle on which the Bill of the hon. Member for Mallow (Sir D. Norreys) proceeded, for it provided that those who managed the cess should be elected by those who paid the cess, and he (Mr. Bowyer) confessed he was disappointed at not having heard a fuller recognition of that principle by the Secretary for Ireland. If the hon. Member for Mallow pressed his Motion to a division, he (Mr. Bowyer) should go into the lobby with him, because he had no doubt the principle of his Bill was a sound one. He had, however, a notion that it was too complicated a measure, and was in that respect not so good as the Bill which he (Mr. Bowyer) himself introduced last Session, in which he endeavoured to avoid the evil of complexity by dealing only with the want of representation in the grand jury system.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON could not agree in the justice of the statement of the hon. Member (Mr. Greer) as to the great unpopularity of the grand jury system in the north of Ireland. He (Lord C. Hamilton) had enjoyed extensive opportunities of becoming acquainted with the opinions of the grand juries and the farmers in that part of the country, and he could state that, as far as his knowledge went, the Members of both those classes considered the Bill before the House to be as absurd a measure as it would be possible to devise. The hon. Member (Sir D. Norreys) had omitted the effects of publicity in moderating any mischievous tendencies in the grand jury system, and without publicity his new boards would be nests of jobbing. The Act of 1836 was, no doubt, an improvement, but it had been followed by an increase of expenditure, and would not the same result follow the adoption of the hon. Gentleman's Bill? He would admit that of late years the practice had been for the grand jury to select the associated ratepayers, but he denied that the practice was according to law. The reason was that farmers now attended more to their own affairs, and it was difficult to get respectable farmers to come to a baronial sessions, and still more to lose two or three days in a county town at assizes. Therefore, practically, the grand jury were obliged to nominate the associated ratepayers, but they would be delighted to see the farmers take a more active part in the management of county affairs. It was said that the associated ratepayers were sometimes overwhelmed by the magistrates, but in the case alluded to by an hon. Member (Mr. Cogan) the presentment was one made by the county at large. It would, however, be so contrary to everything right and proper for the magistrates to come to the baronial sessions and overwhelm the associated ratepayers that such an interference could not fail to be visited by the severest condemnation of the public press. He should be glad to see some changes in the grand jury system, but he protested against the wholesale condemnation of that system which the House had heard from the hon. Member for Mallow.

MR. M'CANN remarked that he would advise his hon. Friend the Member for Mallow to leave the matter in the hands of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Ireland, who, he trusted, would be prepared before next Session with a measure on the subject.

SIR DENHAM NORREYS said, that he had forborne to make any statement condemnatory of the grand jury system upon his own authority. The Commissioners stated, so long ago as 1840, that the associated ratepayers were selected by the grand jury, and that they did not attend except to agree to some job or other. There could, therefore, be no connection between the practice of selection by the grand jury and the present prosperity of the agricultural interest, as had been suggested by the noble Lord (Lord C. Hamilton). He had no great hopes of any efficient measure from the Secretary for Ireland. He was a Liberal, and had shown a disposition to act liberally, but he doubted whether he would touch the grand jury class, to which he himself belonged. The discussion that had taken place that night would, however, go before the country, which would judge between him and the right hon. Gentleman. He had only to add that he would accede to what appeared to be the wish of the House, and did not intend to press his Motion.

Motion by leave withdrawn.

GROWTH OF COTTON IN INDIA.

MOTION. PREVIOUS QUESTION MOVED.

MR. J. B. SMITH said, that the importance of the subject to which he was about to call the attention of the House could scarcely be overrated, and when he remembered the eloquence and ability with which it had been advocated in that House by gentlemen who were no longer Members of it, he confessed that he felt somewhat dismayed at the task he had undertaken. He begged, therefore, at the outset to bespeak the kind indulgence of the House. There exists so great an indisposition to change in this country, that it is not until evils have accumulated to an unendurable extent that the Legislature can be induced to grapple with them. It was not until Ireland was overtaken by a fearful famine that we could be persuaded to abandon the folly of depending on one source of supply for our necessary food, and so in the case of India, hundreds of thousands of the population were periodically swept away by famines occasioned by droughts, and yet the attention of the Government was not directed to these enormous evils until the serious financial embarrassment they occasioned forced them to adopt some means of preventing the recurrence of these deplorable visitations. Hence the commencement of the great Ganges Canal and some other works of irrigation. We are now suffering from a short supply of the important article of cotton, and it was not improbable that that circumstance may be the means of forcing our attention to India, and may lead to important changes in our Indian policy and Government. The wise commercial policy established in England in 1846 had produced results beyond the most sanguine expectations. Our foreign trade had doubled within the last ten years, and an enormously increased demand had been created for the raw materials of all our manufactures, the consumption of which had overtaken the production. A deficiency in the supply of cotton was consequently experienced, and many of our manufacturers were at present working short time. This state of things had led them to reflect on their present position and future prospects. The latter were by no means flattering. This great manufacture depends chiefly on one source of supply for its raw material. Of the 900,000,000 lbs. of cotton-wool which we consumed last year 700,000,000 lbs. was the produce of America. The result of this state of things was that great fluctuations in price were experienced, arising from variations in the seasons, while there was also the additional disadvantage and danger that the greater portion of the supply was the product of slave labour. In these circumstances it was some consolation to our manufacturers to know from inquiries, which they had instituted, that we had in our own territories a larger portion of land suitable for the growth of cotton than was possessed by any other country in the world. We had an abundance of land in the West Indies, but there existed a deficiency of cheap labour. In the East Indies, also, we had an unlimited area of suitable land, while labour was abundant and cheap. It was chiefly to India, therefore, that our manufacturers directed their attention. The Committee moved for by Mr. Bright in 1848, on the growth of cotton in India, reported that that country was capable of furnishing an unlimited supply of cotton. Why, then, it would be asked, did not our manufacturers send their agents to India to procure this important article; and how

was it that Englishmen who are to be found in every other part of the world will not go to India? This is a question which the Indian Government are called upon to answer. Now, within the last fifteen years upwards of 3,000,000 of our people have emigrated to different parts of the world, but very few of them have gone to India. According to an official return the number of British subjects engaged in trade and commerce in India, and unconnected with the Company's service, was, in 1852, in Bengal 273, in Madras 37, and in Bombay only 7. In the towns, however, including Calcutta and other popular places, there were 10,000 such persons, while in the country there were but 317. Was it on account of the climate that Englishmen will not go to India? Why, there was no country, however inhospitable its climate, in which they were not found in pursuit of gain, or the improvement of their own condition. It could not be the climate which kept our countrymen from settling in India. There was no lack of Englishmen anxious to enter the East India Company's service. If India, then, was the only country to which our people did not transfer their energy, capital, and skill, by which it would be so much benefited, that fact alone was a sufficient ground for inquiry. The reason why Englishmen did not go to India was, he believed, because the Indian Government was synonymous with bad government. In that country there was an absence of what the noble Lord the Member for London lately described as the very object for which all Governments were established—namely, the protection of person and property. In India there are no roads, no enterprise, and the people are naked and poverty-stricken, and, except in the province of Bengal, no man can own a single acre of land in fee simple. These, surely, were not very encouraging conditions to tempt an Englishman either to embark his capital or to settle there. In England we have 120,000 miles of road, but India, a country nearly as large as all Europe, had only three or four thousand miles of metalled road. The Bombay merchants explained that they could not get into the country because there were no roads or bridges; and, for the same reason, the people in the country could not come to them. In a Memorial presented to Lord Dalhousie by the leading merchants and bankers of Bombay in 1850 it was stated—

" ' Bombay possesses scarcely any roads. So miserably inadequate are the means of communication with the interior, that many valuable articles of produce are, for want of carriage and a market, often left to perish in the fields, while the cost of those which do find their way to this port is enormously enhanced, to the extent sometimes of 200 per cent; considerable quantities never reach their destination at all, and the quality of the remainder is almost universally deteriorated.' Colonel Grant said that, ' Of the vast number of sheep fed in Candeish and the Deccan which are sent down to the Bombay market, not one-third reach Bombay alive, and those greatly reduced in flesh.' Mr. Mackie, who was sent out by the Manchester Chamber of Commerce for the purpose of inquiring into the facilities which that country afforded for the growth of cotton, confirmed these statements, and said, ' It is a misnomer to call the rude tracks in Guzerat roads.' He added that, ' In the civilized and ordinary sense of the term, there are none in the province.' He relates that it took him seven hours to travel twelve miles in a bullock-cart on the road between Jambooseer and the port of Tankaria, and long before he arrived at the end of his journey there was scarcely a bone of his body which was not the seat of pain. ' On the way the mamlutdar amused us with several stories of accidents which had occurred on the road, one of which related to the sad fate of a trader, who received such a jolt as made him inadvertently bite the end of his own tongue off. Nor is this road a mere byway leading to a village or two, but a great thoroughfare, forming the main outlet to a large and rich tract of country.' "

General Briggs, when examined by the Committee on Cotton of 1848, of which he (Mr. Smith) had the honour to be a member, related a story which was almost incredible. He said—

" During the campaign of 1846, 100 officers were required to be sent 1,500 to 1,600 miles, from Calcutta to the banks of the Sutlej, and were obliged, from the state of the roads, to be carried in palanquins, so that 7,200 men must have been put into requisition to carry them, and yet only 80 of the 100 arrived before the campaign was over."

Travellers related such a state of things in Turkey as the evidence of a barbarous Government, but one can scarcely realize it in a country which has been governed 100 years by Englishmen. The hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Mangles), when examined before the Cotton Committee, admitted that it was the duty of the Government to make roads, works of irrigation, and other public works in India. He was asked the question, " What revenue have you received during the last fourteen years from India?" His answer was, " We have received about £300,000,000." He was then asked, " What have you spent in roads, works of irrigation, and public works?" and his reply was, " £1,400,000," being about

1d. for every £1 they had received. But even if roads were made into the country, the extreme sterility of the soil of India afforded but little attraction to European settlers. An acre of land only produced from 50 lbs. to 70 lbs. of clean cotton; but in America the same quantity of land produced 400 lbs. The land in America was watered during the whole cotton-growing season, while in India it was parched sometimes for about eight or nine months by a burning sun. Nevertheless, more rain falls in India than in America, and if it were collected, instead of being allowed to run away uselessly to the sea, the land in India might be made as productive as the land in America, and its growth increased to four or five times its present extent. Colonel Cotton thus strikingly illustrated the folly and ignorance of the Indian Government:—

" The savages of Australia trod upon gold for hundreds of years, while they were often in want of food, and always without a rag of clothing; and very similar has been the state of things in India. With an unlimited supply of water within reach, which if applied to purposes of irrigation would more than provide for every possible want, the people of India have been generally barely supplied with the necessaries of life, and often so entirely without them as to perish by hundreds of thousands; and their European rulers, with this treasure within their reach, of far greater value in proportion to the cost of obtaining it than the richest gold mines in the world, have been unable to make their income equal their expenditure."

The native Governments appreciated this invaluable method of increasing the fertility of the soil, as is evidenced by the ruins of great works of irrigation in all parts of the country; and we have instructive proofs of the consequences of the destruction of works of this kind in the present condition of Egypt, ancient Nineveh, and Babylon, once the seats of wealth and civilization; but now, on account of the non-irrigation of the land, the soil which maintained their vast populations, is become a sandy desert, and from the same causes millions of acres of land in India were now lying waste. By means of irrigation the growth of cotton in India might be increased four or five-fold, and greatly improved in quality. He did not mean to say that the Government had not constructed any works of irrigation. He had already mentioned that they had constructed the Ganges Canal, which, although forced upon it to prevent famines, was unquestionably a great work. Including its branches it extended 800 miles. [Mr. MANGLES: Hear, hear!] He understood that cheer of the hon. Member, he knew that the East India Company was very fond of boasting of it, but this country might with equal wisdom have folded its arms, and satisfied itself with the boast of having completed a great work when it had made its first railway from Manchester to Liverpool, for that railway only bears about the same proportion to the railway wants of England that the Ganges Canal bears to the irrigation wants of India. One of the great obstacles to Europeans settling in India was the system of land tenure. The Government of India claimed to be the owners of all the land in that country; and except in the province of Bengal nobody could own an acre of land in fee simple. The question of land tenure in India was most important. In the United States and in the British colonies, as well as in India, the Government claim to be the owners of all the land; but in these countries it is sold to the people in fee simple for ever. In India the Government retain it as landlords. Every field in this vast empire is measured and assessed, and by whatever nominal tenure the land is held, the real tenure is an annual settlement, because the assessment nearly always being higher than the ryot was able to pay, a yearly inquiry was necessary to determine how much the cultivator could pay. That system of annual settlement of the land necessarily gave immense power to a swarm of corrupt Government officials; but he had no doubt that his hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. Mangles) would call this system the perfection of human wisdom. He would not enter into a discussion of that part of the subject, but he would read to them the opinion expressed by the Directors of the East India Company in 1809, which appeared to him (Mr. J. B. Smith) to be so consistent with common sense that it was surprising the system had continued so long. In their despatch in that year they dwelt upon—

“The obvious defect of the system of land tenure, the minuteness of investigation which it involves, the necessary employment of countless native agents, the impossibility of preventing their malpractices, and the difficulty of adjusting the rents to all the varieties of the seasons and public events; and conclude, that although the plan, intelligently followed up, might be well calculated to discover the resources of a country, yet it was not to be preferred for constant practice.”

A high authority, Lord Wellesley, had also expressed his opinion that the Indian Government ought not to be owners of the soil or collectors of the rent. It was a mistake to suppose that there was any analogy between rent in England and rent in India. Rent in England is paid by a capitalist, who farms for profit. In India the ryots or cultivators are without capital; the only motive they have for devoting themselves to the cultivation of the soil is the pressing wants of nature, the necessity of getting food. They must, therefore, pay any rent imposed on them, or starve. After all, the best test of any system was the condition of the people. What was the condition of the people in America and in our colonies? Why, they were among the most flourishing communities that perhaps ever existed on the face of the earth. But what was the condition of the naked tenants of the East India Company? Extreme poverty and abject wretchedness. In our Eastern colonies, Ceylon, Penang, Singapore, and Hong Kong, the Indian system had been abandoned, and the land was either sold in perpetuity or let on leases of 999 years. That system was an encouragement to European settlement, and had effected such an improvement in the condition of the people that they were to be reckoned among the most flourishing of our Eastern fellow subjects. He remembered that some curious evidence was given before the Cotton Committee as to the taxes imposed in Madras upon the tools of the artisan — his hammers and chisels, for instance. Even the barber's razor was taxed. The instrument with which the Indians cleaned cotton, and which cost 1s., had to pay an annual tax of 2s. He was glad, however, to say that he had lately received a Return dated Nov. 5, 1856, in which it was stated that these scandalous taxes were abolished. About ten days ago he also received another document of a most extraordinary character relating to Madras. He believed that the land tax in that province produced less now than it did fifty years ago. After having impoverished the people to such an extent that (as was proved before the Torture Commission), the rents could not be collected except by torture, the Indian Government had at last commanded a new assessment and survey to be made of the province of Madras. That province was about three times as large as England and Wales, but the portion which was to be surveyed was about as large as Great Britain. From the evidence given before the Committee, the House might form some idea of these Indian surveys. Every field was measured; four or five holes were dug in it in different parts to ascertain the quality of the soil, from which the surveyors estimated the amount of the produce it would yield, and then the rent was fixed at two-thirds of the net produce. After all, however, the assessment was left to the judgment and sound discretion of the assessor. He saw it estimated that this survey would take not less than twenty-two years to accomplish, and that it would cost £764,000—and reckoning the value of money to be six times more in India than in England, it would amount to a sum equivalent to about £4,000,000 or £5,000,000 of our money. If a document of this kind had issued from Constantinople it would have created no surprise; but that it should have issued from a country governed by Englishmen, with the lights and experience of the nineteenth century, and with a distinguished political economist high in the service of the Company whom they might have consulted, was indeed extraordinary, and only showed how slowly light travelled to the regions of Leadenhall Street and Cannon Row. The work would occupy twenty-two years! Why, how many of the wretched cultivators would have passed away to be taxed no more ere this doubtful relief reached them! It would cost £764,000, which in Madras would make 2,000 miles of road. If the hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Mangles) did not know the effect of roads upon the value of land he would probably be glad to have his attention called to a very interesting document—a report to the Board of Trade on American railways by Captain Galton. This Gentleman says, that in the State of Illinois, bordered by the Mississippi, the American Government had on sale land supposed to be some of the richest in the world, but which remained on sale thirty years at a dollar an acre, and, strange to say, no customers could be found for it. In this state of things an American company offered, in consideration of receiving 2,500,000 acres of land, to make a railway throughout the country. The Government consented, and Captain Galton reported upon the 700 miles of railway which this company had made. No sooner was the line completed than people flocked from all parts to take possession of this rich soil, and the result was that land which for thirty years had been unsaleable at a dollar an acre was now sold by the company at 13 dollars 9 cents an acre, their sales in April last amounting to 566,000 dollars. Now, before the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues had issued the Minute to which he had referred, involving an outlay of nearly £800,000 upon a work which would not be completed for twenty-two years, would it not have been well to inquire what would be the effect of making nearly 2,000 miles of road in the province? He need not take the hon. Gentleman across the Atlantic to discover the effect of roads upon the value of land. In Ceylon, which rejoiced in not being under the East India Company's government, 3,000 miles of road had been made which was nearly as much as there was in all India; and capital roads they were, for a gentleman had informed him that he had travelled over them, not on palanquins borne on men's shoulders, but in a stage coach. In the little island of Ceylon, with a revenue not one-fiftieth part of that of India, 1,247 miles of road were rendered serviceable in four years and a half. Mark the results. Sir Emerson Tennent said—

“Before the Kandy road was made the paddy fields at Kaduganama were but worth one-half what they sell for now. Before the road was made to Marajapoorra the people there could not sell their rice for more than 6d. or 7d. a parrah, and they could scarcely get fish or salt to buy at any price, because the dealers could neither come to sell their fish nor buy their rice. Now they get from 2s. 6d. to 3s. a parrah for all the rice they can grow, and they get their salt, fish, and every other article abundant and cheap; so that the effect of new roads is to double the value of land, to double the value of everything you have to sell, and to lower the cost of everything you have to buy.”

But he would take the hon. Member to India itself. In Rajahmundry, a district of Madras, roads and works of irrigation had been carried on, and he had been favoured with a letter from that district dated April, 1856, which showed this gratifying result—

“Everybody and everything is prospering; there is no poverty, and I never hear any complaints of excessive taxes, of having to sell cattle to pay, of having lost all their crops, or that they had been ill-treated by the authorities, or been obliged to cultivate against their will; on the contrary, the difficulty in Naggaram is to decide who is to be allowed to have land, and not who must. And in Mogultoor the amibdar says,—He need not send people hunting the ryots to get the rent; they bring it to him themselves. I never by any chance see any of those half-starved wretches with scarcely any clothes. Everybody can get plenty of work everywhere.”

In the same district Mr. Taylor, the revenue officer, officially reported—

"That twenty-four villages in one talook, stimulated by the improvement in their outward circumstances, had voluntarily proposed that a permanent addition should be made to their land tax, to be applied to the establishment of schools for the education of their children."

There was abundant evidence to show that India possessed capabilities for producing not only cotton in almost unlimited quantities, but sugar, corn, tobacco, flax, hemp, and a variety of other articles, if the obstacles were removed which now weighed on the energies of the people, and prevented them from developing the resources of the country. There could be no question that if these obstacles were removed, and the people were placed in as comfortable a position as those he had just described in Rajahmundry, the consumption of English manufactures would be enormous. His belief was that India was capable of consuming as much of our manufactures as we now exported to all the world; and it was certainly a marvellous thing that a few thousand people in Australia should consume more of our manufactures than 180,000,000 of people in India. We had the evidence of Sir Thomas Munro that the Natives would take our manufactures if they were able. He said—

"The small demand for our manufactures arises solely from the inability to consume them. If the existing mode of taxation should be abandoned, the country, instead of rice and dry grain, would be covered with plantations of betel, coconut, sugar, indigo, and cotton, and the people would take a great deal of British manufactures, for they are remarkably fond of them. They are hindered from taking our goods, not by want of inclination, but either by poverty or the fear of being reputed rich, and having their rents raised. When we relinquish the barbarous system of annual settlements, when we make over the land either on very long leases or in perpetuity to the present occupants, and when we have convinced them by making no assessments above the fixed rates for a series of years that they are actually proprietors of the soil, we shall see a demand for European articles of which we have at present no conception."

There had lately been a great increase in our imports from India, and some people seemed to be afraid that we were getting a great deal more from that country than we should be able to pay for—that it was draining us of our specie, and that it was becoming a question whether it would not be better for us to give up our trade with India altogether. Now, what was the reason of these increased imports from India? It was all a question of prices. The increase in our imports from India was attributable to the higher price now offered for produce, which operated as a stimulus to the Indian merchant, and, counterbalanced the want of good roads and cheap conveyance; because the rise in the price of cotton, flax, hemp, and articles which we had been accustomed to obtain from Russia had enabled the Indian merchants to pay a higher price for conveying their produce to market than they could otherwise have afforded. If the price of these articles should fall again, however, our imports from India would also decline because the same obstacles existed now as had existed before, and roads and cheap conveyances were still required for bringing produce to market to compete with other countries under ordinary circumstances. The drain of specie at this time might be explained on the same principle that it had been accounted for during the existence of the corn laws. In those days we always had a drain of specie when we had a bad harvest, because we had to obtain our corn from countries where there was only an occasional demand, and we had to pay for it in money. He had endeavoured to show the obstacles which impede the productive powers of India. These obstacles the Government alone have the power to remove. In asking the Government to expend money on roads, canals, irrigation, and other public works, he was only asking them to fill their own treasury. They acknowledged that it was their duty to construct those public works, and the profits upon them were so enormous that the only wonder was that they had not completed works of that description all over India. The Indian Government some time ago appointed a commission to report upon the public works of India, and among other examples the Commissioners gave the following as the result of executing thirty-nine works of irrigation in the district under the Madras Presidency between the years 1836 and 1849. Of the thirty-nine works in question, the total cost of which was £54,111, on three there was a loss; four realized profits under 10 per cent per annum, sixteen realized profits of from 10 to 50 per cent per annum, nine realized profits of from 50 to 100 per cent per annum, six realized profits of from 100 to 200 per cent per annum, and one absolutely produced a profit of 259 per cent per annum. The net average profit upon the thirty-nine works, after deducting the loss on the three, was 69½ per cent per annum from the year of the execution of the works. At the present time, however, those works yielded a profit of at least 100 per cent per annum: but, in addition, the Government revenue had increased and the value of private property had increased, and those two items together were equivalent to another 100 per cent; so that there was an absolute profit upon those works of 200 per cent per annum. With reference to this subject the Commissioners said—

“We have repeatedly stated that a vast amount of capital might now be invested in every district in the construction of works of irrigation which would yield a return of 25 or 30 to 50 or 60 per cent on the outlay.”

And they added:—

“Looking at the very small amount of expenditure (£54,111) shown in that table, and comparing it with the vast number of works scattered all over the country, the creation of former dynasties, we could not avoid the reflection that if the present powers (East India Company) had always ruled in the country it would now have been destitute of those valuable sources of wealth.”

But the Government had acted upon false principles in carrying out these works, and had thereby embarrassed their finances; for instead of constructing public works out of revenue, as they had done, they should have borrowed the money for those purposes. These works would be more useful to the succeeding than to the present generation, and if they had been constructed by means of loans, India might have been covered with public works without financial inconvenience, and practically for nothing. That, perhaps, was a somewhat startling assertion, but he would endeavour to explain it. In Manchester a great public work had been executed for the purpose of supplying the city with gas without costing it one farthing of taxation. The corporation borrowed the money on the credit of the city, the gas was sold at as low a rate as in any other town; and after paying the interest on the money borrowed, and setting aside an annual sum for a sinking fund to pay off the debt, there remained a profit of £30,000 a year, which was applied to the improvement of the city. What was there to prevent the Indian Government from borrowing money for public works when they could borrow money for war purposes? Now, with regard to the growth of cotton in India. Indian cotton was of an inferior quality to that of America. It was worth less by 2d. per lb., and was only consumed by our manufacturers when American cotton was dear. The demand being therefore only occasional, there was no inducement to grow it for the English market. America had been hitherto our great source of supply, from the fact of their growing it cheaper than any other country, but the question arose whether India might not be placed in a position to compete with America in the supply of cotton. Mr. Nesbit Shaw, formerly a collector of revenue in the Dharwar district, was decidedly of opinion that India could even at present compete with America, not however by growing indigenous cotton, but by fairly turning attention to the introduction of superior varieties, by introducing all practicable improvements, and by a rigid determination to put down adulteration and other frauds in the trade. Mr. Shaw tried the experiment of growing on unirrigated land several thousand bales of cotton from New Orleans seed. This cotton sold at Manchester at 6½d. per lb., while the native cotton sold at 3½d. per lb. The produce from New Orleans seed was about 100 lbs. per acre, from native seed it was 60lbs. to 70lbs. This cotton (which sold in Manchester at 6½d. per lb.) only yielded about 1½d. per lb. to the cultivator. If this left as large a profit as other kinds of produce it would continue to be grown for a constant demand; and if, therefore, by means of irrigation the produce could be increased four or fivefold, and by improved roads the cost of production could also be reduced, there was no reason to doubt that India could compete with the lowest known prices of American cotton. But the abject poverty of the ryots was such that they could not undertake the growth of cotton, sugar, indigo, or other produce unless advances of money were made to them; and those advances were only made, according to the evidence which was given before the Cotton Committee, at rates of interest varying from 30 to 70 per cent. The Indian cultivator laboured, in fact, under extreme poverty, enormous rents, exorbitant rates of interest for advances, bad roads, and want of irrigation—the two latter evils could alone be remedied by the intervention of the Government. In Ceylon, though the same mistake was fallen into as in India of making roads out of revenue, these roads had so increased the wealth of the country that the revenue was not embarrassed like the revenue of India, and in ten years the exports of Ceylon had increased 230 per cent. He wished to call attention to the excellent opportunity which presented itself of encouraging the growth of cotton in India without a farthing of expense or risk to the Government. The province of Candeish was one of the richest in India, and peculiarly suited for the growth of cotton. It was a country covered with ruined towns and villages, which attested its former prosperity, but at present, according to the report of Captain Wingate, Revenue Survey Commissioner, only 14 per cent of the lands of that province were cultivated, the remainder lying waste, but nearly the whole was fertile and suitable for the growth of cotton, and exportable products, such as oilseeds, and indigo. The ryots were ready to extend the cultivation, but they could not do so with their present rents, a reduction would be sure to cause an extension of cultivation where there was waste to break up. Here was an excellent opportunity for the Government of India to try the experiment of giving a secure tenure of land in perpetuity, such as exists in all the British Colonies and in the United States—a system which has resulted in an amount of prosperity and happiness which might be equally enjoyed by India. According to the testimony of the gentleman he had just referred to, the people wanted the land, and would be glad to cultivate all that was now lying waste. Every farthing the Government received from unoccupied land would be clear profit; industry would be promoted, capital accumulated, the attachment of the people secured, and it would be seen whether a greater revenue could not be raised from prosperous farmers than from poverty-stricken ryots. There was land enough in that province capable of producing more cotton than was now grown in the United States. Shall this land continue to lie waste? He did not know how his Motion was to be met, but he should not be surprised if it was met, as Motions relating to India had in former times been met, by a denial of the facts; but it did not follow because the statements were denied that therefore they were untrue. The statements made on a former occasion by the late hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Bright) and the present hon. Member for Poole (Mr. D. Seymour) were denied, though they were nevertheless perfectly true. This showed how little dependence was to be placed on the assertions of those who are supposed to be best acquainted with India. The ignorance of the Governors of India upon the condition of India was appalling. He remembered the hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Mangles) stating before the Cotton Committee as evidence of the oppressions of the people,

“That the revenue system under the native Governments of India had always been with rare exceptions, of the most oppressive kind; that the manner in which the revenue authorities under the Nizams used to realize their revenue was by torture, flogging and imprisonment; that a revenue officer at Moorshedabad made one of his modes of extortion a pool of ordure and of all sorts of the most abominable filth, which he called ‘behisht’ or paradise. It was up to a man’s chin, and into this he used to plunge the unfortunate defaulters till they brought forward their balances. Another of his tortures was this: he had a large pair of leather breeches made, fastened at the bottom, and full of nasty insects and rats, and these he used to fasten about the naked body of the defaulter and tie them under his arms.”

The hon. Member for Guildford contrasted this state of things with the happy condition of the natives under British rule, though at the very moment he was speaking the most infamous and degrading insults and tortures, of which no doubt the hon. Member was perfectly unconscious, were being practised even upon women in India — insults and tortures which he could not mention, lest perchance the description should reach female ears. But hon. Members need only read the Madras torture Report to see how the honour and character of England had been degraded by the East India Company. The House would perhaps remember that the Hon. Member for Poole brought the question of India before the House some years ago. He stated that he had recently visited India. That he had travelled for miles through a desert country. He said that the population was in a most miserable condition; and that the great object of the Government of Madras was to get 10s. out of a man who had only eight. He said that torture was practised for the purpose of extorting rent. How were these statements met? The hon. Member for Honiton (Sir J. W. Hogg), then Chairman of the East India Company, made, as usual, a very clever speech, in which he said that there was not a word of truth in what had been stated; and that the hon. Member had been imposed upon by the statements of designing and interested persons, whose petitions to that House were a tissue of the grossest perversions and exaggerations. The right hon. Secretary of the Admiralty, who was then the President of the Board of Control, also got up and said that he did not believe that torture was practised in India. The hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Mangles) rose and said that he had been twenty years in India, and he declared most solemnly that he had never heard of anything of the kind. Another hon. Member, the Member for Roxburghshire, declared that though he had been thirty years in India, and also Secretary to the Board of Control, he had never heard of the existence of torture in India. What confidence can we attach to the information of such gentlemen in future? The fact was, that nothing was known of India except through the East India Company and their servants. We had never come into contact with the natives, except, indeed, upon one occasion, and that was a very instructive one. Lord Harris, as soon as he heard of the charge made by the hon. Member for Poole, of the practice of torture in the Presidency of Madras, issued a Commission that declared itself ready to receive evidence from all quarters; and what was the result? Why, though this inquiry was made at a most inconvenient season of the year—at a time when the people were gathering in the harvest, yet these poor creatures came 400 miles, in a country where there were no roads, to tell their grievances, and to complain of the tortures that had been inflicted in a most cruel and unmanly manner upon themselves, their wives or their daughters. The British Government had thought proper to suspend their relations with some foreign States on account of the ill-treatment and torture to which the subjects of those States were exposed by their Governments; but he would ask, if they looked a little nearer home than Naples, whether it might not be necessary to break off their relations with the East India Company? He wished to ask whether the time had not arrived when 180,000,000 of people in India should no longer be regarded as the subjects of a Government chosen by the proprietors of East India stock, but become the subjects of Queen Victoria? He called upon the House to do speedy justice to India. They had heard from that country a voice which resembled the rumbling of a volcano, and he called upon Parliament to do its duty, and see that justice was not delayed until it was too late. He begged to move,

“That in the opinion of this House it is expedient that Parliament shall direct its immediate attention to the best mode of removing the obstacles which impede the application of British capital and skill to the improvement of the productive powers of India.”

MR. TURNER said, that in seconding the Motion, it was not his intention to follow his hon. Friend through the details into which he had entered with regard to the misgovernment of India and the faults of the East India Company, but he would confine himself to a few practical observations, as he thought from a connection of upwards of forty years with the manufacturing industry of South Lancashire he might be able to throw some little light upon the subject. His connection with the Commercial Association of Manchester had placed him in frequent communication with the East India Company, and he consequently possessed some acquaintance with the measures which had been taken for developing the resources of India. He must, in the first place, be allowed to impress upon the House the immense importance of the cotton trade of South Lancashire. The hon. Member for Stockport had stated that such was the immense demand for cotton in the manufacturing districts of South Lancashire, that 900,000,000lb. were consumed annually, 700,000,000lb. of that quantity being imported from the United States of America. He (Mr. Turner) believed that about 380,000 persons were employed directly, and about 1,000,000 incidentally, in the manufacture of this cotton. The amount of capital invested in the manufacture was, at a low estimate, £40,000,000, and a working capital of about £15,000,000 was employed in the prosecution of the trade. In 1856 the exports of cotton goods amounted to the value of £38,000,000 after supplying the whole demands of this country. The cotton consumed in the same year was 2,250,000 bales, weighing 900,000,000. The cotton trade had been advancing with such rapid strides that, although the production of cotton in the United States of America had also made great progress, the demand had far surpassed the supply. One or two facts would exemplify this. During the year 1848 this country imported 1,738,000 bales of cotton, and in 1856, 2,467,000 bales; but while at the end of 1848 there were on hand 496,000 bales, or seventeen weeks' consumption, at the end of 1856 there were only on hand 332,000 bales, or eight weeks' consumption for the United Kingdom. He thought these facts exhibited a very serious state of things for a large manufacturing country like this, and that it was high time public attention should be directed to the subject, which was one not of local but of national importance. If this great branch of industry should be suspended, and it was so already for a considerable number of hours per week, to any greater extent, as it had been in years gone by, what effect would it have upon a large body of the population? In such a case he thought the Home Secretary would have to look with anxious eyes towards South Lancashire, and would find that the question was a serious one for the Government as well as for the cotton manufacturers. It was necessary to inquire how the existing state of things could be remedied, and whether the present supply of cotton could be relied upon without any danger of diminution. As the supply was obtained mainly from the United States, it was necessary to ascertain what was the condition of that country. Slavery had been abolished in our West Indian possessions, and he rejoiced that it was so. But might it not be asked whether there was not some inconsistency in deriving so large a proportion of the raw material required for the manufactures of this country from a State where slave labour was employed? He thought there was a possibility that, sooner or later, there would be some serious disturbance of labour in America; and what would be the state of affairs in this country if, owing to a rising of the slaves, the cotton plantations of the United States should be uncultivated, and a supply of the raw material could no longer be obtained from that quarter? But even if the Americans were to go growing cotton not by means of imported slaves but by a more degrading method,—by means of the poor creatures they raised and reared amongst themselves like so many cattle—supposing that in this way the production of cotton in America increased, and yet that our consumption increased in a greater ratio, could we rely upon the same proportion of imports to the demand which we had hitherto derived from the United States? He thought not; for in America, and in other parts of the world, manufactures were extending as rapidly as in this country, if not more so. The manufacturers there, under a protective system, would be able to offer higher prices for the quantity of raw material they required, and he believed that whatever deficiency there might be in the supply of cotton grown in America would ultimately be felt by Great Britain. The price of cotton

was now about double what it was in 1848. In that year American cotton averaged about 4*d.* per pound, while it was now 8*d.* per pound, and the difference of value on the consumption of cotton in Great Britain between 4*d.* and 8*d.* per pound amounted to £16,000,000 per annum, a sum nearly equal to the whole revenues of the East India Company. Where, then, were they to look for the means of meeting any deficiency in the supply of cotton? It was very possible that they might obtain some increased supplies from the West Indies, but since the abolition of slavery the negro population would not perform voluntarily such excessive labour as they were obliged to undergo in the United States. It had been argued that if slavery were abolished in America the negroes would still continue to work, but he did not believe they would get through one-third of the labour they were now compelled to perform. Cotton had been grown, and was still grown, in Brazil, but for many years there had been no increase in the production. In Australia, which had been suggested as a place from which the necessary supply might be obtained, the want of cheap labour must prevent any extensive production for many years, and the same objection applied to Natal. West Africa had been mentioned, but he had himself been concerned in an attempt to establish a plantation in that quarter of the world by way of experiment, which had proved a complete failure, in consequence of the impossibility of compelling the negroes to anything like steady continuous labour. He believed, with the hon. Member for Stockport, that they must look to India to supply the deficiency. He would give the East India Company credit for having, many years ago, introduced a number of American planters into their territories, at very considerable expense, with the view of cultivating cotton on the system pursued in the United States: but he believed the East India Company themselves would acknowledge that that had been a failure. He believed the Americans never intended to accomplish anything worth while in India. Their national feelings led them to fear lest India should become a rival to the United States, and their heart never was in the work. They always said that the cotton of India was as good as it could be made, and that no improvement could be effected in it. Now, he (Mr. Turner) was the largest consumer of East India cotton in Great Britain. His firm used at one time 80,000 lbs. weight of East India cotton per week, but it came in so dirty and neglected a state that no price could be given for it at all equal to the price of American cotton. A low price was paid for it, but there was so much adulteration that the firm at one time threw away an amount of sand and dirt that cost them no less than £7,000 per annum. That dirt and sand, however, might have been left behind in India. He must say that, in making representations on the subject of cotton to the East India Company, when he had accompanied deputations, he had always been received with great courtesy and civility; but, though many promises were made, nothing seemed to have been done. Cotton still came from India in the same filthy and neglected state, and that was accounted for by the way in which it was cultivated and brought to the coast. It was cultivated by the poor miserable ryots, who had to borrow money at a most exorbitant and ruinous rate of interest before they could put seed into the ground. From them it was transferred to the dealers, and then commenced the process of adulteration. When the dealers got the cotton, it was placed on bullocks' backs, and in that way conveyed to the coast, being often drenched with wet, and otherwise soiled and disordered. How could it be expected, under the system of culture and conveyance that was in use, and considering the miserable condition of the ryots, that a good article could find its way to this country? Now, to show that the cotton was good originally, he would state another fact. Mr. Landon, a gentleman in India, who had a station at Bruchma, who took an interest in this question, resolved that he would not only clean cotton, but spin it, and for this purpose he erected a mill. He had sent him (Mr. Turner) a specimen of his cotton yarn, which convinced him, that if the cotton could only be got in this country as clean as he had made it in India, the same results could be arrived at, and as good yarn produced. With the cotton which his firm at Manchester obtained from India (speaking technically) they could only produce what was called No. 16 yarn, whereas Mr. Landon was producing, in India, yarn equal to No. 40 from the same cotton. He believed that if the East India Company would only pursue the experiments carried on by Mr. Shaw, they would produce a revolution in the cotton trade of that country. By encouraging the natives to cultivate the American seed, instead of the seed of the country, nearly double the quantity of cotton per acre would be raised, and it would be worth 50 per cent. more than the indigenous article. The East India Company must also encourage efforts on the part of their servants, and make every officer feel that it is his duty to promote, to the utmost of his power, this great national work. They had no right to hold that great country merely for the sake of dividends and revenues. They held it as a sacred trust for the people of this country, as well as the people of India, and it was their duty to see that the interests of both were promoted in their intercourse with each other. The hon. Member for Stockport had alluded to his (Mr. Turner's) using some of the improved cotton of India. It was true, he had done so, and he could assure the House that the cotton grown in Dharwar from American seed was equal in every respect to cotton grown on the banks of the Mississippi. Indeed, the advantage was rather in favour of the East Indian cotton. Mr. Shaw, writing to him, said that the cotton sold in Manchester, and used by him (Mr. Turner) which was valued at  $6\frac{1}{4}d.$  to  $6\frac{1}{2}d.$  per lb., was grown by ryots by contract; that the rent of the land which produced it was  $1\frac{1}{2}$  rupee per acre, and the contract cost for cultivating it another  $1\frac{1}{2}$  rupee, altogether 6s. Let the House just reflect upon such a fact as this; that, if properly managed, the produce of an acre of cotton, which would amount, even under ordinary circumstances, to 100 lbs., would cost only 6s. Why, American slave labour had not a chance of standing against a cultivation like this. He would venture to hope, then, that the East India Board and the Court of Directors would take this matter into their serious consideration, and continue and extend guarantees to capitalists who provided money for well-considered railways, canals, and works of irrigation. He was satisfied that such undertakings would pay a good return for the outlay. He hoped, also, that they would continue and extend the system of securing to the cultivators a sure tenure of their land. That was absolutely necessary; for no man would ever think of attempting to improve land if he had to give the benefits of the improvements to his landlord. Lastly, they should establish a Board of Works in India, to which should be entrusted the special care of all improvements, as by so doing they would secure a more judicious expenditure of capital. By pursuing such measures as these, he believed they would derive a much larger revenue from their Indian empire than they had hitherto done ; and, in place of a miserable population like that which the hon. Mover had described, and which was very little better than the slaves of America, or the serfs of Russia, they would have a happy and contented people, who, instead of requiring silver for everything they sent here, would be able to take our manufactures, and become, what their poverty now prevented them being, valuable customers of this country.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient that Parliament shall direct its immediate attention to the best mode of removing the obstacles which impede the application of British capital and skill to the improvement of the productive powers of India."

MR. MANGLES said, the subject which the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. J. B. Smith) had brought under the consideration of the House was one of great importance, and, he believed, one very little understood. He should, indeed, have to crave the indulgence of the House, if he could feel it right to bandy the very hard language in which the hon. Member had thought it fitting on this occasion to express himself. The hon. Member had denounced the misgovernment of India by the present generation, on grounds which related to transactions which occurred when he (Mr. Mangles) was in his cradle, and for which the present Court of Directors of the East India Company could not be in the slightest degree responsible. Again, the hon. Member talked of India as if it was a unit, and spoke of Madras as if it represented the normal condition of the whole country, and without reflecting by how many hundred miles the two Presidencies were divided, seemed struck with wonder, that a person who had been a Bengal civilian should not know of abuses which existed in Madras. Well, if he (Mr. Mangles) was thus ignorant, he was so in good company. Lord Ellenborough, a man of the greatest ability, who had been for years at the head of the Board of Control, and who had been Governor General, had likewise declared that he knew nothing of the matter. The hon. Member, like other gentlemen from the northern part of the island, seemed to think that they were the men, and that wisdom would die with them. They seemed to believe that none but a Lancashire man could manage any concern, public or private; and they sought to put the Government of India into this dilemma,—either it was guilty of the most atrocious wickedness, or of the most culpable ignorance. The hon. Gentleman talked about improving the productive powers of India. Well, Dr. Johnson had said, that some persons would call out fire during the deluge, and was not the hon. Gentleman aware that India was at that moment sending more to this country than this country could pay for? The sum remitted to England, in the shape of dividends, fortunes acquired, and the like, was at least £5,000,000 a year, for which we send nothing back except a few military stores. So again, the enormous quantity of silver bullion sent out showed the great amount of produce which was sent home. The House would be surprised to hear that in 1855–6 no less than £11,300,000 in silver bullion was sent to India from this country, and that in 1856–7, up to the 3rd of April last, silver bullion to the amount of £10,000,000 was sent out by the Peninsular and Oriental Company's steamers, while within a fraction of £1,000,000 more had been sent from Marseilles, Malta, and Gibraltar. The House was aware that when the war with Russia broke out, our supplies of oilseeds and hemp from that country were stopped, but the deficiency was completely made up from India. The same thing would happen in regard to cotton, if the proper steps were followed. India could supply all the cotton that this country would require, if manufacturers and those who wanted it would cease calling upon Hercules, and set about putting their own shoulders to the wheel, in the same way as those who wanted other commodities from India had done. The hon. Gentleman who seconded the Motion appeared to demand that the Indian Government should undertake to clean his cotton for him, which, he said, came to him mixed up with dirt and gravel, while in the same breath he informed the House that Mr. Landon's cotton was always perfectly clean.

MR. TURNER explained, that he believed both his cotton and Mr. Landon's were originally perfectly clean ; but while the latter had only to travel a short distance, his own cotton had to pass over the miserable roads of India, and to undergo the treatment to which Indian dealers always subjected such things.

MR. MANGLES said, that those who were anxious to have cotton from India should adopt the reasonable course which Mr. Landon had followed. If they would take the trouble to send out their agents to India, there was hardly any amount of cotton which the manufacturers of this country could not procure from that source. He would just call the attention of the House to the extraordinary increase which had taken place in the production of some articles for which there was a demand. From the provinces of Arracan and Pegu, the elder of which had only been in our possession about thirty years, and the younger had only been occupied the other day, he found that in 1855-6 there were exported no less than 250,000 tons of rice. Why could not the export of cotton be increased in the same ratio? There was no difficulty in procuring sugar, oilseeds, or jute. Then there was the cuckoo cry, that the people of India were so wretchedly poor, that they could not buy our manufactures; but how could that statement be reconciled with the fact, that the balance of trade was, of late years, always against us, and that we were always under the necessity of exporting silver to pay it? The reason for the latter circumstance was, that the manufacturers did not sufficiently study the tastes of the natives. If they were to send out their agents to India to study the taste of the people and cater accordingly, they would find a more extensive market. The question of the evening, however, was, how it happened that cotton was the only article which could not be got in sufficient quantities from India. The hon. Member for Stockport had stated the land tenure as a great impediment to the extension of cotton cultivation; but why did that apply to cotton only, and not prevent the production of indigo? [Mr. J. B. SMITH: Because indigo is grown where the land is held on the more permanent tenure.] The hon. Gentleman had fallen into the trap, and said, that the growth of indigo in Bengal was so large, because of the more permanent tenure of land in that presidency; but the fact was, that a larger increase in the growth of indigo had taken place in Madras, where the ryotwaree system of land revenue prevails, than in Bengal. He (Mr. Mangles) had a letter from an extensive grower in Madras, in which he stated, that since his first establishment in India, the production of indigo in that Presidency had increased from 5,000 to 20,000 chests, weighing 250lb. each. That gentleman exported about 350 chests of indigo and 5,000 tons of sugar yearly, but he did not cultivate the land himself, finding it more profitable to buy of the distressed and degraded ryots, as they were called. The tenure of land which had been so much talked of, was by no means so simple a question as some hon. Gentlemen imagined it to be. High authorities had held, and among them the late Mr. James Mill, and his still more eminent son, Mr. J. S. Mill, that the land assessment was not a tax at all. The hon. Gentleman who moved the Resolution said, that the Indian Government claimed to be the owners of all the land in that country; but such was not the case. The truth was that a great proportion of the rent of land in India had ever been set apart for Government uses, and to give up the assessment in favour of the occupiers of land would render it necessary to inflict taxation upon the shopkeepers and artisans. The hon. Gentleman had attacked the land survey which it was intended to introduce into Madras; but Mr. Mackay, the commissioner of the Manchester manufacturers, spoke highly of the effects of the same survey in the districts of Bombay, saying that it had conferred great benefits upon the ryots. It was the same kind of survey which it was proposed to introduce into Madras, and he had no doubt that it would prove equally advantageous to the people there. And here he would say, that while he was regardless of the hon. Gentleman's strictures on himself, his blood boiled at hearing the attacks made on public servants in India, whose devotion to the discharge of their onerous duties was not exceeded by that of any servant of the Crown at home or in the Colonies. These men were earnestly labouring for the benefit alike of the Government and people of India, while their conduct was made the subject of unjust criticism by English gentlemen sitting at ease at home. Before the Cotton Committee he (Mr. Mangles) made a clean breast of it. Even Mr. John Bright praised his conduct. He admitted in his evidence before that Committee that in times gone by the Government had not done its duty, but a new era had arrived. The neglect of former years was not now chargeable against the Government of India. The House was aware of the fact that the Government had pledged itself to pay interest varying from  $4\frac{1}{2}$  to 5 per cent upon a capital of £30,000,000 for the construction of railroads in India, and had ordered the making of roads from all sides of the country to the several stations, for the purpose of bringing the produce of the country to the railways. To the hon. Member for Stockport, who spoke of the Ganges canal, nearly 900 miles in length, as a local work, 3,400 miles of railroad would appear but a trifling affair; but such, he thought, would not be the opinion of the House. It was said, however, that the railways were being made for political or military, not for commercial, purposes. Now, he held in his hand a map of India showing the districts in which cotton was grown, and any hon. Gentleman who chose might see that the railways now in course of construction under the guarantee of the Government passed through every one of those districts with a single exception. And that exception was a peninsula—almost an island,—well supplied with seaports. At the rates which now existed upon the Madras Railway one pound of cotton might be conveyed from Nagpore to Madras, a distance of 450 miles, for about three-fifths of a farthing—a fact which, he thought, would satisfy the economical mind of the hon. Member for Stockport. He now came to works of irrigation. The statement of the hon. Member upon that head was, first, that the native works had been abandoned; and, secondly, that the Government had contented itself with making the Ganges canal. But the fact was not so, for besides the Ganges canal, 810 miles in length, and which of itself alone was a more important and larger undertaking than any other similar work to be found in the world, the Government had constructed the Jumna canal, which watered a very extensive tract of country, and many other canals in the North-western Provinces and the Punjab. Lieutenant Colonel Baird Smith, who was sent down from Madras to report on the works of irrigation in that Presidency, said the projects either actually effected, or in progress of execution, affected territories containing in the aggregate 20,000 square miles and 4,000,000 inhabitants. Could it in fairness be said that the native works at all approached these undertakings? And he must say, that after such results it was too bad for the East India Company to be told that they were so stupid as not to know how to manage their own business, until taught by hon. Gentlemen from

Stockport and Manchester. The first cause why they did not get cotton from India was the lowness of price. As long as there were good harvests in America there was no demand upon India, and the manufacturers of this country were satisfied with the few thousand bales which were imported annually from the latter country. But when there occurred a bad harvest in America, and the price of cotton was high, the manufacturers most unreasonably turned round and asked where was the cotton of India? How should the people of India have grown cotton in anticipation of a demand which might take place once in five or ten years? At the same time there were an enormous production and an enormous consumption of cotton in India. But the cotton was grown mainly for home manufacture. It was true that to a certain extent the spinning jennies of Lancashire had put down the manufacture of cotton fabrics in India. But no machinery could ever put down the domestic manufacture, which cost nothing, because the manufacture was carried on at leisure times by the ryot himself and by his wife and children. The contrast between what was done in America and what was done in India was fallacious, if no allowance were made for the energy of the Anglo-Saxon and the apathy of the Indian character. If the natives of India had been a vigorous and energetic race we should never have been masters of the country; and as long as they were what they were they would not study the price currents of Liverpool nor the exports of America. He admitted that the roads had something to do with the price, but when railways were carried down to the wharves, there would be no case at all against the Indian Government. There was also the question of energy and the question of honesty. The Indian people had not energy and they had not honesty, and the men of Manchester should supply those qualities. Indigo was an indigenous production, and from the increase in the production of that article might be seen the effect of a continuous demand without any artificial stimulus. In 1785, England only imported 2,000,000 lbs., and India supplied only 500,000 lbs. European energy and industry were applied to the manufacture of the article, and India had now almost a monopoly of the trade, applying no less than 20,000,000 lbs. annually. The hon. Gentleman had referred to the success of Mr. Landon, but the hon. Gentleman was so simple as not to see that what Mr. Landon had done any Englishman of equal energy and perseverance might have effected also. By Mr. Mackay's evidence it appeared that the frauds in picking and packing cotton in India were of themselves sufficient to account for our not receiving a larger quantity. Let the gentlemen of Manchester send trustworthy agents to settle in the heart of the cotton districts, with money to advance to the ryots, and machinery for preparing cotton for the market so that it might not have to be unpacked; they would then have no difficulty in getting any amount of cotton from India which they might require. But so long as they remained at Manchester praying to Hercules to help them out of the ruts, alternately abusing and advising the East India Company, and asking them to clean their cotton for them, they would be spending their energy in the wrong direction. The East India Company were doing all that men could do to develop the resources of India. They were pressing on the railways with vigour, and the main impediment to their being finished was the impossibility of finding the means of conveying rails and locomotives fast enough, for each ship would of course only take a limited quantity of such metal dead-weight. The cultivation of cotton in India was, no doubt, a national object, but do not let the gentlemen of Manchester ask the East India Company to do for them what they ought to do for themselves, or to interfere, as no Government ought to do, between the growers and exporters of cotton. That day was the hundredth anniversary of the battle of Plassey, by which Clive laid the foundation of our ascendancy in India. In estimating the results of the East India Company's government during the last hundred years he trusted the House would take into account the great impediments which the Government of such a country had had to encounter, peopled as it was by nations who had been slaves for centuries, debased by dark superstitions, and the slaves of caste, that worst description of slavery. The East India Company were obliged to keep up an enormous military establishment, and a large portion of their revenue necessarily went in giving high salaries for efficient European agents. He entreated hon. Members opposite (Mr. Mangles spoke from the front Opposition bench) not to believe that those who voted with them on all other Liberal questions were, as soon as they had anything to do with the Government of India, transformed not only into tyrants, but into the most foolish and stupid of tyrants, as some hon. Friends of his would try to lead the House to believe.

LORD STANLEY said, that the hon. Member who had just sat down, had concluded his address by saying that this was the hundredth anniversary of the battle of Plassey, but he (Lord Stanley) confessed he did not exactly see how it followed as a logical consequence that because one hundred years ago a great victory was won in India by one member of the Indian Civil Service it was the duty of another member of that service to set himself to oppose the development of the internal resources of India. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Mangles) had taunted the gentlemen of Manchester with asking the Government of India to help them out of a difficulty which they ought to remove themselves. But the Government of India being the landlords and receiving the rent of the soil under the name of land-tax, were bound to take upon themselves those works of improvement which in other countries were executed by individual landlords. What was asked of the Company was not to give an artificial stimulus to the culture of cotton by any means whatever, but to remove impediments which now stood in the way of that culture in the shape of bad roads or want of roads. Did the hon. Gentleman mean that it was the duty of Manchester to make roads in India? The hon. Gentleman had employed an argument, which he (Lord Stanley) had heard frequently elsewhere, and had told the House that the real drawback to an increased cultivation of cotton in India was the absence of a sufficiently continuous demand. But why did not the hon. Member state the reason for the absence of this demand? It was this. India was available as a cotton-market in time of extreme scarcity, because in those times, and then alone, the high price enabled the Indian cultivator to overcome the artificial obstacles in his way. But the Indian Government had no right to take advantage of its own wrong. There would be a continuous demand for Indian cotton if it were grown in districts so open to the seaboard that there was a possibility of carrying the cotton at a sufficiently low rate to enable it to compete with American cotton in the ordinary state of the market. The hon. Member had said that there was a great deal more cotton grown in India than was sent to this country, and that the natives preferred to manufacture it for their own use. A great deal of cotton might be worked up for consumption on the spot, but it did not follow that it was more economical to do so. No doubt, the cost of freight was an important element, but the cost of sending the raw material half over the globe might be more than balanced by the greater economy of English manufacture. A hundred instances could be found in the history of commerce where this course of dealing was pursued to the advantage of both parties engaged in it. It used to be matter of ridicule against California, as it was now against the South American States, that they sent their raw hides to the United States, there to be manufactured and re-imported into those countries as shoes. That may have shown a want of enterprise on the part of South America; but it did not follow that that double voyage was not more economical for all parties. The hon. Member (Mr. Mangles) used another argument which also seemed to make against his case—he asked the House to look at the development of the culture of indigo in Bengal as a proof that the East India Company's government had not hindered commercial enterprise in India. But what if it were shown that the success of one kind of culture and the failure of another, were due to their being differently circumstanced in the very respect complained of? The difference between the two was this—that the cotton-growing districts, though perhaps not situated further in the interior than the indigo plantations, were yet far less accessible from the want of internal communication: while, from the infinitely greater value of indigo in proportion to its bulk, the cost of conveyance even by the slowest means over the worst roads, formed a far less deduction from the profits of the grower. With regard to works of irrigation, the hon. Gentleman appeared to think great injustice had been done to the Indian Government by the assertion that it had not equalled the enterprise of various Native rulers. Without depreciating the value of the Ganges canal, and other works of a similar character though of less extent, which had been undertaken by the Government of India, looking at the condition of the native States when they passed into our hands, examining the works that existed there, estimating, also, the proportion those works bore to the resources and population of those States, and contrasting all this with the power which our Government now had, with the present population, and with the superior industrial appliances at their command, he was much mistaken if, on such a comparison, made in a dispassionate spirit, it were not found that many dynasties, which are justly termed barbarous, had, in ages long gone by, provided far better than we now did for the material wants of their subjects. He would mention a single example of this which came under his own observation. Mysore passed under British dominion within the memory of the present generation. It comprised an area of 36,000 square miles, and he could state from official information obtained by him on the spot, that it contained no fewer than 27,000 tanks, many of which were of large extent; the general result being that not less than one-twentieth of the entire surface of the province was under water for the purposes of irrigation. In no part of India had a provision to anything like that extent been made by our Government. The instance he had quoted came actually under his own eyes: but he might mention another, drawn not from an historical but a pre-historical period. The greater part of the northern districts of Ceylon were at present inhabited by a scanty population, and many tracts of country lay entirely waste. Sir E. Tennent, who formerly held an official position in that island, and had travelled through it, stated, in a book which he had published, that he saw the remains of various tanks or artificial lakes, about thirty of which were of large size; and that one which he examined, and which was not the largest, must have measured, when in a perfect state, something like ten miles in one direction, and twelve in another. Of course individual instances proved nothing; and without a detailed comparison, which it was certainly difficult now to institute with accuracy, it was impossible to say how the case stood between native Governments and our own; he thought, however, he had stated enough to throw doubt on the justice of our claims to superiority in this respect. With respect to railroads, the hon. Gentleman admitted the truth of a great deal that had been charged against the Government of India. He did not pretend that this species of communication had been opened to anything like the extent that was desired, but he assured them that it would be so some day or other. He told them to look at the map and they would see the railways that had been—made? No, but planned and laid down on paper. Why it was an easy thing to draw a red line on a map and take credit for that as for a work of improvement in progress. But the question was, would these lines be executed, and, if so, when? Time was an element in matters of this kind which they were too apt to neglect. In making railroads in India they followed too much the English practice. Not that the works were not admirable in construction and perfect in execution, if high speed were the chief object, but their scale and expense were such that the resources of the Indian Government would not suffice to complete them within any moderate period. It was the opinion of many eminent practical men that the precedent of the English railways did not apply to a country situated like India. In England, before a single mile of railway was laid down, we had a most complete system of canal communication, which practically sufficed for the carriage of heavy goods. The railroads came in to supplement the canals, not to supersede them. In India, on the other hand, the state of things was rather that which existed a few years ago in the United States, where the railway did not supersede the canal, but was the first and only communication introduced. It was, therefore, clearly the policy of those who planned the lines in the United States to execute them at the lowest possible cost, to treat with comparative indifference the question of speed, and to press forward the completion of the works with the utmost despatch, even though they should be finished in a comparatively rough and clumsy manner. Thus they would be opened for slow and heavy traffic at the earliest practicable period. The principle which was found adapted to the case of the United States was far more suitable to India, because the interest of money was greater in the latter instance than in the former, and the outlay upon unfinished works therefore constituted a heavier burden upon the projectors. The hon. Gentleman had placed the House in a dilemma by requiring them to affirm that the Government of India was either very dishonest or very foolish. Now, he (Lord Stanley) was not prepared to endorse either of these charges. He did not accuse the Indian Government of being interested in opposing the opening of railway communication in that country; but, owing to their peculiar position, they required a good deal of propulsion from without to make them carry on their works with due zeal and energy. The question was not so much what order should be sent out by the President of the Board of Control, or by that body which the hon. Gentleman represented, as what was the feeling of the local authorities on this subject. The Indian official in charge of a district—than whom there could scarcely be a more hard-working person—was entrusted with a sufficient amount of duty to fill up any one man's whole time. A vast area was confided to his sole care, and the climate after long residence was unfavourable to continued energy on the part of Europeans. He was expected to report frequently, and sometimes in unnecessary detail, to the authorities at Calcutta, which occupied much of his time, and, above all, his connection with the country which he governed was official and official only. An officer so situated might not fail in discharging his functions, but it was clear he had no strong motive urging him to go beyond the strict line of his duty. He had spoken of official persons and it must be remembered that the Indian public was almost exclusively official; it consisted of military men, whose feelings, perhaps, lay in a different direction from the promotion of industrial improvements, and of civilians who had no strong personal incentive to take up subjects of this nature. He omitted the native population when speaking of the Indian public, because their voice scarcely ever reached this country or influenced the policy of the Government. The result of that absence of an influential public opinion, independent of the governing class, was seen in the constant and notorious tendency in the Indian Government to quarrel with its neighbours, which quarrels invariably exhausted funds that might otherwise have been devoted to the improvement of the country. Nothing could keep an Indian Governor General quiet except a deficit, and even that would not always do it. The public in India consisted of civilians and the military. The civilians foresaw an extension of patronage in every new annexation, and both they and the military were flattered by prospects of the extension of the power of this country. Even the missionary interest, he believed, was not hostile to what might enable it to propagate, under British protection, its opinions in a new district. And so it happened that whenever there was any prospect of a dispute it was almost certain that all parties would be in favour of a warlike policy.

He did not say that from theory only. He was in India at the time that the second Burmese war broke out. He was not about to criticise the policy of that war, but this he would say, that before it was competent for any man to have formed an unbiassed opinion upon the dispute between the Indian and the Burmese Governments, before any certain or authentic information had been or could be received, there was throughout the country a cry taken up by every class of Europeans, without arguing, without hesitation, and without reflection, in favour of going to war. He mentioned that fact because the same causes still existed, and were likely to exist for a long period, why we need not hope that the surplus revenue of India would be applied to the development of its resources. If we were to wait until India applied her revenue to works of internal improvement we might have to wait for a long time. These works should be undertaken without regard to the question of surplus or deficit, for looking at the question in a merely financial point of view the cost to India of delay will be much greater than if they were carried out at once. He would go into no further details. He had risen simply to meet the defence of the hon. Member for Guildford by a reference to the real facts of the case. At this moment we had a demand for cotton which exceeded the supply. During the last ten or twelve years our productive powers with respect to the cotton manufacture had increased 40 per cent, and there was no reason to suppose that either those powers or the demands of foreign countries for our produce would diminish; on the contrary, they were likely to increase. Although the cost of cotton was now double what it was a few years ago, the cotton manufacture in this country had increased to an unprecedented extent, and the difference in price had caused a loss to the community of £16,000,000 or £17,000,000 a year. No fact could be stated more significant than that, and it could therefore hardly be disputed that the Indian Government, which was, in fact, the landlord of the soil of India, ought to exert itself to the utmost to promote the growth of cotton in India, in order that the constantly augmenting demands for our cotton manufactures might be amply supplied.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR said, that it was impossible to exaggerate the importance of the question, and that if the Indian Government had been guilty of any defects in developing the resources of India the House would have been entitled to interfere; but the speeches that he had heard that evening scarcely touched that point. It was some years since he had the honour of co-operating with his hon. Friend the Member for Stockport on Indian topics, but he begged to remind his hon. Friend that his remarks that evening applied rather to a state of things which existed several years ago than to the present state of India. His hon. Friend had quoted from documents which related to the period anterior to the commencement of what he might call that great era in Indian history which dated from the grant of the charter of 1853. His right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Control had endeavoured this Session, by laying on the table various despatches which had been sent to India during the last few years, to show the House what had been recently done in that country with respect to public works. He (Mr. D. Seymour) did not mean to say that the British Government had till lately executed public works in India at all equal to those which former Governments had executed with much smaller means; but when the British Government became aware of the facts they resolved to make amends. His right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty introduced, while President of the Board of Control, a new system with regard to public works in India, by which many of the suggestions of Mr. Bright were carried into effect. In each of the Presidencies a Commissioner of Public Works had been appointed, and each year those Commissioners sent to the Government of India a list of such works of irrigation, &c., as they thought necessary. The amount expended during the last two years on public works was nearly £3,000,000, being about one-eighth of the whole revenue of the country, and he ventured to say that that was as much as any Government in any country had ever done. The noble Lord who had just sat down had discussed the question whether railroads in India should be of a solid, permanent character, like those constructed in England, or temporary, like those in America, which were constantly requiring large outlays for repairs, and which, without such outlays, soon became only fit for tram-roads. But putting that aside, the Indian Government had resolved that the wisest plan was to make solid, although expensive railroads, such as those in England, which would last one hundred years, as they believed that in the end that would prove to be the truest economy. That was the plan that had been adopted in Austria, Russia, and, in short, every European country that had sufficient capital. He also had to remind hon. Members that railways in India were made by means of foreign, not Indian capital. As to the question before the House, he had to remind them that the cotton trade had sprung up within the last seventy years, and great pains were at first required in order to grow cotton in America. It was not an indigenous plant there, and some time elapsed before those varieties could be discovered which were best adapted to the American climate. There was a Report of M. de Maurepas in the French archives as to the advantages of growing cotton in Louisiana, and when at that period, not more than seventy years ago, eight bales were entered at the custom as the produce of that country, it was rejected as being more than America could produce. The present immense growth of cotton in America was the result of that same diligence and labour which had raised up the cotton manufacture in this country, and the same means adopted in India would produce the same result. There was no difficulty in growing cotton in India. The soil was suitable and the people were industrious; the chief obstacle lay in their poverty. When capital was forthcoming, and as the intelligence and education of the people increased, they would be able to manure their land more, to raise better sorts of cotton, and would come forward to improve the communications, which at present impeded the carriage of cotton to the coast. Upon what ground was the House called upon to exercise Parliamentary interference? Not one word had been uttered during the discussion which showed the necessity of such interference. On the contrary, every thing that had been said referred to a previous period, while what was doing now appeared to be ignored. The only suggestions offered referred to the sale of the land in fee simple and to the making of roads. Upon roads, however, the Indian Government were laying out £3,000,000, besides the expenditure upon railways; and he did not see how they would be justified in laying out a larger sum. With regard to the tenure of the land, that was a most difficult question. There were persons who considered with Mr. Mill that the state was entitled to the increased produce of the land, and Mr. Mill would consistently apply the same principle to England. On the other hand, the principle of selling the fee simple outright existed in some of the most advanced and prosperous countries of the world. He was not, however, at that hour of the night going to enter into the question of the land tenure of India. He had heard of the formation of cotton companies, but no gentleman had come forward and said, "We will endeavour to grow cotton in India if you will let us try the experiment upon a tract of country." The Government, he was persuaded, would not be indisposed to aid the experiment by allowing British planters to be located in India, and they would be only too happy if such an experiment succeeded. Good roads, capital, with European superintendence, were the requisites needed, and if these were forthcoming there need be no fear respecting the growth of cotton in India. Meanwhile, if the only suggestions which could be offered were those he had noticed, he thought, as the Government had done all they could do, it was very hard that this House should condemn them without making out any good case for so doing. He should, therefore, conclude by moving the previous question.

Whereupon Previous Question proposed, "That that Question be now put."

SIR ERSKINE PERRY moved the adjournment of the debate.

MR. VERNON SMITH said, that, considering the importance of the subject, the Government would not oppose the Motion for adjournment.

Debate adjourned till Tuesday next.

INSPECTORS OF TAXES (SCOTLAND).

MOTION.

MR. BLACK said, that, in accordance with the notice which stood upon the paper in his name, he rose to move the following Resolution:—

"That it is the opinion of this House that the Salaries of the Scotch Inspectors and Surveyors of Taxes are inadequate for the duties they have to discharge, and as these duties are not less onerous than those performed by the same officers in England, that the remuneration for their services should be placed on the same scale as those of England and Ireland."

He wished to point out to the House the difference which existed in individual cases between the salaries paid to surveyors in Scotland, as compared with those which persons occupying similar situations received in England, as he could see no good reason why officers acting under the same Board, administering the same law, and with precisely the same responsibility, should, in the case of Scotland, be remunerated for their services upon a scale so much lower than that which prevailed in this country.

MR. WILSON said, it was not a convenient course to discuss in that House the question of the salaries of these officers. He felt assured that if the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, who had carefully considered the relative duties to be performed by the various revenue officers throughout the United Kingdom, had been of opinion that the salaries which the Scotch surveyors received were disproportionate to the duties which they had to perform, they would have long since brought the subject under the notice of the Treasury. Be that as it might, however, he ventured to express a hope that that House would not be induced, without some strong cause shown, to undertake those functions which obviously belonged to the heads of the various departments employed in the collection of the public revenue; for if it were once to interfere in the regulation of the salaries and promotion of the revenue officers, there would be no end to the pressure which would be brought to bear upon hon. Members from all quarters. The proper course for the Scotch surveyors to pursue, if they felt they were labouring under a grievance, would be to address the Treasury through the heads of their respective departments, or to lay their case before the Commissioners themselves, who, if they thought proper, might make a recommendation upon the subject to the Treasury.

MR. KINNAIRD said, that the answer of the hon. Gentleman was not satisfactory. The duties discharged by the Scotch surveyors of taxes were most admirably performed, and it became, therefore, a question well worthy of consideration, whether, by reducing the salaries of the English surveyors to the same scale, a large saving in the public expenditure might not, without any decrease of efficiency, be effected.

MR. CRAUFURD said, he should support the Motion, in the hope that the subject to which it referred would receive the attention of the Commissioners.

Mr. Black

COLONEL SYKES said, that the principle laid down by the Secretary of the Treasury, if carried to its full extent, would deter public servants from addressing the House upon any grievances of which they had to complain; but the hon. Gentleman was quite right in stating that they should appeal to the Commissioners in the first instance. Under the circumstances, he advised his hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh to withdraw his Motion.

MR. BLACK said, that perhaps hon. Gentlemen did not sufficiently understand the position of these Gentlemen. They were unwilling to complain to the Commissioners, as the consequence would be that they would be dismissed the service and reduced to destitution.

Motion negatived.

EVIDENCE UPON OATH (HOUSE OF COMMONS)—BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. WARREN said, he rose to move for leave to bring in a Bill to empower the House of Commons and its Committees to take evidence upon oath. He did not anticipate that the Motion would meet with any opposition. The power with which the Bill would invest the House was already enjoyed by the Lords, and it was naturally a subject of surprise that it had not yet been extended to the Commons. Moreover, the necessity for the Bill was abundantly evident from the difference in the manner of giving evidence before Committees of the House of Lords and the House of Commons.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that it was not the intention of the Government to offer any opposition to the Motion, but he remarked that it was a subject of some importance, and not rashly to be decided on.

MR. PEASE said, he must object to the introduction of the Bill, the policy of which he considered more than doubtful.

MR. HADFIELD said, that the cause of truth would be best advanced by abstaining from requiring evidence to be taken on oath.

Leave given.

Bill ordered to be brought in by MR. WARREN, the Marquess of BLANDFORD, and MR. EDWARD EGERTON.

Bill read 1<sup>o</sup>.

HIGHWAYS BILL.

BILL WITHDRAWN.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. MASSEY said, he rose to move that this Bill be discharged. It was, however, his intention to bring it into Parliament early next Session.

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE observed, that he regretted very much that the Bill had not first been allowed to go to a second reading and be reprinted, because legislation on the subject was most urgent. At the same time he considered it would be almost impossible that a Bill of this kind could pass unless the law on the question was consolidated. He hoped that next Session the hon. Gentleman would bring in a Bill to repeal the whole of the existing laws.

Order discharged; Bill withdrawn.

House adjourned at half-after One o'clock.

JUDGMENTS EXECUTION BILL.

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

Clause Seven:—Amendment again proposed, to add at the end of the clause the words “and may set aside, satisfy, or otherwise deal with it accordingly.”

Question again proposed, “That those words be there added.”

COLONEL FRENCH said, he would appeal to the hon. and learned Member for Ayr (Mr. Craufurd) to postpone the Committee until after the other orders of the day. A large number of Irish Members who took an interest in this Bill were at present at Cambridge House upon a deputation to Lord Palmerston on the subject of tenant right, and it would scarcely be fair to proceed with the Bill in their absence. He moved that the Chairman report progress and ask leave to sit again.

MR. CRAUFURD regretted he could not accede to the request of his hon. Friend, since the passing of the Bill might thereby be endangered.

MR. AYRTON said, there was no Member on the Treasury bench to throw light on the important question which this Bill raised. This, he thought, was an additional reason for postponement.

Motion made, and Question put, “That the Chairman do report progress and ask leave to sit again.”

The Committee divided:—Ayes 31; Noes 93: Majority 62.

Question again proposed.

MR. STAFFORD said, he must express his regret that none of the law officers of the Crown were in their places. In their absence he thought the Government could hardly wish to proceed with a Bill of this importance.

MR. MASSEY (who at this moment was the only occupant of the Ministerial benches) observed, that the principle and the details of the measure had been over and over again considered by this House, and if at this time hon. Members were so little acquainted with those details as to require the attendance of the law officers of the Crown, in order to explain them, he should despair of making much progress. He trusted, therefore, that the Committee would proceed with the Bill.

MR. NAPIER said, he wanted to know if the Government had adopted the Bill as it stood, because in this case he should be prepared to show that it would prove wholly unworkable in Ireland. In the absence of the law officers of the Crown, however, he thought the Committee were but wasting time by entering into a discussion of the details. As to himself, he had no desire to obstruct the progress of the Bill, but he wished to put it into a form in which it would work.

MR. DEASY said, that he also quite concurred in the principle of the measure, and was only anxious to render the Bill as perfect as possible. He, therefore, regretted that none of the law officers of the Crown were present to assist the Committee.

MR. MASSEY said, the Attorney Generals for England and Ireland had sat on the Committee to which the Bill had been referred, and the latter hon. and learned Gentleman had been present at the discussion on the first clause.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, it had already been announced, upon high authority, that this Bill would throw the law of Ireland into great confusion. He found also that there were notices of no less than forty Amendments on the paper. Were the Committee to reject or adopt them, without being informed by the proper authority of their probable effect? It was preposterous, therefore, that they should proceed in the absence of the law officers of the Crown. He hoped that the Bill would be postponed until the Attorney General for Ireland at least was in his place.

MR. M'MAHON said, he also would urge that the further consideration of the Bill be postponed. He also wished to remark, that when the Bill was under consideration last Session, the Attorney General for Ireland proposed an Amendment, which was carried. The promoter of the Bill then said he should withdraw it, to enable him to consider the effect of the Amendment. On the first night of the Session the hon. Gentleman re-introduced the measure, announcing that he had adopted the Amendment of the Attorney General; and yet, when they came to examine the Bill, they found that the Amendment only applied to Ireland, and not to Scotland. The Amendment was to the effect, that a copy of the judgment sought to be put in force, and not an extract therefrom, should be placed before the Court.

An Hon. MEMBER wished to ask the legal meaning of the word "extract."

THE LORD ADVOCATE explained that the word "extract" meant, in the legal phraseology of Scotland, a copy, the extraction implied by the term being an extraction from the office, and not from the document.

MR. AYRTON said, that the effect of the Bill as it now stood would be, that a party could bring a writ of error in one country to reverse proceedings taken in another.

MR. BLAND said, the question just raised by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) was most important. He (Mr. Bland) was certainly surprised to hear that the word "extract" meant a whole copy. He thought that they should not proceed with this Bill till the phraseology of the Scotch courts was made somewhat more similar than it now was to that of England and Ireland. Certainly, he could not consent to its being proceeded with in the absence of the Attorney General for Ireland.

COLONEL FRENCH said, they had already wasted an hour and a half in the attempt of the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Craufurd) to force this Bill down their throats. He assured the hon. and learned Member, however, that the attempt would not be successful, whether he was backed by the influence of the Government or not.

Mr. Seymour FitzGerald

MR. M'MAHON cited some old Acts of Parliament to prove that "extract" did not mean "a copy."

MR. PACKE said, he thought it was very like an act of tyranny for the English and Scotch Members to attempt to force down the throats of the Irish Members a Bill to which they were unanimous in opposition. The absence of the Attorney General for Ireland made it still more unfair to press this Bill against the will of the Irish Members. Under these circumstances, he begged to move that the Chairman do leave the Chair.

MR. STEUART said, he considered the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Napier) to place judgments under this Bill on the same footing as protested Bills, was a most valuable one. If the hon. Member for Ayr (Mr. Craufurd) would not agree to consider it, he should support the Motion of the hon. Member for Leicestershire (Mr. Packe).

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair."

The Committee divided: — Ayes 73; Noes 103: Majority 30.

Question again proposed.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he thought that the hon. Member for Ayr was not justified in any longer attempting to force his measure through the House when the division that had just taken place showed, notwithstanding all the assistance given to the hon. Member by the Government, so slight a difference between the numbers on each side. He therefore moved that the Chairman should report progress.

MR. GRIFFITH begged to say that the defeat of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Leicestershire was not entirely owing to the opposition of Her Majesty's Government and their supporters. Many independent Members on his (Mr. Griffith's) side of the House had voted against the Amendment.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, that the Irish Members were agreed as to the principle of the Bill, but that the differences were principally with respect to matters of detail. He suggested that if the Amendment proposed by the hon. and learned Member for Cork (Mr. Deasy) was adopted it would remove many objections. Some Irish Members opposed the Bill because they considered it a step towards amalgamating the judicature of the two countries. In his opinion, such an amalgamation would be most unwise, and if he believed the Bill to have the slightest tendency that way he would oppose it. He, therefore, hoped that the hon. and gallant Gentleman would not press his Motion.

MR. M'MAHON said, he was willing to withdraw all opposition to the Bill, if the clauses placing Scotch decreets on the same footing with judgments of the English and Irish Courts were struck out. He had not the slightest objection, but the contrary, to assimilate in all respects the proceedings of the English and Irish Courts of Law; but it was quite another matter to assimilate the Scotch proceedings, which were so dissimilar—in fact, in many respects so opposed to those of England and Ireland.

MR. AYRTON thought, that after the statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman, some course might be pursued of a more satisfactory character than that of reporting progress. He would suggest that the objectionable clauses of the Bill be allowed to go through Committee pro formâ with a view to their being printed with the Amendments, and that the Amendments be discussed on the next stage of the measure.

MR. P. O'BRIEN said, the learned Solicitor General was much mistaken in supposing that almost the whole of the Irish Members were in favour of the principles of the Bill. The only Irish Member in the last Parliament who supported the Bill lost his seat in consequence of that support.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL admitted that it would be an advantage if the practice of edictal citation were expunged from the Scotch law, as it was unknown to that of England. But as the clause in the Bill for enforcing Scotch decreets in Ireland was to be guarded against being applied in such cases, he did not think it necessary that the Bill should be re-committed.

SIR ERSKINE PERRY said, that seeing the determined opposition offered to the Bill, he recommended the hon. Member for Ayr to press it no further, to rest satisfied with having obtained the assent of the House to its general principle, and to throw on the Government the responsibility of bringing it forward as a Government measure. It was utterly impossible for any mere private Member to carry a Bill, however good, through the House if a large proportion of hon. Members were opposed to it. His judicial experience in India satisfied him that the principle of the Bill was sound. He hoped that the Chairman might be allowed to report progress, in order that no more time might be wasted in fruitless discussion.

MR. M'MAHON said, that the opposition to the Bill was directed against its principles quite as much as its details. He also denied that his constituents were at all interested in the opposition to the Bill. It was true that Wexford had a large trade with Glasgow, but he believed that the balance was in favour of Wexford. He opposed the Bill simply on the ground that it was a violation of the fundamental principles of English law. If the Government were anxious for any real reform why did they not attempt to improve the Scotch law.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Chairman do report progress and ask leave to sit again."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 50; Noes 141: Majority 91.

Question again proposed,

MR. BLAND said, that as a question might arise as to which Court should have jurisdiction in the matter of these judgments, he thought it would be better to express clearly that the Court in which the judgment was to be registered, and out of which execution was intended to be issued, should have the jurisdiction over the question, not only in points which might arise subsequent to the execution, but also as to the question whether the judgment had been obtained by fraud or not. The hon. Member then proposed an Amendment to that effect.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he did not think the Amendment necessary, but he would not object to it.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 8.

COLONEL FRENCH hoped that the Committee, now that it had devoted nearly three hours to Scotch law without any prospect of arriving at a useful result, would proceed to the other business on the paper. He moved that the Chairman report progress.

MR. AYRTON said, he wished to repeat his former suggestion that the clauses should now be gone through, pro formâ, in order that further discussion should be postponed till the bringing up of the report.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that he approved the solution indicated by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets, and would promise that if the Bill were passed through Committee pro formâ, he and his learned Friends connected with the Government would, in the interval previous to the bringing up of the Report, confer with the author of the Bill to see whether such Amendments might not be made in the details of the measure as would obviate the objections taken to it.

MR. P. O'BRIEN remarked, that he hoped the Report would not be brought up when the Irish Members were obliged to absent themselves from the House in order to attend the assizes.

MR. CRAUFURD observed he had no wish to steal a march upon the Irish Members.

MR. SPOONER said, he was afraid the Bill would give rise to collusive judgments, but thought it would be better, under the circumstances, to throw the responsibility of amending it upon the Government.

MR. GROGAN would recommend that, as the assizes would commence very shortly, and last for about six weeks, the measure should be suspended for the present Session.

MR. CRAUFURD proposed to fix the Report for Monday.

MR. M'CANN said, that while reserving his right to offer a strenuous opposition to the Bill, he would advise the withdrawal of the Motion for reporting progress, seeing that the Government were virtually about to take charge of the measure.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he should be sorry if the Amendment were withdrawn under any misconception as to the intentions of the Government. The pledge given by the Lord Advocate amounted to this, that the law officers of the Crown would render their best assistance to the hon. Member for Ayr in endeavouring to devise such Amendments as might carry out the views expressed on both sides during that day's discussion. It ought, however, to be distinctly understood that the Government would not thereby adopt this Bill as their own.

SIR ERSKINE PERRY observed, that he thought the course recommended by the Lord Advocate a judicious one. It would practically be equivalent to postponing legislation on this subject for another year.

MR. GROGAN complained that this was one of a series of attempts made, year after year, to force a highly objectionable measure on a reluctant Legislature. Either the Government approved this measure, or they did not. In the former case, they ought to bring in the Bill themselves; in the latter, they ought not to give an ambiguous sanction to tinkering efforts of this kind.

COLONEL FRENCH begged leave to withdraw his Motion.

MR. M'MAHON said, he must refuse to assent to the Bill going through Committee pro formâ, unless it was understood that it was to be recommitted.

MR. HILDYARD said, he feared that if they were to pass pro formâ a Bill which contained a number of provisions to which many hon. Members objected, the result would be inextricable confusion. Under the circumstances, he thought that the wisest course would be to abandon all hopes of passing the Bill in the present Session. It was the fashion now to refer almost every measure to next year, and he saw no reason why this should not be added to the long catalogue of Bills which were then to receive the serious consideration of Parliament.

MR. GROGAN asked the hon. and learned Member for Ayr whether he would give a distinct pledge that if the Bill went through Committee pro formâ now it should be recommitted? If he would not do so, he (Mr. Grogan) should appeal to the Government to take that course with the Bill.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said that, if it should appear to the Government that the alterations which it would be necessary to make in the Bill, were of such a nature as to require that it should be recommitted, he would, of course, recommend that that step should be adopted; but if the alterations should not be of that description he would not do so.

MR. M'MAHON said, he saw no prospect of coming to a satisfactory arrangement, and he should therefore go on with his opposition to the Bill. Clause 8 was the one now before the Committee, and he should move as an Amendment that it be struck out.

MR. CRAUFURD said, this clause, together with the 7th clause, was draughted by the Attorney General for Ireland to obviate the possibility of obtaining collusive judgments, and because it would remove, as that right hon. Gentleman stated, a great objection.

MR. M'MAHON said, that was only a reason the more why the clause should be struck out of the Bill.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL would support the clause.

Motion made, and Question put, "That Clause Eight stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 196; Noes 38: Majority 158.

Clause added.

Clause 9.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he had foregone his Motion to report progress on the understanding that the Bill should be re-committed; but as the Lord Advocate would not pledge himself to that effect, he (Colonel French) considered that it would be better the Bill should be referred to the Lord Advocate and the Solicitor General for England and the Attorney General for Ireland, as it was originally suggested; and, therefore, under these circumstances, he (Colonel French) would renew the Motion, unless a distinct pledge was given by the Government, and move that the Chairman report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

MR. ADAMS said, he thought it would be better to postpone the Bill for the purpose of permitting other business to go on. There was much that was valuable in the measure, though it was so strongly opposed by Members for Ireland, and he, as an English Member, would suggest that it should be tried in England and Scotland, and that Ireland should at first be excepted from its operation, since, if it were found to work well in the former countries, it might be extended to Ireland in another Session. If the Bill was pressed on, all other business would be suspended in the present temper of hon. Members for Ireland.

MR. M'CANN said, the Bill was said to be intended to make the Irish pay their debts; but he (Mr. M'Cann) contended that they did pay their debts both to their creditors and the Treasury. He was satisfied either to let the Bill go for consideration to the Government, as was suggested, or to adopt the proposition of the hon. Member, and let its provisions be applied to England alone.

MR. AYRTON hoped the hon. Member for Ayr would give way, as the question of time was so decidedly against him. The Committee had been four hours debating, and no advance had been made with the Bill.

MR. BLAND said, he thought the compromise of the hon. Member for Roscommon ought to be adopted, and he considered it would be no great misfortune if the Bill was postponed until next Session.

MR. GRIFFITH said, he thought the proposition of the Irish Members was a reasonable one, and ought to be accepted.

MR. GROGAN said, the hon. Member had pressed on his Bill year after year, and each Session the objectionable clauses were eliminated. The Bill was then before the House for the fifth or sixth time, and yet no progress had been made with it. The Irish Members, in order to avoid factious opposition, had acceded to a compromise to refer the Bill to a conclave; but this consent having been obtained an attempt was made to steal a march by the promoters of the Bill, and to advance it another stage. By this means the Irish Members were deprived of the opportunity of proposing their Amendments on the 8th clause, which had slipped through the Committee in consequence of this arrangement. It was, therefore, incumbent on the Irish Members to take the course proposed by the hon. Member for Roscommon, which was the straightforward and open course.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Chairman do report progress, and ask leave to sit again."

MR. M'MAHON said, he would propose an Amendment in the ninth clause, with the view of providing that instead of "an extract" of a Scotch decret the "copy" of the decret should be required to be filed with the registering officer. The hon. Member contended that by the "extract of a decret" the Court could know nothing of the merits of the question, and quoted a form of "extract" for the purpose of showing that it afforded no sufficient information. In lieu of the words "extract of a decret," he proposed, by way of Amendment, to insert the words, "authenticated copy of a decret."

MR. MALINS advised the promoters of the Bill to accede to the Amendment, in order to save time. He was surprised to have heard all factious opposition to this Bill disclaimed, for he considered the opposition factious after the sense of the House in favour of the Bill had been decidedly ascertained. He must say that the present Amendment had been proposed for factious purposes.

COLONEL FRENCH rose to order.

MR. MALINS said, if the expression were disorderly he would immediately retract it.

COLONEL FRENCH appealed to the Chairman of the Committee to declare whether it was not disorderly to impute factious motives to any hon. Member?

THE CHAIRMAN said, that he understood the hon. and learned Member retracted the expression.

MR. MALINS observed that he had done so instantly. He understood that previously to his (Mr. Malins') entering the House the hon. Member, who was not actuated by "factious" motives, read the very documents which he had just now read, in opposition to the present clause, and that a suggestion to make the Bill operative in England and not in Ireland, so that the English Courts would be bound to pay every respect to an Irish judgment, but the Irish Courts would pay no respect to an English judgment, had been thrown out although approved by the Irish Members. He appealed to the House to decide whether, after the House had given a plain and distinct opinion in favour of the Bill, a small minority should be allowed to obstruct its progress by repeated divisions either on mere words or mere forms? He understood that the "extract" was precisely the same as the "copy," and he asked the hon. Member in charge of the Bill to accept the change of words, and so avoid giving trouble to the House and mortification to the hon. and learned proposer of the Amendment, who would otherwise undoubtedly be placed in a miserably small minority.

MR. HILDYARD said, he had never heard a more extraordinary speech than that of his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Malins). The hon. and learned Member for Wexford, in the exercise of an undoubted right, proposed the substitution of certain words in the clause. The hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Malins) said that if the hon. and learned Member for Wexford pressed his Amendment to a division he would find himself in a "miserable minority," and yet the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Malins) recommended the hon. Member for Ayr (Mr. Craufurd) to accept the Amendment. He (Mr. Hildyard) thought, if there was any waste of the time of the House, it was not attributable to the hon. and learned Gentleman who had moved the Amendment, and he hoped they would hear no more lectures from the hon. and learned Member for Wallingford.

MR. ADAMS said, that the suggestion he had thrown out was that it would be advisable to except Ireland from the operation of the Bill, considering the unanimous opposition which was offered to it by the Irish Members. He had thrown out this suggestion with perfect good faith.

MR. GROGAN said, the hon. and learned Member for Wallingford seemed to be exceedingly anxious that this Bill should be disposed of, in order that he might bring on a measure in which he was himself interested.

MR. MALINS begged to observe that he had said nothing of the kind.

MR. GROGAN observed that he had not stated that the hon. and learned Member had said so, but he saw that the hon. and learned Gentleman was interested in a Bill which stood lower upon the Notices, and on that account he supposed that he was anxious that this measure should be got rid of as speedily as possible.

MR. MALINS said, it was true that he felt interested in a Bill which stood for discussion that day, but his only anxiety was to throw it out.

MR. GROGAN said, that he and many other representatives of Ireland were merely availing themselves of the forms of the House to oppose this Bill; and were the "miserable minority" of Irish Members who would be affected by the measure, and who strongly objected to it, to be prevented from exercising their constitutional privileges?

COLONEL FRENCH observed that with reference to the statement of the hon. and learned Member for Wallingford, that the opinion of the majority of the House had been repeatedly given in favour of the Bill, he would beg to remind him that the representatives of Ireland entertained an almost unanimous opinion with regard to this measure, and that they had determined to do everything to prevent it passing into law, and he thought it a matter of complaint that they were outvoted on divisions by hon. Gentlemen who had not heard the discussion, but who rushed from the library and the lobbies to give their votes.

MR. M'MAHON said, that nothing he had ever done in the House justified the imputation of factious motives. The hon. and learned Member for Wallingford was the last who ought to make such an imputation on him.

MR. BLAND said, he must protest against the conduct of the hon. and learned Member for Wallingford. He came down to the consideration of a Bill of which he knew nothing, and made personal imputations, and then, while pretending to withdraw his offensive phrase, repeated it by his tone and manner.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, his hon. Friend had spoken of the unanimity of the Irish Members in protecting the interests of Ireland; but it would appear that they had not only taken the interests of Ireland under their protection, but the interests of England and Scotland also. He (the Solicitor General) had been in the House some hours, and he must say that as yet he had not heard a single tangible objection to the measure; whilst the entire discussion had been totally beside any objection. His hon. Friend the Member for Roscommon (Colonel French) told them that there was a determination on the part of the Irish Members to throw out the Bill; but whether that determination was carried out or not, the Committee was certainly placed in a very unpleasant position. Hon. Members undoubtedly possessed the power of availing themselves of the forms of the House for the purpose of obstructing this, or similar measures which came before them, but the use of that power was not at all times an exhibition that was either very creditable to the House or beneficial to the public. He did not mean to complain of any hon. Gentleman for exercising his constitutional right as a Member of that House; he thought, however, that if they could put an end to the difficulty in which they seemed now to be placed, it would be alike for the benefit of the public interest and the credit of their own proceedings. He would suggest, therefore, to his hon. Friend (Mr. Craufurd), who had charge of the Bill, that, upon the Amendment being withdrawn, he should consent to the Chairman reporting progress and the House resuming.

MR. NAPIER said, his hon. and learned Friend had observed that he had not heard one tangible objection to the Bill. [The SOLICITOR GENERAL: Not to-day.] He would be sorry to oppose any bill to which his hon. and learned Friend thought there was "no tangible objection." But there were objections to the measure before the Committee, and his (Mr. Napier's)—and it had not yet been answered—was, that the effect of the Bill would be to enable parties to get judgments in one country and use them in another; to hold out an inducement especially in the case of small traders to obtain a judgment in Ireland for a secret warrant of attorney, but which is intended to be executed in England, or a judgment in England to be executed in Ireland. The machinery of the Bill was, in his opinion, peculiarly adapted to facilitate that class of judgments, and that was an evil which the mercantile community would be disposed to regard with very great apprehension. This, however, was a matter to be amicably agreed upon out of rather than in that House; but, in his view, the most simple and advantageous mode of proceeding would be to make an affidavit of debt, obtain judgment in the country where the debtor resided, and then to sue out execution. A provision such as that would go far to remove his objection to the Bill; for, as it now stood, no notice whatever would be given in the country where the execution was levied. Secret executions coming down suddenly and at the moment when not anticipated were what the commercial community above all things dreaded. He should be glad to render all the assistance in his power to make the Bill as perfect as possible, but he should be sorry to urge any objection that was not a reasonable or tangible one. His other objection to the Bill was its centralizing tendency.

MR. CRAUFURD said, there had been an understanding that the Bill should pass through Committee, and that the Amendments should be proposed upon the Report. That understanding had been violated. He should, therefore, move that the Chairman report progress and ask leave to sit again, on the understanding that his hon. Friend withdrew his Amendment. He should take the first open Wednesday to proceed with the Bill.

The House resumed. Committee report progress; to sit again on Wednesday, 15th July.

Clause 1,

MR. JOHN LOCKE moved the omission of the words repealing the 6th section of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 36.

MR. HUTT did not object to the Amendment; which was adopted, and the clause was agreed to.

MR. DRUMMOND said, he was surprised to hear the hon. Member for Dumfries (Mr. W. Ewart) repeat the fallacy, long ago exploded, that there was any necessary connection between pauperism and the want of education. Why, did any one ever hear that a man's stomach was filled by reading a page of Homer or of Virgil? Education had nothing whatever to do with pauperism. A man did not starve because he was uneducated, but because he had nothing to eat. Let the Committee observe the extent to which they were going. There was not a single parish in the country that had not at least one, if not four or five places of education, and by this Bill all those parish schools were to be exempt from the payment of rates. Then, again, the house of the schoolmaster was to be exempt. ["No, no!"] Then, if his house was not to be exempt they must increase his pay. He contended that this was a most foolish measure, and that institutions which had produced the greatest amount of public benefit, such, for example, as the Royal Agricultural Society, the British Institution, the Society of Arts, and the Society of Painters in Water Colours, were precisely those which had never received one farthing of the public money. He believed that in this, as in many other cases, the more there was paid, the less was there obtained.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 76; Noes 100: Majority 24.

House resumed; Committee report progress; to sit again on Wednesday 15th July.

THE ROCHDALE ELECTION.

REPORT BROUGHT UP.

MR. HENLEY, the Chairman of the Select Committee appointed on Friday last to consider the allegations contained in the petition of Mr. John Newall, touching an attempt to corrupt a witness summoned to give evidence before the Rochdale Election Committee, brought up the Report of the Committee, and as the hon. Gentleman laid it on the table there were cries of "Read, read!" from both sides of the House.

Sir DENIS LE MARCHANT thereupon read the Report as follows:—

"The SELECT COMMITTEE appointed to inquire into the Matter of the PETITION of John Newall, and to report their opinion thereupon to the House," and to whom the PETITION of John Newall and the evidence taken at the Bar of the House were referred—have considered the Matters to them referred, and have agreed to the following Report:—

"That Peter Johnson, mentioned in the Petition of John Newall, was not produced before your Committee; and it appeared that he had not been arrested under the warrant issued against him, although every means had been taken to find him, both at Rochdale and in London.

Your Committee find that by the direction of John Newall, the agent for the Petition against the return of Sir Alexander Ramsay, Abraham Rothwell was upon the 12th of May last served with a Speaker's warrant to attend to give evidence before the Rochdale Election Committee.

"That the fact of Abraham Rothwell being a person likely to be examined as a witness on the hearing of the said Petition became known in Rochdale, and was before the 18th of June inst. known to John Lord.

"That the aforesaid Peter Johnson, having recently come to London, did, on the morning of Thursday, the 18th inst., personally apply to John Lord for the address of Abraham Rothwell, and from what passed at their interview John Lord became aware that Peter Johnson's object in desiring to communicate with Rothwell was connected with the Rochdale Election, and he requested Lord to tell Rothwell that if Rothwell intended to leave the country he (Johnson) would find him money to the extent of £50.

"That, accordingly by the agency of John Lord, Peter Johnson and Abraham Rothwell met on the evening of Thursday, the 18th inst., when Peter Johnson, in the presence and hearing of John Lord, offered Abraham Rothwell to provide money for his use to the amount of £50 if he would leave England and go to America.

"From the circumstances already stated the necessary inference would seem to be that the object of Peter Johnson in so acting as aforesaid was to prevent Abraham Rothwell's being examined on the trial of the Election Petition, and that such purpose of Johnson's was known to John Lord. But the evidence was so inconclusive, and the manner of the witnesses in giving their testimony so unsatisfactory, that the Committee are unable to state this inference as being the clear result of their investigation.

"Your Committee desire to add that nothing appeared in the evidence before your Committee to connect the sitting Member or his agents with the transactions in question; and, in conclusion, your Committee have to report that they carefully abstain from prosecuting any inquiries into matters not strictly included within the limits of the reference made to them, because of their apprehension that they might trench on the proper duties of the Election Committee, and prejudice the rights of parties not represented before them."

The Report to lie on the table, and to be printed.

The House adjourned at five minutes before Six o'clock.

THE PROBATE AND ADMINISTRATION AND DIVORCE BILLS—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF WICKLOW said, he wished to ask a question with reference to the Probate and Administration and the Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Bills, which had been lately passed by that House. Neither of them extended to Ireland; and as regarded the latter, he wished to ask his noble and learned Friend on the woolsack if the action for damages in cases of criminal conversation, and all the other proceedings which had hitherto been necessary for the procuring a divorce, were to continue in force in Ireland. He should very likely be told that it was the intention of Government to introduce similar measures for Ireland; but such intentions were often not carried out, and as an instance of it he might mention that some years ago an Act was passed making it lawful to issue licences for the sale of game in England. He asked if the principle was not to be extended to the whole of the United Kingdom, and he was told that there was a technical difficulty in passing a Bill for the two countries together, but that it was intended to bring in a Bill for Ireland. However, from that day to this no measure had been passed on the subject; and while in England it was lawful to sell game, it could not be done in Ireland without a violation of the law. He trusted, therefore, that his noble and learned Friend could assure him that steps had already been taken to extend to Ireland the operation of Bills having a similar object with those which had passed that House in relation to probates of wills and the granting of divorces.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR could only say, in reply, that it was not only the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce similar Bills for Ireland to those which had just passed their Lordships' House, but a Bill for remodelling the Court of Probate had been prepared (he did not say it was ready to be introduced), and the Attorney General for Ireland entertained a confident expectation of being able to pass it this Session. It was impossible to make the present Bills applicable to the two countries, because it would be necessary to create two new tribunals.

MINISTERS' MONEY.

THE DEBATE. EXPLANATION.

THE MARQUESS OF WESTMEATH claimed their Lordships' attention in regard to a personal matter which had arisen out of the debate which took place the other night upon the Ministers' Money (Ireland) Bill. The noble Duke the Postmaster General had expressed himself to the effect that the Government had introduced the measure for the purpose of protecting, in some degree, the Established Church in Ireland. He (the Marquess of Westmeath) rose and said that if the noble Duke thought that the Bill would have that effect he was quite mistaken, because he stated that the Roman Catholic clergy would, he was confident, agitate the country so long as they were permitted to do so, and that they would seek every opportunity of striking at the very existence of that Church. Now, a highly-respectable newspaper, a journal of the greatest and the largest circulation in the kingdom, stated in the Report which it gave the following day, that he said the Roman Catholics were seeking to strike down the Established Church. If such had been his sentiments he should not be backward in avowing them. But he added this, which he believed no one listening to him could have mistaken or misapprehended, that he was certain the Roman Catholic laity were not of that way of thinking, and that they would live peaceably with their Protestant fellow-subjects if they were permitted to do so. On looking at the paper in question the next day, he observed the principal limbs of what he said had been cut off, and what were the most odious were retained. He wrote a letter to the editor of The Times requesting that a correction might take place; for he had always observed that the newspapers generally had shown a generosity and a desire to correct any misconception or misinterpretation that occurred in their reports. The newspaper in question, however, had not had the common courtesy to take notice of the statement on his part. He had no vindictive feeling about the matter, but he did not wish to have it represented that he uttered sentiments the very opposite to those he had really expressed; or that opinions respecting the feelings of the Roman Catholic laity towards the Established Church should be put into his mouth which he never entertained, and that such opinions should be circulated there and in the sister country to his prejudice. While thanking their Lordships for their attention while he made that explanation, he would only repeat that he had never uttered the sentiments that had been attributed to him by the paper to which he referred.

SALE OF OBSCENE BOOKS, &c., PREVENTION BILL.
SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD CAMPBELL, in moving the second reading of the Bill said, that the object of it was to prevent the spread of those obscene prints and publications which had become of late most alarming. Their Lordships could scarcely conceive the extent to which the trade in those infamous works was carried. From information which he had recently received, he was led to believe that a considerable capital was engaged in the trade; that there were warehouses where those abominations were stored; that there were persons actually employed to travel about the country for the purpose of distributing circulars of the most exciting description. These were also sent under a penny postage stamp, inviting the people to come, and see, and purchase. It was easy to imagine the great evils that must arise from this detestable traffic. He believed that there was no country in Europe in which the circulation of such articles was permitted with the same facilities as existed in this country; because, in every other country the police had a more summary power in respect to them than the police had here. The principle upon which the Bill was founded was a simple one. As the law now stood, the only remedy that existed was an indictment against the publisher of obscene publications, which must be set on foot by private information. But there was still great difficulty in enforcing the law, because the publishers were generally on their guard. In order to obtain the required evidence, it was necessary to employ a class of men

that could not be looked on with much respect—that class known as spies and informers. The individual employed on this duty must enter the place where those prints or publications were supposed to be, under the pretence that he was an admirer of such productions, and that he wished to purchase some of them. Having succeeded in obtaining them, he comes into a court as a witness, for the purpose of giving evidence on the matter. In order to render his evidence acceptable, and free from all suspicion, the informer must be searched by a policeman immediately before he enters the house or shop in question, with a view of showing that he could not have had any of those infamous works about him at the time; and immediately after he leaves the premises, in order to prove that he could only have obtained them at the place he had just visited. And, after all, from the doubtful character of such witnesses, it was difficult to obtain a conviction. Well, then, when the conviction took place, the criminal himself was sent to prison; but that did not put a stop to the trade, for the business was carried on as briskly as ever, in the name of the wife or son of the convicted party, and the poison was circulated, probably, more industriously and effectually than before. Therefore he contended that at present they had no effectual remedy against the evil. Now, he proposed that they should do something similar to that which they had done in respect to gaming-houses. There was a power given by a recent Act against gaming-houses, which, however, was greater than what he asked for the present measure. Upon applications founded on affidavit before a magistrate, stating that there was gaming going on in a certain place, contrary to law, a warrant was granted, under which the police might enter the house and use all reasonable force that was necessary to enable them to search every corner of the house, from the cellar to the garret, and to carry away all cards, balls, dice, and other instruments of gaming, and might also arrest all persons they found on the premises, and have them summarily convicted before the magistrates. That power had been found most beneficial, and as had been found in recent cases, was attended with the most satisfactory results. He, however, did not ask the House to go so far in regard to the present Bill. He merely asked their Lordships to treat those obscene prints and publications in the way they treated commercial goods that had not paid the duty. He proposed that the magistrates should have the power of issuing their warrants upon affidavits being made of the existence of those indecent publications in certain places, and that the police should have the power of entering those places and seizing upon all such property as they found there. The noble Lord having recited the heads of the clauses of the Bill, moved that their Lordships now read it the second time.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2<sup>a</sup>.

LORD BROUGHAM said, he was sure that no one was more competent to judge of the extent of the evil for which he proposed to legislate than the noble and learned Lord himself. It was astounding to read the accounts which had gone through the papers lately of one or two cases of an infamous character tried before his noble and learned Friend. He was sure that there was but one which pervaded the country generally upon this subject—that everything that could be safely and properly done should be done to suppress this great and crying evil. He was, however, of opinion, that his noble and learned Friend would find some difficulties in the details of his measure. For example, how did he propose to define what was an “obscene publication?” He did not wish to treat the measure with any kind of disrespect, but he thought that unless the details were greatly altered, the Bill would fail to remedy the evil complained of. He would remind his noble and learned Friend, that in the works of some of their most eminent poets there were some objectionable passages which, under this measure, might cause them to be considered obscene publications.

LORD CAMPBELL said, he had not the most distant contemplation of including in the Bill the class of works to which the noble and learned Lord referred. The measure was intended to apply exclusively to works written for the single purpose of corrupting the morals of youth, and of a nature calculated to shock the common feelings of decency in any well regulated mind. Bales of publications of that description were manufactured in Paris, and imported into this country. He was ready to make what was indictable under the present law a test of obscenity.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he shared in that reluctance which every one must entertain in appearing for the moment to be opposed to a measure having the very laudable object which the noble and learned Lord had in view; particularly when it would be admitted by all that the measure which was proposed as a remedy for the evil complained of came with peculiar fitness from his noble and learned Friend, not only on account of his position as a distinguished Member of that House, but also in regard to the elevated position he occupied in the highest court of law. But, however zealous his intentions might be to abolish a vile and immoral traffic, he (the Lord Chancellor) thought that he would find it impossible to frame any clause that might not enable a person inclined to be vexatious to interfere with what his noble and learned Friend himself believed should not be meddled with under the provisions of his Bill. Who could tell but that the superintendent of police or the magistrates before whom the application came would take a different view of what were obscene or indecent publications from the noble and learned Lord? It appeared to him (the Lord Chancellor) that the definition of the first clause would rest with the magistrate; and that of the second with the superintendent of police. But even supposing that the police had seized upon those publications, what were they to do with them?

LORD CAMPBELL: There is no property in those publications. Let them do as they liked with them.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that he did not like to oppose the second reading of the Bill; but unless it could be very materially altered in its progress, he did not think the measure could fitly become the law of the land.

THE EARL OF EGLINTON addressed a few observations to the House, which were inaudible.

LORD LYNTHURST: My Lords, while giving full credit to my noble and learned Friend the Lord Chief Justice for the feelings which have prompted him to bring forward this Bill, I entirely agree with my noble and learned Friend on the wool-sack that it will wholly fail in its object, and that it is unwise and imprudent to poke into these question and agitate the public mind in respect to them. My noble and learned Friend's aim is to put down the sale of obscene books and prints; but what is the interpretation which is to be put on the word “obscene?” I can easily conceive that two men will come to entirely different conclusions as to its meaning. I have looked into Johnson to see what definition he gives of the word, and I find that he says it is something "immodest; not agreeable to chastity of mind; causing low ideas." These are the definitions which he gives of the word. Suppose now a man following the trade of an informer, or a policeman, sees in a window something which he conceives to be a licentious print. He goes to the magistrate, and describes, according to his ideas, what he saw; the magistrate thereupon issues his warrant for the seizure of the disgusting print. The officer then goes to the shop, and says to the shopkeeper, "Let me look at that picture of Jupiter and Antiope." "Jupiter and what?" says the shopkeeper. "Jupiter and Antiope," repeats the man. "Oh! Jupiter and Antiope, you mean," says the shopkeeper; and hands him down the print. He sees the picture of a woman stark naked, lying down, and a satyr standing by her with an expression on his face which shows most distinctly what his feelings are and what is his object. The informer tells the man he is going to seize the print, and to take him before a magistrate. "Under what authority?" he asks; and he is told—"Under the authority of Lord Campbell's Act." "But," says the man, "don't you know that it is a copy from a picture of one of the most celebrated masters in Europe?" That does not matter; the informer seizes it as an obscene print. He asks if the shopkeeper has got any more prints like it? "Oh, yes, I have got several others," is the answer. Whereupon he searches the shop, and in so doing perhaps he stumbles upon a print of the story of Danaë. There he sees a naked woman lifting her eyes to heaven, but standing in a very strange attitude, the shower of gold descending upon her, a little Cupid peeping over her shoulder pointing with his dart, and other circumstances which I will not describe. Well, is this print also to be brought before the magistrate? These prints come within the description in this Bill as much as any work you can conceive. And yet they are both celebrated pictures; the first is a copy of a famous Correggio which hangs in the large square room of the Louvre, right opposite an ottoman, on which are seated delicate ladies of the first rank from all countries of Europe, who resort there for the purpose of studying the works of art in that great gallery. But this is not all. Our informant leaves the print shop and goes into the studio of a sculptor or some statuary and sees there figures of nymphs, fauna, and satyrs, all perfectly naked, some of them in attitudes which I do not choose to describe. According to this Bill they may every one be seized,—

"Nympharumque leves cum satyris chori."

Well, I will now go to a third class—the poets—for the informant next proceeds to the circulating libraries. I do not know whether my noble and learned Friend's extensive reading has made him familiar with the poems of Rochester, but I think they would come under the description of this Bill. "The freedom of ancient satirists," says Hume, the historian, "no more resembles the licentiousness of Rochester than the nakedness of an Indian does that of a common prostitute." Suppose that book is in a certain library lent out for hire; under my noble and learned Friend's Bill it may be seized at once—in fact, under the Bill a circulating library may be searched from one end to the other. In the same way the dramatists of the Restoration, Wycherley, Congreve, and the rest of them,—there is not a page in any one of them which might not be seized under this Bill. One of the principal characters in one of Congreve's plays is Lady Wishfort. Dryden, too, is as bad as any of them. He has translated the worst parts of Ovid—his Art of Love—works for which Ovid was exiled, and died, I believe, on the shores of the Euxine. There is not a single volume of that great poet which would not come under the definition of my noble and learned Friend's Bill. I need scarcely recall to your Lordships' remembrance that poem—"Sigismunda and Guiscardo"—I think it is, beginning—

"While Norman Tancred in Salerno reigned," in which occurs the description of the secret wedding, the scenes that preceded it, and the scenes that were immediately consequent upon it. I will not repeat to your Lordships more of it than this passage:—

"The holy man, amazed at what he saw,
Made haste to sanctify the bliss by law;
And muttered fast the matrimony o'er,
For fear committed sin should get before."

But I think your Lordships will see from this specimen that Dryden's poems must be placed in my noble and learned Friend's Index Expurgatorius. Take, too, the whole flight of French novelists, from Crébillon, filz, down to Paul de Kock; nothing can be more unchaste, nothing more immodest, than they are; and when my noble and learned Friend's Bill is passed, every copy of them may be committed to the bonfire with as little mercy as Don Quixote's chivalry books were.

But, my Lords, I contend that this Bill will be entirely inoperative. The books and prints at which it is aimed are small in bulk, they may be kept in a retired part of the shop, and only be produced when a customer comes in for them, so that, in fact, you will not always be able to lay your hands upon them. I feel as strongly as any one can the infamy of the sale of these books, but, so far from agreeing with my noble and learned Friend that a Bill of this description is necessary to put it down, I am satisfied that the law as it stands is abundantly strong enough. All that is needed is additional vigour in the administration of the existing law. I am satisfied that nothing can be easier than to arrange means for detecting persons engaged in this trade; and when persons are found guilty of the offence of publishing and selling these books, instead of getting merely a nominal punishment, let them be sentenced to such a punishment as the infamy of their guilt merits, and as will effectually deter others from following in their steps. My Lords, I see such objections to the Bill of my noble and learned Friend that I move it be read a second time this day six months.

Amendment moved, to leave out "now," and insert "this Day Six Months."

LORD CAMPBELL said, that there was no analogy whatever between the cases mentioned by the noble and learned Lord and the publications aimed at by the Bill. On the principle laid down by the noble and learned Lord, not only could there be no new remedy for this evil provided, but the old remedy must be taken away also. The noble and learned Lord said there was no definition of obscenity.

LORD LYNTHURST rose to order.

LORD CAMPBELL: I have a right to be heard. ["Order!"]

LORD LYNTHURST spoke to order. His noble and learned Friend, having made a speech and concluded with a Motion, was not entitled to rise and make another speech till all the noble Lords who wished to address the House had expressed their sentiments. That was the rule of the House.

LORD CAMPBELL said, an Amendment had been moved to the Motion which he had made, and he had a right to make another speech on that Amendment. His noble and learned Friend rose to order, but he was himself out of order. In his zeal for these filthy publications, his noble and learned Friend had gone entirely wrong as to what was the rule of the House—an error which certainly surprised him in one who had so long held the office of Lord Chancellor. ["Order!"]

LORD ST. LEONARDS rose to order. His noble and learned Friend (Lord Campbell) had made a Motion; to that Motion an Amendment had been moved, but the Amendment had not yet been proposed to the House.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, the Motion before the House was, that this Bill be now read a second time; since which it had been moved as an Amendment that it be read a second time that day six months.

LORD CAMPBELL: And on that Amendment I have an undoubted right to address the House. ["Order, order!"] With regard to what has been said by my noble and learned Friend—

LORD REDESDALE again rose to order. He thought his noble and learned Friend was under a mistake as to his right. The object of the Amendment was to meet the Question, that the Bill be "now" read a second time, and it was not competent for the Mover to speak to such an Amendment, so long as there were other noble Lords who wished to address the House.

LORD CAMPBELL repeated that he had the right which he claimed to address the House.

LORD BROUGHAM, who said that, according to his experience of the rules of the other House, the noble and learned Lord had no right to address their Lordships. In the other House, they had in the Speaker an officer who kept order and controlled the proceedings; in their Lordships' House, however, the office of Speaker was as it were in commission, and the duty of preserving order devolved upon the whole House. Now, according to the rules of the other House—and he thought in this House also—the maker of a Motion had—he would not say a right, for there was none—but a privilege, through the courtesy of the House, to make a general reply; but it was a mere mockery to say that, upon such an occasion as the present, he was entitled to make a second speech.

THE EARL OF WICKLOW contended that the noble and learned Lord (Lord Campbell) was entitled to speak to the Amendment. In point of fact, the debate did not begin till an Amendment was moved.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that when his noble and learned Friend moved the Amendment, he (the Lord Chancellor) ought in strictness to have proposed it to the House, but to do so was not the practice of their Lordships' House. His idea of the rule distinctly was, that his noble and learned Friend had a right to speak to the Amendment that had been moved, and such, he believed, was the invariable rule in the other House of Parliament. In point of fact, a distinct question was raised by the Amendment.

LORD CAMPBELL, claiming his right to address the House, was perfectly willing to waive that right till he had heard such of their Lordships as wished to speak upon the question.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON, having had the honour of a seat in the other House of Parliament, must declare against the right of the noble and learned Lord to make a second speech.

LORD BROUGHAM said that, after all, everything must depend upon the nature of the Amendment. It might be substantially a different Motion altogether, in which case the maker of the original Motion might have a right to be heard upon it; but in this instance, it was only another way of saying "no" to the original Motion.

EARL GRANVILLE wished to speak with great diffidence on a question which had elicited so much difference of opinion. He believed that even in the case of a substantive Motion there was no right of reply, though the House generally allowed one to be made; but, if an Amendment, such as had been brought forward that evening was made, then, he believed, the rule of the House was that a right to reply existed.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, he had the misfortune to be a very old Member of their Lordships' House; he had also been a Member of the other House of Parliament; he was ready to maintain, therefore, that, according to the rules of Parliament, every Member who made a Motion had a right to reply; but it did not necessarily follow that he should have the last word in the debate. If he chose to make his reply immediately after the Amendment moved, he had no right to speak again last in the debate.

LORD BELPER said, according to the practice of the other House, any Member who had spoken on the original Motion had a right to speak on an Amendment.

The strict rule was, that there was no right to speak twice on a Motion; but if an Amendment was moved, that Amendment was substantially a new Motion, and on that Motion, though a Member had already spoken, he would have a right to speak again. If their Lordships, however, were about to make a distinction, and to say that on a second Motion of a particular kind there should not be a right of reply, they would introduce eternal confusion into their debates.

LORD MONTEAGLE said, he understood the rule to be, that no one had a right to speak twice upon the same subject; but that if an Amendment was moved which was substantially another Motion, the person who made the original Motion was entitled to speak again.

LORD CAMPBELL, still maintaining his right, repeated that he was willing upon this occasion to forego it.

LORD WENSLEYDALE said, there was no doubt but that the noble and learned Lord was animated by a very proper desire to put an end to the nefarious traffic in indecent publications; but, at the same time, he (Lord Wensleydale) was of opinion with his noble and learned Friend near him (Lord Lyndhurst) that the common law, as it stood, was quite strong enough to deal with such offences. Any person exposing indecent prints was liable to be indicted for a misdemeanour. The extensive powers sought to be conferred upon the police by the Bill required grave consideration, and the definition of what was obscene was very uncertain. There was not a library in which books could not be found containing passages which a strict-dealing magistrate might consider to bring them within the operation of this Bill. The classic authors might be held to be obscene, and the possession of Lucian, Lucullus, or Juvenal, might expose the owners to the penalties which the Bill prescribed.

LORD WYNFORD admitted that in works of merit to which reference had been made, there might be found some objectionable passages; but it would be absurd to suppose, that the possession of such books would render the possessors liable to punishment. Those works, including those of the immortal Shakspeare, were preserved, not on account of the exceptional passages which were objectionable, but for the noble and elevating sentiments which they inculcated.

LORD CAMPBELL said, he thought that the particular street to which he had referred, but not named, would rejoice greatly upon learning that the cause of free trade in obscene publications had been upheld by such distinguished authorities. Notwithstanding the arguments of his noble and learned Friends opposite, he trusted their Lordships would not reject the Bill. He could not see why there should be any objection to allow the same means to be used to repress the abominable traffic in obscenity as were allowed to put down gaming-houses and for the seizure of smuggled goods. The noble and learned Lord who moved the Amendment had objected that the Bill, if passed, could permit interference with private picture-galleries. When the law was made stricter in order to put down gambling-houses, there might as well have been an outcry, "What will become of St. James's-street, of Brookes's, of White's, of Boodle's—there may be gambling in those respectable establishments, they may be complained of by the police, and Members of either House of Parliament may be taken before a magistrate and sent to the House of Correction." Another argument of the noble and learned Lord would, if correct, prevent any indictment being laid, for he said, "Who was to define what was obscene?" The language of the indictment was for selling or exposing obscene prints or books, and the question whether the pictures or books impugned were obscene or not was left to the jury to decide. The noble and learned Lord appeared to think that under the Bill private collections might be interfered with, but that was not so. The pictures in such collections were not intended for sale, but were kept for the owners' contemplation. There was a broad and marked distinction between such pictures as the noble and learned Lord had so graphically described, and the abominable prints which could only disgust him, which possessed no artistic merits, and which could only be regarded with aversion by every right-minded person. It was not against the masterpieces of Correggio that the Bill was levelled, but against the mass of impure publications which was poured forth on London, to the great injury of the youth of this country. If their Lordships would read the Bill a second time, he thought there could be no difficulty in introducing words in Committee to guard against any abuse which might be apprehended; but he cautioned their Lordships against a proceeding which could not fail to shock the public feeling of the country.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he had no doubt that the evil of which the noble and learned Lord had complained was a very serious one, and that steps ought to be taken to put an end to it; but it was no less clear, after the statements made by other noble and learned Lords, that the Bill in its present shape would not effect the object in view—at least not without producing considerable inconvenience. The noble and learned Lord, however, had just stated that words might be introduced in Committee to put down the evil, but at the same time to obviate the difficulties which had been pointed out. Under these circumstances, he, for one, was inclined to vote for the second reading, reserving his right to consider the Amendments which might be proposed in Committee.

LORD BROUGHAM suggested the propriety, after the statement of the Lord Chief Justice, whose opinion upon such a subject was entitled to great weight, of withdrawing the Amendment and allowing the Bill to go to the second reading.

VEXATIOUS LITIGATION PREVENTION BILL.

SECOND READING. BILL POSTPONED.

LORD BROUGHAM said, he did not at present propose to press this Bill to a second reading, but, as he had given a notice of his intention to call the notice of their Lordships to the subject of vexatious suits, he would take this opportunity of making his statement; but he would not detain their Lordships long. This was a Bill which he had twice before presented to their Lordships, for preventing vexatious litigation by the establishment of courts of reconciliation. He had the misfortune to differ from the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack and from other noble and learned Friends upon that subject; they were, at least, not so sanguine as he was of the benefits to be derived from the establishment of courts of reconciliation. His own opinion was a very strong one, and was founded upon what took place in other countries. In France more than two-thirds of all the causes brought into court were stopped by the court of reconciliation, including one-third of the greater causes. In Denmark the result was still more striking ; for there, out of 30,000 causes brought into court, no more than 3,000, or one-tenth of the whole, ever came to be tried, nine-tenths being stopped by the court of reconciliation. In Germany and Switzerland the experience was precisely the same. In all these countries the system had been found to answer better than in France, because it was under better regulation. Of the value of the principle there could be no doubt ; but knowing the great indisposition of his noble and learned Friends to adopt this plan, he could hope for no more than that they might be induced to approve those parts of the Bill for preventing vexatious litigation. Since the Bill was last before their Lordships, he had made one material change in it. It originally stood that the parties were to go before the Judge without their counsel or their attorneys ; but he had been induced to alter it, and to enable them to go there, if they were so minded, with their professional advisers. He now begged to call the attention of their Lordships to the experience of the Examiners' Office of the Court of Chancery since the recent change in its constitution and practice. The present Examiners had had before them somewhere about 600 causes, and they had found the intermediary process of examination most successful. One-seventh of the whole had been stopped in the office through their kindly intervention, and allowed to go no further. No doubt, as the Master of the Rolls, the head of that office, suggested, much of this was owing to the parties becoming aware of each other's feelings. One advantage of the plan, indeed, was that the parties at an early stage, before any expense had been incurred, were brought together, and, discussing their several cases, each knew what chance he had of meeting a formidable array of evidence against him, the result being that many hopeless actions and defences—hopeless suits for one party or the other, which would have been attended to one of the parties with great—perhaps ruinous—expense were stopped. But in what he proposed there was also the great benefit of the parties coming before a respected individual of sagacity and experience, wholly uninterested, and giving his advice from no possible motive except that of kindness towards the intending litigants. The effect of that with respect to the Examiners had been, that in almost all cases in which they had recommended the plaintiff

to give up his suit because he had no chance of success, or advised the defendant to abandon his defence because he was sure to be defeated, their advice had been followed. The Examiners had told him that attorney's actions, either in inception, or what became attorney's actions during the suit, formed a very large proportion of all actions. The defect in the Examiners' Office, valuable as it had proved, was this, that when the parties got there, a good deal of expense had been already incurred. Were there a court of reconciliation in the first instance, those expenses might not be incurred. It was a melancholy fact, known to all who had lived as long in the profession as he had, that great suffering occurred to poor and deserving persons through unhappy litigations. How many instances had he known of the ruin of men's fortunes?—cases which were distinctly traceable to their having engaged in suits, for the success of which there was no reasonable hope. Were there courts of reconciliation to which they might apply in the first instance, their ruin might have been prevented. He proposed that, in order to prevent vexatious suits, the litigation of claims for which there was no just foundation, by persons in insolvent circumstances, he would give power to a Judge to require security for the costs to be incurred in such action. Actions the most desperate and untenable were brought ; subscriptions were obtained for carrying them on, at the instigation of some pettifogging practitioner of the law ; and, when they failed, the plaintiff was found to be utterly incapable of paying a farthing. There was the well-known case of Smyth (Provis) v. Smith, in which a man utterly reckless, wholly unprincipled, as dishonest as any man who ever entered a court of justice, brought an action of ejectment against the proprietor of an hereditary estate, and put that proprietor not only to great expense but to great anxiety for months and years. The claim on his property was defeated. Smyth himself was examined, and a person seeing in the London papers an account of the examination was enabled to send down a telegraphic message which convicted him of the fabrication of a ring and of the forgery of a document. He was tried for forgery. He might also have been tried for perjury, but he was tried and convicted of forgery and sentenced to transportation for life. The defendant in the action brought by that man had to pay between £7,000 and £8,000. It might be asked how were the funds for carrying on the proceedings provided? He grieved to say they were provided by the subscriptions of persons in London and Bristol, who, on the promise of 150 per cent, were ready to speculate on the chance of success; but those persons would not have been willing to run the risk of having to pay the whole costs in the suit. He would answer for it that if there had existed such a provision as he proposed, Provis would never have found any person to give security for costs. Provis broke down under his own examination under the admirable operation of the new law of evidence: but this was but one remarkable case. He might cite to their Lordships hundreds of cases of smaller amount in which the defendants were put to an expense of £400 or £500 by these vexatious proceedings. The only other provision of this Bill was to cure a defect in the insolvency law. The Insolvency Court did not possess the power of visiting parties to vexatious suits with punishment, unless they happened to be defendants. He proposed to make the power of punishment apply equally to the plaintiffs. He would not at present trouble their Lordships further, but would move the second reading of the Bill, in order that further proceedings might be adjourned.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2<sup>a</sup>.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he was, to a certain extent, opposed to courts of reconciliation, because he believed they would be only sinks for adding to the expense of ordinary litigation. When it was said that the Examiners in the Court of Chancery found they could often put an end to suits, it was no doubt perfectly true, because it should be remembered that the parties had been in violent hostility to each other for some time, and, the truth having all come out, they had the means of knowing what the chances of success or failure were. It seemed to him that to force persons to appear before a tribunal amicably to settle their differences, would only lead, ultimately, to further litigation. With respect to the proposal to call upon the plaintiff to give security before entering upon a suit, he could only say that it was one which, in his opinion, was open to grave objection, because the Judge who was to fix the amount of security could know nothing about the merits of the case without having the whole matter investigated before him. The object which his noble and learned Friend sought to accomplish was no doubt one of great importance, and its attainment would be productive of considerable advantage if it could only be made consistent with a due regard to the interest of the poorer class of plaintiffs. He must confess that he entertained great doubts upon that point, but he should abstain—as his noble Friend proposed to move the adjournment of the debate—from offering any further comment upon the subject on that occasion.

LORD CAMPBELL said, he had not the slightest doubt that a court such as his noble and learned Friend sought to establish had been productive of great benefit in Denmark and other continental countries; but he must at the same time contend that it would be found to be totally irreconcilable with the form of procedure in England; that it would add to the amount of vexatious litigation, and would increase the costs of particular suits. Out of the causes which came on for trial in this country eighty per cent were of a nature in which the question involved admitted of no doubt, in which the defendant had not a shadow of a chance of succeeding, and in which his only object was to seek some means by which a good defence might be got up. In ten out of the remaining twenty per cent, to bring the parties face to face before entering upon a suit would, instead of leading to a reconciliation between them, be, in his opinion, productive only of exasperation. He was quite as much alive as his noble and learned Friend could be to the evils resulting from the prosecution of vexatious claims to estates, but the inconvenience was one which he despaired of seeing removed by the operation of any general law.

Further debate on the said Motion adjourned sine die.

House adjourned at a Quarter past Seven o'clock, till To-morrow, Half-past Ten o'clock.

PASSING TOLLS ON SHIPPING.

QUESTION.

MR. INGHAM said, he would beg to ask the Vice President of the Board of Trade if it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce a Bill for the abolition of Passing Tolls on Shipping.

MR. LOWE said, in the early part of the Session he had stated that as soon as the business of the House would permit he would introduce a Bill to abolish Passing Tolls and relieve shipping from other burdens to which it was subject. He was sorry, however, to say that that period had not yet arrived; and in the present state of the Session and of the business of the House he could not conceal from himself that it would be quite impossible to carry through such a measure in the course of the present year, involving, as it must do, very considerable discussion. Therefore, with very great regret, he must defer till another Session the attempt to relieve shipping from these most unjust burdens.

MR. HUDSON said, he wished to know whether it would not be possible this Session to carry through a Bill for abolishing Passing Tolls, leaving the question of the local charges on shipping to another occasion.

MR. LOWE said, it was his opinion that it was not possible.

DISTRIBUTION OF THE VICTORIA CROSS.

QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, he wished to inquire whether, as the soldiers of the Line and the Guards were to be allowed to attend the award of the Victoria Cross to their comrades on the following day the same privilege ought not to be extended to the seamen of the Royal Navy? Generals and Lord Lieutenants of counties were to be admitted to the park on horseback, in order to take part in the ceremony. He wished to know why Admirals should not be permitted to do the same?

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE: I am informed, Sir, that a great body of the Greenwich Pensioners will be present on the occasion, as well as those sailors to whom the Victoria Cross is to be distributed. With reference to the cavalry part of the question, I can only say that if the gallant Admiral presents himself in Hyde Park, mounted and in uniform, I am sure a fitting place will be given to him.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he wished to be informed by the Under Secretary for War whether it was true that the 79th Regiment of Highlanders, which had only sixty killed and wounded in the late war, was to be present at the distribution of the Victoria Cross, while the Connaught Rangers, who had 476 killed and wounded, were to be excluded?

SIR JOHN RAMSDEN: I am sorry that the hon. and gallant Member did not give me notice of his question till two minutes ago. At present I am unable to answer it.

COLONEL FRENCH: I shall renew the question on the adjournment of the House to-morrow.

GUNPOWDER STORES—QUESTION.

MAJOR SIBTHORP said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary for War whether it is true that large quantities of gunpowder are stored in various places in the immediate neighbourhood and town of Waltham Abbey, and, if so, whether they are to remain there; also, if it is true that any parties connected with the Government have threatened with instant dismissal any of the workmen or others at the mills if they divulged anything relative to the quantity of gunpowder stored there?

SIR JOHN RAMSDEN said, he could assure the hon. and gallant Member that there was now no gunpowder stored in the town or immediate neighbourhood of Waltham Abbey; and that it was entirely untrue that any Government official had been threatened with instant dismissal for divulging anything connected with the subject.

CANADIAN BISHOPS—QUESTION.

MR. COLLINS said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies if the Royal Assent has been given to the Bill passed by the Parliament of Canada, "to enable the Members of the United Church of England and Ireland in Canada to meet in Synod, in order that the members thereof may be permitted to exercise the same rights of self-government that are enjoyed by other religious communities?" and, if so, whether such Act does not place the appointment of Bishops in that Church in the Synod as therein constituted, any prerogative of the Crown to the contrary notwithstanding.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he was happy to be able to state in reply to the first question of the hon. Member, that the Royal Assent had been given to the Bill of the Canadian Parliament. In answering the second question now put to him he should be very sorry to give in an authoritative manner, any opinion on a point of law beset with many difficulties, and respecting which the greatest lawyers constantly differed. He, of course, alluded to the status of the Church of England in the Colonies and the condition of the Royal Prerogative in reference to that Church. He might, however, state that in passing this Bill the Assembly of Canada conceived they were vesting the appointment of Colonial Bishops in this Synod; and also that in advising the Crown to assent to the measure he had done so under the distinct impression, which he still retained, that the power of appointing those Bishops was vested by the Act in the Synod, as constituted under its provisions.

SAVINGS BANKS—QUESTION.

MR. BAGWELL said, he would beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer in what manner he proposes to deal with the existing Auditors of such Savings Banks as may become Government Security Savings Banks, in the event of the Savings Banks Bill, as amended, becoming law.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he thought it would be premature to give any answer to the question of the hon. Member until the Bill had made further progress.

EDUCATION—QUESTION.

MR. W. EWART said, he wished to inquire of the Vice President of the Board of Education, whether it is intended to make any statement this year on the progress and prospects of Education, as agreed on and begun in former years.

MR. COWPER said, that on proposing the Education Vote he would explain the results of the expenditure already made by the nation on behalf of Education, and the grounds on which the Estimate for the present year had been prepared, and would also endeavour to state what might be expected from the Vote.

POOR LAW MEDICAL OFFICERS.

QUESTION.

In answer to Sir JOHN TROLLOPE,

MR. BOUVERIE said, in accordance with the recommendations of the Committee which some time since inquired into the subject, an order had recently been issued by the Poor Law Board directing that the appointments of Medical Officers to Poor Law Unions should be made permanent. Their salaries were fixed by the Poor Law Guardians, and the funds from which they were paid were partly the rates levied in their districts, and partly from a Vote of that House. In those cases in which the remuneration was extremely low the Poor Law Board endeavoured to procure an addition to it, but he was sorry to say that, generally speaking, the Poor Law Guardians were not disposed to agree with the Poor Law Board as to the propriety of such addition. Unless the Poor Law Board entered into a violent contest with the Boards of Guardians on that subject—which he was not at all prepared to do—it would be very difficult to obtain an increase of the salaries. He ought at the same time to state that, in a great number of Unions, the medical officers were sufficiently remunerated. There could be no doubt that the great body of them discharged their duties with fidelity and diligence. Any one acquainted with the present operation of the Poor Law must admit that a great improvement had been effected in the administration of medical relief to the poor. He could not, however, hold out any hopes to the medical officers that their salaries would be increased by means of an increased Vote of that House, because the House had been reluctant to grant even the usual Vote under the head of Poor Law Medical Relief. As occasion permitted, the area within which the medical officers had to discharge their duties would be diminished.

GROWTH OF COTTON IN INDIA.

QUESTION.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON said, he wished to be informed by the hon. Member for Devonport of the day on which he proposed to resume the adjourned debate on the growth of Cotton in India?

SIR ERSKINE PERRY said, the adjourned debate was fixed for Tuesday next, but the Business Paper for that night was already so full of Notices and Motions on other subjects that it was impossible to hope that the adjourned debate could be then resumed. The first open Tuesday was the 23rd of July. The only other day open to private Members was Wednesday; but Wednesdays were so occupied by the hon. and learned Member for Ayr (Mr. Craufurd), that it was impossible to resume the debate on a Wednesday. Unless, therefore, the noble Lord at the head of the Government would give up a Government night for the discussion of the cotton-growing question, he was afraid that nothing more could be said upon it during the present Session.

LORD ADOLPHUS VANE-TEMPEST said, he would beg to ask the noble Lord at the head of the Government whether he was prepared to set apart a day for the resumption of the debate?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I feel great interest in that debate, and am anxious that those hon. Gentlemen who have not spoken should have an opportunity of expressing their sentiments and discussing the whole question. But I am afraid that at this period of the Session it will be quite impossible to give a day for that purpose. Indeed, any promise that I could make of that sort is already mortgaged to the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich (Sir J. Pakington) on the subject of Education.

LORD ADOLPHUS VANE-TEMPEST said: Are we, then, to understand that the adjournment of the debate was a mere mockery?

MR. HADFIELD said, he wished to know whether, as Her Majesty's Ministers will be at Manchester on Tuesday next, there will be a sitting of the House that day?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: The Secretary of State for the Home Department will be in attendance upon her Majesty at Manchester on Tuesday, and I have received a very kind invitation from Manchester, of which I will avail myself; but we shall be the only Members absent, and that will not, I apprehend, prevent the House from going on with the business on Tuesday.

OATHS BILL.

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made and Question proposed "That the Bill be now read the Third Time."

THE MARQUESS OF BLANDFORD: *
Sir, in rising to oppose the further progress of this Measure through the House, I feel that it will not be necessary for me to enter generally upon the subject of the admission of the Jews to Parliament. That subject has already been well and ably discussed; it has engaged to the fullest possible extent the attention of the House, and therefore it will only be necessary for me to make a few brief remarks on this occasion. I can only say with reference to that subject, that there is one consideration above every other which makes me feel that the admission of Jews to Parliament is a measure to which this House ought not to agree. That consideration is, as we should never forget, and as it is expressed in all our public acts and documents, that the Crown of this realm is held "by the grace of God." Now this expression does not mean a mere abstract notion of the Divine being, but the Christian idea of God in and through the name of our Lord Jesus Christ. We meet in Parliament and in this House by the authority of the Crown, to pass those acts which are necessary for the government of the country. That Crown is not held independently, but dependently—dependently upon that Holy Being whose name I have mentioned; therefore Parliament ought, in like manner, to possess the same character and attribute of Christianity as the Crown. It has been said that we are infringing the doctrine of charity by not allowing the Jew to sit in Parliament, and I remember that some years ago, the noble Lord the Member for London drew attention to the beautiful parable of the good Samaritan, as an illustration of charity, and an example which we should follow. It was indeed the highest illustration that could be given of a virtue so divine. But is there not a fallacy in the use of this illustration? The divine rule is, that charity worketh no ill to one's neighbour, and can it be said that in asserting and maintaining the Christian character of this assembly we are "working any ill" to our neighbour? Charity is in truth a divine virtue. It is a virtue, let us never forget, which proceeds from that very Being whose name it is now proposed to ignore in order to the exercise of that virtue. My object then in rising to oppose this Bill is, that the true character of the Measure should be known and clearly understood before it is sent up to receive judgment in another House. Sir, the Bill on its second reading was not opposed, and I think so far justly. There are acknowledged inconveniences in the existing oath. Nobody denies that there are some portions of it which might well be omitted; but I regret to say that under the colour of such objections, the attempt has been made to destroy the Christian character of the legislature. It is said, "Here is an oath, the great bulk of which is nonsense; therefore let us do away with the nonsense." Upon that point we are all agreed; but, at the same time, whilst doing away with the nonsense, you have been doing away with the sense, and also with that which, to the consciences of vast numbers of people in the country, is an essential element in the constitution. The object of the Bill is said to be the admission of the Jews to Parliament, but before it proceeds to the other House, let us maturely consider what is its true character—what is its real nature. In the first place, it proposes to abolish the existing oaths of supremacy, allegiance, and abjuration, and to substitute another oath in their stead. Now, we have an instance on record within a very recent date, of the substitution of one oath for another; I allude to the Roman Catholic oath; and I will ask the House to go with me for a few moments into a comparison of the Roman Catholic oath, with the oath which it is now proposed to substitute for the three old oaths. When the Roman Catholic oath was framed, those three points of supremacy, allegiance, and protestation to maintain the established religion of the country were condensed into it. The words of the oath are these—
Sir Erskine Perry

"I do hereby disclaim, disavow, and solemnly abjure any intention to subvert the present Church Establishment, as settled by law within this realm; and I do solemnly swear that I will not exercise any privilege to which I am or may become entitled, to disturb or weaken the Protestant religion and Protestant government of the United Kingdom.

The first part of the Roman Catholic oath is an avowal of allegiance to the Sovereign; then comes an acknowledgment of the temporal supremacy of the Sovereign; and lastly, there is the declaration to maintain the national religion of the country. Now, what do we find in the oath proposed by the Bill? There is only one point introduced into the oath; it is that of allegiance or supremacy, for they are much about the same. There is not one word about the maintenance of the national religion. In the former oath, which was taken by Protestants, there are certainly no express words to be used binding them to maintain the Christian religion; but when every person who came to that table to be sworn, was obliged in your presence, Sir, to declare that he took the oath "upon the true faith of a Christian," did he not thereby, whatever might be his own feelings—whether he took the oath in sincerity or not, or with contention and insincerity—make public profession that he was a Christian? and what Christian is there that would wish to overturn the Christian religion? Therefore, I say that the old oath did maintain the essential point; the declaration that a national religion exists in the country. And in saying this, I do not speak of the Established Church alone. Far be it from me to suppose for one moment that the religion of the country is confined to that church. Attached as I am to the Established Church, I thank God that the religion of the land is not confined to it. There are varieties of opinion; there are different conformations of the human mind; and it is not to be supposed that in a day of intelligence like the present, every man's mind can be brought to agree to one uniform model in religion, or that one scheme of ecclesiastical government would suit every person. But, independently of that, the established religion is not the only religion of the country. [A cheer from the Roman Catholic benches.] I quite understand that cheer. Still, I believe that the established religion of this country is the most noble, the most ancient, the most estimable institution in the land. But the religion of the country is seated in the hearts of the people, and in their convictions of the truth: it is to that, then, we must look for the maintenance of the national religion. Now, that national religion, though deep-rooted in the hearts of the people, may have its foundations weakened: and how are those foundations most likely to be weakened? It is, first, by abolishing your forms. The abolition of your forms produces forgetfulness of the things for which those forms were instituted. There is every likelihood that in the engagements of every-day life, varied and complicated as they are, the national faith and piety may grow cold if these symbols cease to exist. Is not a form useful? To what do we owe the solemnity of our own proceedings, if not to forms? I remember, Sir, when your predecessor in that chair made a speech which came home to the hearts and feelings of all who heard it; he said that he had endeavoured to maintain the dignity and the privileges of the House, and at the same time to preserve those forms which he felt were essential to the character and conduct of the proceedings and business of the House. Why is the mace placed upon that table? Is it not as a symbol of the power of the House? And so there resides in these forms a power and a virtue which perhaps may not at first be perceived or apprehended, but which are not the less permanent and important. I say, therefore, that although the religion of the country may be deeply seated in the hearts of the people, it is still essential to maintain certain forms; and when should those forms be maintained if it be not when a Member comes to be sworn at the table, and enters for the first time upon the performance of those important duties upon the proper and efficient discharge of which the prosperity of the country rests. Should he not at such a moment be called upon to say, that the national religion of the country is an important element in its prosperity, and that, in order to secure that prosperity, he will faithfully maintain the religion upon which it depends? My first objection to the Bill then is that, professing as it does to concentrate into one all former oaths, it omits all reference to religion; and that any infidel, any Mahomedan, any person who acknowledges the bare abstract idea of a Supreme Governor of the Universe, might take the new oath with impunity. My second objection to the Bill is, that it differs from every other Bill, with one exception, that has ever been introduced to this House upon the authority of Her Majesty's Government, the exception being the Bill of 1854, which was very properly rejected by the House. If the House will allow me, then, I will briefly remind it of the nature of the Bills which have been introduced since the year 1847. In that year the noble Lord the Member for the city of London brought in a Bill to admit Jews to Parliament; but did he propose to alter the oath as taken by Christians? No. It was only in the case of the Jews that he proposed to omit the words "upon the true faith of a Christian." In 1849 the noble Lord brought in another Bill, by which he proposed to alter the oath as regarded Peers and Members of Parliament only; but he retained the words "upon the true faith of a Christian," except in the case of the Jews. In the Bill of 1850 the noble Lord simply omitted the words "upon the true faith of a Christian" in the case of a Jew. In the Bill of 1851, the same provision was proposed. In the Bill of 1853 the noble Lord proposed to omit the words "upon the true faith of a Christian" in the case of Jews, and the Jews were by that Bill excluded from holding certain offices. But in 1854, the noble Lord, fatigued probably by his numerous and ineffectual attempts, thought that the best plan would be to make a dash at the subject at once. He proposed, therefore, to abolish all existing oaths, and introduce a merely secular, and if I may so term it, an infidel oath. [Cries of "Oh!"] Well, that is a strong expression, I admit; but I am sure hon. Members will give me credit for not wishing to say anything offensive as to the intentions of the introducer. I merely state that, as the effect of the oath. The noble Lord, however, in that year, proposed to introduce an oath of that nature, and we find that the House of Commons rejected it by a majority of 251 to 247. The House of Commons, which had triumphantly carried the noble Lord through all his previous measures, and which measures had only been stopped by the House of Lords, perceived at once what was the nature of that Bill, itself put a stop to the proceeding, and thereby declared that it would not be deprived of that symbol by which the national religion had been maintained. Now, I believe, that I can ask the noble Lord the Member for London for his support on the present occasion. The noble Lord is anxious for the admission of Jews to Parliament; indeed, it seems to be his main idea. He wishes to see a civil disability done away with in the case of the Jew; but I feel sure he does not desire to reduce this House to a mere secular assembly. He does not wish to do away with all the glorious traditions of English history which show that the prosperity of the nation is indissolubly bound up with the preservation of its religion, and place us upon the footing of an infidel assembly in a continental country. I should weary the House if I were to enumerate all the Acts of the Legislature which would illustrate the fact that the maintenance of Christianity is an essential element in the laws of this country; but it has been said that the words "upon the true faith of a Christian," are accidentally the cause of excluding the Jews from Parliament.

I shall not, however, go into that subject at the present moment. I feel that this is not the time again to enter upon that long-exhausted question. What I want to show is this, and what I wish the House to believe is this—that there never was a period when some Christian symbols were not required to be exhibited by Members of the Legislature. Long before the words “upon the true faith of a Christian” were introduced, the Act of Elizabeth required oaths to be taken corporally on the Gospels. An Act of James the First did the same thing. And then, coming to the Republican Parliament, when a monarch had lost his throne and his life, this House resolved that every Member should take an oath that he would maintain the true Protestant—ay, and not only true Protestant, inasmuch as there might have been a cause for that, for we were then at daggers drawn with Popery—but the “true Protestant Christian religion of the country.” Why was the word “Christian” put in that oath? Because upon the true Protestant Christian religion, “in the purity thereof,” depended the welfare and prosperity of the nation. Than this there can be no more impregnable evidence that Christianity—and not Protestantism alone—was that which was meant to be maintained. Next we come to the declaration which was instituted against Transubstantiation. It may be said that that was a mere feud between Protestantism and Popery; but by whom was that declaration to be taken? By those who could say, “I do solemnly declare that I do believe that in the Sacrament of the Lord’s Supper there is no Transubstantiation.” It was an affirmation; a declaration of belief that there is no Transubstantiation. That is to say, that the person making it believed in the Sacrament, but not in Transubstantiation. We then come to the 12th & 13th Will. III., enacting the Oath of Abjuration; and from that time to the present, words have been inserted in the Parliamentary Oaths which maintain the Christianity of the Legislature. Now, let us consider for a moment the position in which we are placed, and I readily acquit the noble Lord and Her Majesty’s Government of being aware of the extreme gravity of their proceedings. I believe that they have been actuated by the desire to see the Jews admitted to this House, and that they believe the easiest and readiest mode of doing so is to omit the words “upon the true faith of a Christian.” But what have they done? They seem to forget that they change those constitutional forms which are of immense weight and inconceivable importance to the destiny and prosperity of the country; and, indeed, I doubt very much whether they are acting constitutionally in what they are doing. We are bound by the Act of Succession, the 12th & 13th Will. III., to maintain a Protestant King or Queen upon the throne of this country; and we are so bound for no other purpose than that the religion of England may be secured. It is in times of danger and the extremity of suffering that our best and noblest nature shines forth. Those who have been brought face to face with danger know well the securities which are needed to protect them from its recurrence, and it was not without reason that the men of those days, who had seen their prosperity falling from under them, who had engaged in mortal strife in order to maintain their religion and their Protestantism, and been brought in direct antagonism and conflict with the Crown, imposed those securities for the abolition of which the noble Lord at the head of the Government is paving the way. I will now read to the House the 4th section of the 12 & 13 Will. III., the Act of Succession, which runs in these terms:—

“And whereas the laws of England are the birthright of the people thereof, and all the Kings and Queens who shall ascend the throne of this realm ought to administer the Government of the same according to the said laws, and all their Ministers and officers ought to serve them respectively according to the same; the said Lords Spiritual and Temporal and Commons do therefore further humbly pray that all the laws and statutes of this realm for securing the established religion and the rights and liberties of the people thereof, and all other laws and statutes of the same now in force, may be ratified and confirmed, and the same are confirmed accordingly.”

By what mode could we more efficiently secure the maintenance of the established religion in this country than the taking of an oath to maintain it by every Member who enters the walls of Parliament. Yet the noble Lord proposes to abandon that oath altogether. The preamble to the Act by which the oath of abjuration is enacted, the 12 & 13 of Will. III., c. 6, shows the importance which was attached in those days to the securities that then existed; for after reciting that the French King had violated the Acts of Succession, it declared that upon these Acts the safety of the King’s royal person and government, the continuance of the monarchy of England, the preservation of the Protestant religion, the maintenance of the Church of England, and the security of the ancient and undoubted rights and liberties, and the future peace and tranquillity of the kingdom, did under God entirely depend. That was the sense entertained in those times by the men who drew up the statute of what was necessary for the maintenance of the prosperity and liberties of the kingdom. It was thought that that prosperity and those liberties did depend on the Acts then in existence, one essential feature of which was that an oath should be taken, binding the person taking it to maintain the established religion of the country, and at the same time prohibiting by a statute, which is still unrepealed, any Minister of the Crown from proposing any alterations in those Acts. I would now make a few remarks with respect to the last clauses contained in the Bill, and which have been introduced upon the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Horsham. Whatever its character, the Bill was, at any rate, before the adoption of those clauses, a unique piece of legislation; but by accepting those clauses, the noble Lord has himself placed a condemnation on the Bill. It is now declared that the Bill shall not extend to enable any person or persons professing the Jewish religion to hold or exercise certain high offices. And why not? Why are persons who profess the Jewish religion not to exercise those offices?

Let me have an answer to that question. I shall be told, that it is because the Roman Catholics do not hold them. Well, they do not. And why? Because it is supposed that they might exercise in those offices an influence adverse to the Protestant character of the State. Then there is this inconsistency involved; that you will allow persons to fill a legislative position, and make the laws which are necessary for the government of the country, but will not allow them to execute or administer those laws.

When it was formerly objected that Jews should be allowed to fill posts in corporations, Sir Robert Peel said that the Jews would have therein only an executive position, that they would only have to execute the laws, and would be confined within the limits of those laws. But the present Bill reverses that system, for whilst it excludes the Jews from an executive position, it gives them a seat in the Legislature. Inconsistency, I say, is stamped on the very face of this proposition; but there is yet a further inconsistency. The Roman Catholic is excluded from these offices, and at the same time holds a seat in the Le-gisature; there is no inconsistency, however, in giving him a seat in the Legislature, because his oath binds him not to do anything to subvert the established religion of the country. But this is not to be the case with the Jew. By your Bill you say to the Jew, "You are not fit to hold these offices; your religion incapacitates you from doing so; yet we will give you a seat in the Legislative Assembly, and we will bind you by no oath, no tie, no obligation, to maintain in that assembly the established religion of the country. Sir, I cannot conceive a greater inconsistency than that. The religion of this country is, that which has brought it through mighty and terrible struggles. The Parliament of this country has achieved great and glorious triumphs. It has curbed the disposition of the Crown at a time when it might have been prejudicial to the State. It has recovered itself from a line of monarchy and republicanism. It has maintained that established religion which was torn out, as it were, from the centre of an adverse creed. It has done all this as a Christian Parliament, with the recognition of the great and holy name of Him who is the Prince of the kings of the earth. And now if it rejects that name, if it repudiates that profession, and if it forsakes that covenant, it will be forsaking, repudiating, and rejecting the fountain of its wisdom, and of the strength and prosperity of the nation. I beg to move as an Amendment that the Bill be read a third time on this day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and, at the end of the Question, to add the words, "upon this day six months."

MR. DRUMMOND* said, he was so sensible of the deference which ought to be paid to the decided opinion of that Assembly, that he felt an apology to be due for offering at the last stage of this extraordinary Bill his utmost opposition to it. He did not think there ever was a Bill attended by more extraordinary circumstances, for it was a Bill which had no other object than that of admitting Baron Rothschild to a seat in that House, and it contained not a single word respecting, or the most distant allusion to, the Jews. He did not know what meaning the House might extract from the Bill, but in itself there was no proposition of the sort. Two collateral issues had been raised in the course of the discussion on the Bill, one of which was the respect due to the expression of opinion by the citizens of London, to which, however, he confessed he paid no respect at all, because, in the first instance, this Jew was returned as an intentional insult to this House and to Christianity. Whether he was right or wrong in this opinion, he admitted that it was not a motive which should influence the decision of that House. The other issue which had been raised was the personal character of the individual concerned. He had not the honour of his acquaintance, but he had received many acts of kindness from members of his family in various parts of Europe, and should be most happy to requite the favours received by doing any service in his power to him. He did not think, however, that this was a reason why he should give his vote for the present Bill. He differed, also, from those who opposed the third reading of the Bill on the ground that it would unchristianize this House, because he did not think that any such Bill would have been brought in or entertained had not the House been already unchristianized. That expression, no doubt, required explanation. He opposed the Bill as an effect and not a cause. They had by their liberalism completely obliterated all the essential principles which had hitherto guided this country in ecclesiastical and political matters. He would only take the case referred to by the hon. Gentleman behind him (Mr. Kinglake); when the Amendment was introduced by the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite, he very properly said, "If you want a religious test, why not appeal to your Bishops in the other House? What is the use of having Bishops in the Legislature, if it be not to give you right directions on Christian principles? Why do you not appeal to them?" The answer to that was, that if they were appealed to they would be sure to have six on one side and six on the other. The whole system of ecclesiastical authority was come to an end, so much so, indeed, that there were even differences of episcopal opinion with regard to the validity of the sacraments upon which the Church rested. What else did they see? Whilst the enormous Cathedral of St. Paul's was empty, and the Abbey at Westminster was empty, the Bishops were conducting worship in an unconsecrated concert room, and afterwards had the impudence to go down to the country and fight with Dissenters about consecrated and unconsecrated burial grounds. Why, that very night, a notice of Motion had been given for the issue of a Commission to inquire respecting the adaptation of the Liturgy to present circumstances—as if the rites of God's worship changed with every variation of man's fancies. He knew nothing equal to that, except what had been put into his hand yesterday by a gentleman, and that was a prayer in verse, addressed to our Lord, begging him to intercede for the Devil. Could liberalism go beyond that? That he supposed was tearing off the last rag of intolerance. He wished to God that they were as true to their faith as the Jews were to theirs; but they had ceased to know, and ceased to believe, that "there is but one name given under heaven whereby any man can be saved."

With respect to the present Bill, he would do with the Jews precisely what they would do with him; and again he said, he wished that we "who profess and call ourselves Christians" were as true to our faith as the Jews were to theirs. They had faith in the destiny of their nation. They believed that they should yet have all the promises which had been made to them fulfilled. They believed that they should yet trample the nations like ashes under their feet, and that not one jot or tittle of all that had been promised to them should fail till all be fulfilled. They know full well that the circumcised cannot mingle with the baptized. They would not admit one of the baptized into their Sanhedrim. Neither ought we, in his opinion, to admit one of the circumcised into our Sanhedrim. The baptized could not rise till the circumcised fell. And now, mark! mark the historical fact! The Founder of our religion was a Jew—a circumcised Jew. He had the same attachment to His land and to His people that we have to our country. He "lived by faith," it is said, and He watched the "signs of the times," in order to be instructed by them. There came one day to a follower of His a certain Heathen, who said he wanted to speak to his Master. The follower, astonished, went and told another follower, and they two went to the Saviour. What did He say? Did he say, as on every other occasion, "What does this man want? How can I serve him?—Is he sick? I will heal him!—Is he hungry? I will feed him! Send him to me, and in some way I will bless him!" No; he took no notice of them. But He said, "Father, the hour is come!" What was that hour? The hour when the circumcised were to be utterly destroyed—nation, temple, worship, and all ; and when He himself, as a Jew, was also to be put to death. If the circumcised were to become members of that Government which was the purest—and by purest he meant the most in accordance with the mind and purpose, rule, and kingdom of God—which had ever been established on the earth, he would say, “Take care; look you sharply about you ; for the Jews are going to arise, and I will not venture to prophesy what may happen to you.”

THE O'DONAGHOE wished to make a few observations upon a measure in which his constituents as well as the people of Ireland generally were greatly interested. He would vote against the third reading of the Bill because he regarded it as partial and unjust, inasmuch as it denied to Roman Catholics the rights which would be extended to Jews. The ostensible object of the measure was the advancement of civil and religious liberty ; its covert, although paramount object was the admission of a few Jews to Parliament. In considering the construction of the forms of oath hitherto established it had occurred to him that their framers must have laboured under an infatuation that by a jumble of sounding but superfluous phrases the devil might be outwitted. When this Bill was introduced he (the O'Donaghoe) indulged the hope that henceforth common sense was to supersede prejudice, but that expectation was at once disappointed when he came down to the last clause, which by depriving the measure of a liberal and comprehensive character transformed it into a mere Ministerial job. The Government justified the introduction of this Bill on the ground that it would promote the interests of civil and religious liberty. Jews could not sit in that House because the Legislature required them to utter the words “on the true faith of a Christian.” The Government had very properly resolved to remove this difficulty, arguing, he supposed, that it was not right to deprive Jews of the benefit of representation when the only impediment to their enjoyment of the privilege was a formula which could be dispensed with without any material evils resulting either religiously or politically. The words “on the true faith of a Christian” were to be omitted from the oath because they were considered unnecessary. This was a Christian country, with a Christian Legislature, and the House had been reminded that the Jews did not belong to a sect which was indifferent on religious questions, but that they believed their creed was the only true faith, and they held that their race and religion would one day be in the ascendant, and would triumph over the institutions which were based upon Christianity. Notwithstanding these considerations, however, the noble Lord (Lord John Russell) had devised a scheme by which the doors of that House would be thrown open to the Jews, and he placed them on a footing of perfect equality with the great majority of the rest of Her Majesty's subjects. To that he (the O'Donaghoe) did not object—he called the country and all Europe to witness the homage which was paid to the conscientious convictions of the Jew—but he complained of the measure because it refused equal rights to the Roman Catholics. The Government was perfectly aware that the Roman Catholics protested against that portion of the Act of 1829 which related to the form of oath to be taken by them, and all they asked was to be placed upon a footing of equality with the rest of the community. He wished, therefore, to hear from the Government—they had not given it yet—some sound and sufficient reason for making an exception in the case of Roman Catholics. It was said that the Act of 1829 was a final settlement, and that no attempt ought to be made to disturb it ; but he submitted that the framers of that Act did not entertain quite perfect ideas of civil and religious liberty, to judge from the changes which it had been found necessary to make in the provisions of the measure. In 1829 the Roman Catholics might very properly accept the proposition offered by the spirit of intolerance, which said, “Agree to this proposal or you shall have no political existence ;” but it was in his opinion a very different thing for Roman Catholic Members of that House to sanction by their votes a measure which endeavoured to stain the sanctity of their religion by false and unseemly imputations. In 1829 it was felt that a dangerous experiment was about to be made. It was predicted that from the moment when the first Roman Catholic representative set his face within that House the constitution was doomed. Since the passing of the Emancipation Act nearly thirty years had elapsed, and a great number of Roman Catholics had sat in that House. What had been the general tenor of their conduct? Had they not been the constant friends of progress, whether it was political, civil, or religious? Were they found in the ranks of those who opposed the removal of the restrictions on trade, or the removal of the Jewish disabilities? Had they done anything which proved they were unworthy to sit in that House, or not entitled to a full and equal share in all the blessings of its enlightened legislation? [Cries of "Divide!"] He perceived the House was extremely impatient to go to a division, and he should merely say further that if the noble Lord at the head of the Government could be held to what he said—which, of course, he could not—it would be imperative on him to include the Roman Catholics at once in this Bill. The noble Lord the other night, when replying to the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Eunniskillen (Mr. Whiteside), said that the House was not a religious but a political assembly, and that sentiment was loudly cheered by an overwhelming majority of that House. He would admit that he had himself cheered the sentiment, though he doubted the noble Lord's sincerity; but the inference he (the O'Donoghoe) drew from it was, that religion had nothing to do with a man's politics. Let the House mark the inconsistency of the noble Lord. In the same breath in which the noble Lord gave utterance to that opinion he called on the House to exclude the Roman Catholics from the benefits of the Bill because of their religion. He would add, that unless the noble Lord or some Member of the Government, gave a promise that next Session he would bring in a Bill to remedy the defects of this measure, and thus put the Roman Catholic subjects on a footing of perfect equality with the rest of the community, he should deem it his duty to vote against the third reading of the Bill. He was aware it was said that any one who opposed this Bill voted against the admission of Jews to Parliament, and therefore violated the principle of civil and religious liberty. His answer was, that if by voting against the Bill he violated the principle of civil and religious liberty that principle, as the Bill stood, was violated in his own person and in the persons of his co-religionists, and that if he supported such a measure he would be unworthy of the confidence reposed in him by his constituents, whose religion, he might say, was the glory and characteristic of their nation.

MR. BALL, who spoke amid continued cries for a division, was understood to say that he had endured for a great portion of his life a very considerable degree of unkindness from those connected with him on account of his religious opinions, and he had therefore determined never to inflict on any man any disqualification or censure because he held opinions different from his. On that ground he came forward to the rescue of his brethren, the Jews. Since the real question before them was how they might frame an oath that should be obligatory on the conscience of the man who was to take it, common sense would dictate that it should be framed in accordance with the man's belief and conscience; but the Jews showed that they were conscientious by the scruples they felt in taking the existing oath, and why should an oath not be framed such as would be binding on them? It was said that the Jews were so peculiar a race and so dissociated from us, and his creed so opposed to ours, that we had nothing in common with him. But he thought that they had very much in common with the Jew; he thought that they owed very much to the Jew. The Commandments, which we regarded as obligatory on us, we received through the Jews, and were equally binding on them; and when we praised our Maker, it was in the language of the Jewish temple. We had, therefore, great affinity and fellowship with the Jews. There were two classes of persons who might be conceived as using the argument that this Bill would unchristianize the assembly. He could conceive of religious persons with a tender conscience fearing the change which they expected from this Bill. But there were many that used this objection to the Bill who knew nothing of Christianity whatever. He would tell such that it was impossible for any man to make or to unmake a Christian; that was a character which came from above. But if the admission of Jews into the House were to unchristianize it, was not the evil already done? Were there not Jewish subjects and Jewish magistrates—those who obeyed the law and those who administered it—and might not such be admitted to consider of the making of the law? The objection seemed to him to be absurd. [Renewed cries of "Divide!"] He felt that in delivering his sentiments he was offending many of his constituents, and it was with much hesitation that he addressed the House; and he therefore thought the House should not refuse him the opportunity of explaining the reasons which had influenced him in the vote he was about to give. But, for his own part, there was One above all constituencies, whom he thought it is duty to obey. He reminded the House that other nations had admitted the Jews to the highest offices in the State, and that, so far from being displeasing to the Almighty, seemed to be the occasion of his blessing those nations. [Renewed confusion.] He admitted the sincerity of his Friends on the right (the Conservative opposition) in opposing this Bill; he asked them to believe that he also was sincere in supporting it.

MR. DILLWYN, who also spoke amid much confusion, supported the Bill on the principle that religious opinion should no longer be a disqualification for a seat in that House. He did not believe it was a measure to meet a particular case, but a protest against the intolerance he had mentioned. He objected, however, to the clauses which had been introduced since the introduction into that House, as being entirely antagonistic to what he understood to be the principle of the Bill, and he was very much disappointed to find that the Government had accepted them. He could very well understand why the Roman Catholics should be excluded from certain high offices in the State; but there was no relativity between the exclusion of the Jews and the Roman Catholics. The first was excluded on account of religion; the second, not because of his religion alone, but because he owed a divided allegiance; for, while they held the Queen to be supreme in civil matters, they owned another head in respect of spiritual matters. Much as he regretted the introduction of the clauses to which he had alluded, he still did not think that a reason sufficient for voting against the third reading of the Bill.

MR. COLLINS should have been content with giving a silent vote, but having supported in Committee to no purpose the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Cork, and also to no purpose the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Stamford, he had a double reason to be dissatisfied with the Bill as it stood. The noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston) while repealing three oaths, retained a fourth upon the Statute-book, and against this separate oath for Roman Catholics he protested. ["Divide! Divide!"]. [The hon. Gentleman proceeded to comment on various parts of the oaths, but the indescribable uproar which prevailed in the House, and which was most perseveringly kept up by a body of Members below the bar, rendered it impossible to gather with any certainty the general purport of his remarks.] He was, however, understood to say that to strike out the passage directed against treason and regicide, as being offensive to Protestants, and yet to retain it in the oath administered to Roman Catholics, was an insult to the latter, and about as just a proceeding as it would be to require one set of Members to swear that they would never steal or purloin, while everybody else was exempted from such a degrading ceremony. He felt the most profound pity for the Liberal who had such bowels of mercy for the Jew, but none for his fellow Christian.

MR. BOWYER rose to address the House, but the cries for a division were so incessant that the beginning of his speech was inaudible. The hon. and learned Member was understood to say, that as he knew the House was impatient for a division, he would not detain it more than a few minutes. He intended to vote against this Bill, and felt bound to state the grounds of his opposition. The Roman Catholic Members were accused of illiberality for resisting this measure. What occurred in the year 1829, when Catholic Emancipation was passed? Not one Catholic sat in either House of Parliament at that time, or was a party to the settlement—if settlement it was—which was then made. The Roman Catholics were obliged to accept what the Legislature had done without their having any voice in the matter. But they were now, for the first time, called upon by their votes to say that the oath forced upon them in 1829 was right and necessary. That he was not prepared to admit. Hence his opposition to this Bill. The measure did not merely leave the Catholics where they now stood. The fifth clause of the Bill expressly enacted that the Roman Catholic oath should be retained unaltered; they were, therefore, to vote that the Catholic oath should remain unchanged, and if they did so, they would be re-affirming and re-enacting that oath. The Catholic oath was absurd and nugatory—far more absurd and nugatory than Protestants supposed. It did not even fulfil the purpose for which it was intended. It did not deny the doctrines which they intended that Catholics should deny. It was a mockery and a profanation—[Here the hon. Gentleman was again interrupted by cries and confusion: Mr. SPEAKER ordered the bar to be cleared, and order was gradually restored.] Mr. Bowyer was then heard to ask whether any Roman Catholic could in honesty, or on his honour, as a gentleman who believed in the religion he professed, be a party to imposing on members of his own or of other persuasions an oath which denied the spiritual jurisdiction of the Vicar of Christ in this country—one of the most fundamental doctrines of his church? and concluded by expressing his determination to vote against the Bill.

MR. DEASY, amid continued interruption, said, that the course which he intended to take differed to a considerable extent from that suggested by the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk. It was with the deepest regret that he said he could not vote for the third reading of the Bill. He regretted to withhold his support from it, because its immediate effect would be the removal of disabilities which had been unjustly imposed upon a class of his fellow-subjects, and because he knew it was approved by Liberal Members of that House with whom it was his most anxious desire to co-operate on all occasions. But he regarded this as a measure which would create for the first time a new and invidious distinction between the Roman Catholic subjects of Her Majesty and those belonging to other persuasions. And that distinction was rendered so clear and pointed by the speech of the noble Lord on the introduction of the Bill that it was impossible to overlook it. As such, he (Mr. Deasy) knew it was regarded by many persons in Ireland, for whose opinions he entertained the greatest respect. But he could not bring himself to the course suggested by the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk, namely, that of voting against the Bill, because he did not wish to offer the slightest obstacle to the removal of unjust restrictions. He would, therefore, neither support nor oppose the Bill.

topol. There were between 2,000 and 3,000 seamen who had worked the guns on the shore batteries, and who had been exposed to all the dangers and hardships that the army had experienced, and perhaps even in a greater degree. Their services had been continued throughout the whole of the siege; and there was therefore a more thorough identification of the army and navy upon that occasion than had ever taken place before; and he was sure if there were to be a large preponderance of the army present at the distribution that they would all feel the greatest disappointment at not being accompanied by as many as possible of the sister service. So much for the navy; but he regretted also that several regiments were to be absent which might very easily have been brought up either wholly or in detachments, and which would have added distinction to the proceedings. He knew, for example, that there was one battalion at Alderhot which had lost eight officers at Inkerman. The 88th was at Aldershot yesterday; the 19th was there; the 97th, which headed the storming party at the Redan, was there, and the 3rd battalion of Grenadier Guards, which served throughout the whole campaign, was at Windsor. He thought that these regiments, or, at all events, the medal and clasp men, might have been brought up to share in that magnificent spectacle, which would probably never be repeated in this country. The House, perhaps, might not be aware that by the terms of the Victoria Warrant the Commander in Chief on the spot in future would give the cross on the field where it was won, and consequently it could rarely if ever be given personally by the Sovereign again. This, therefore, was a most peculiar occasion, and if it could possibly have been managed, he should have been very anxious that all the regiments not too far removed from London should have participated in the brilliant spectacle.

ADMIRAL DUNCOMBE expressed his gratification at the remarks of the gallant General who had just sat down, and his regret that the arrangements on behalf of the navy were so mean.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he was glad the hon. and gallant Member had taken up the subject. Her Majesty's Government were without excuse, for the hon. and gallant officer had pointed out that the regiments near town could readily have been brought up: he understood that it was proposed to bring up the 79th Highlanders from Shorncliffe to be present—the regiment in which the present Minister for War had served—for, although the noble Lord had not much experience as a soldier, he had, he believed, been a captain in the 79th. The casualties of that regiment in the Crimea, however, had been very small. Of course the gallantry of that regiment was too well known for him to say anything, for a moment, depreciatory of its high character; but it so happened that in the Crimea only one officer and eight rank and file belonging to it had been killed, and two officers, seven sergeants, and fifty-two rank and file wounded; while the 88th Connaught Rangers, which was not to be present at the distribution, had had killed in action six officers, seven sergeants, and sixty-two rank and file; and eighteen officers, twenty-seven sergeants, two drummers, and 332 rank and file severely wounded. That regiment had been suddenly ordered to Portsmouth, but there was no necessity for such a sudden removal of the 88th, and they might very easily, and at a small expense, have been brought to London. As for the 79th, he saw no reason why they should be present at the distribution, unless it were that the attractive nature of their dress entitled them to a prominent place in the spectacle. He thought that this was a piece of favouritism which the House ought to discountenance.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE said, it appeared to him that, whenever these great national reviews took place, they seemed to create more jealousy and dissatisfaction than if they were not to occur at all. The naval review of last year gave very little satisfaction, he believed, to the Members of the House of Commons; but he thought that the hon. and gallant Admiral opposite (Admiral Walcott) had been a little hard upon the Admiralty with regard to their arrangements. Having any great body of sailors present at a review would be, in his opinion, as much out of place as an Admiral on horseback, or a body of infantry at a naval review. How were they to manage a large body of sailors there? [Admiral WALCOTT: I did not ask for a large body.] The thing was impossible. One hundred men had been ordered up to represent the navy, and the gallant Admiral must know the serious inconvenience to the fleet of having a large body of sailors in Hyde Park, independently of the difficulty of providing for them in a city like London. The hon. and gallant Member opposite (Colonel French), who was a very old militia officer, but a very young soldier, had drawn the attention of the House to what he called a piece of favouritism shown to the 79th regiment. He was astonished to hear the hon. Gentleman allude to that, for he knew that the 79th had been under orders for some time to proceed to Dublin, and it was owing to their being on their way there, and not on account of their dress—a reason which no one but a militia officer would have dreamt of—that they would be present at the display. The Quartermaster General had had the distribution of the tickets—the Admiralty had been subsidiary to the Horse Guards on this occasion, and he believed that the arrangements would be admirably carried out. The Admiralty would be efficiently represented. The gallant Admiral, the Member for Southwark (Sir C. Napier), would be there on horseback; the Marines would be present, and a fine body of Greenwich pensioners would attend, to represent the past services of that gallant body of which the hon. and gallant Admiral the Member for Christchurch was so distinguished a representative. He thought, therefore, that there was no occasion for the jealousy and irritation of feeling which some hon. Gentlemen had thought proper to exhibit.

Mr. HENLEY said, that the speech of the hon. Member who had just sat down was certainly not calculated to allay any irritation of feeling that might by possibility have been felt by any one upon this subject. Many hon. and gallant Members did, he knew, feel somewhat sore upon it, but he thought that their objections had been very judiciously met by those who had preceded the hon. Member. When, however, the hon. Member gave, as a reason for not bringing up a few sailors, that there would be a difficulty in providing for them in this metropolis with 2,500,000 inhabitants, it appeared to him to be one of the most extraordinary reasons he had ever heard, and it certainly was an admission of administrative incapacity for which he was not prepared. He was, however, glad to hear such a commendation of the Horse Guards from the hon. Gentleman, who, only a few months ago proposed, if he remembered right, to turn the ornamental water from St. James's Park right through that establishment. He could not see what difficulty there could be in placing these gallant men side by side with the troops in Hyde Park. They did land service in the Crimea; and, according to the testimony of the gallant General, performed their part gloriously in the struggle.

Question again proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

METROPOLITAN WORKHOUSES.

COMMITTEE MOVED FOR.

VISCOUNT RAYNHAM rose to move an Amendment, "That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the condition and administration of Metropolitan Workhouses, and into the arrangements made and carried out by the parochial authorities of the Metropolis for giving relief to the poor." The noble Lord said, he had been led to consider the condition of these workhouses by circumstances which were as well known to most Members of that House as to himself; but, since the attention of the public was last drawn to it, matters appeared to have become worse and worse in most of the metropolitan workhouses. He thought the mismanagement of the metropolitan workhouses a subject deserving the consideration of the House. Though the enormities to which he intended to refer were matters of notoriety, he would, nevertheless, support his Motion by instancing certain cases from a return which had recently been made by the Poor Law Board, in the shape of a large blue-book, which contained nothing but details of the mismanagement in the workhouses of St. Pancras and Marylebone. Dr. Henry Bence Jones, who was appointed to inquire into the state of the workhouse of St. Pancras, after entering into various matters of detail connected with the condition in which he found the workhouse, went on to state that he could use no other term to describe what he had seen than the word "horrible." He had no doubt that the condition of that workhouse had materially improved, but it would not be disputed that that improvement had been the result of inquiry, and he had no doubt that, were inquiries made respecting other workhouses, much good would ensue. It seemed that these metropolitan workhouses were mismanaged not with respect to two or three matters only, but in regard to almost every circumstance connected with the administration of those establishments. The want of classification was universal throughout them; and the consequence was that decent persons, whom misfortune had reduced to take refuge in the workhouse, were compelled to associate with some of the worst characters, whose conduct and language were deservedly offensive to them. It was notorious, moreover, that the guardians screwed down the salaries of the officials to the lowest point; their great object appeared to be to get persons for little or nothing—in many respects it was nothing—and the result of this was that many of the officers were quite unfit for the situations which they filled. In some cases the guardians exercised a power which did not legally belong to them by giving orders to the porter of the workhouse to refuse relief, while in others they did not enforce the test imposed by law, of making every pauper who had a night's lodging and a breakfast perform four hours' work. Therefore they broke the law at both extremes. Another matter which required alteration was the system of employing paupers as nurses in the sick wards, and these persons were generally so advanced in years as to be wholly incapable of performing the services required of them. He was informed that in the parish of St. Pancras this practice had been discontinued, but in other workhouses it still prevailed. In most of these workhouses, too, the wards were overcrowded, and no proper measures were taken for their ventilation. The result of this was the production of a great amount of disease and death. The excuse given was want of room; but surely the remedy could be found in making it imperative upon guardians to remove their pauper children into the country. Such a regulation would prevent overcrowding in many cases, while in others the evil might be still further reduced by abandoning the too parsimonious principles which so strictly regulated the action and conduct of the guardians. In St. Pancras a ladies' visiting committee had been appointed which was attended with very beneficial results, and these committees could be so arranged as not to interfere at all with the general regulations for the management of the workhouses. A material alteration was required in the constitution of the boards of guardians. It was utterly at variance with the interests of the inmates that persons should be elected merely because they were pledged to reduce the expenditure. It would be of great advantage if clergymen and other persons of respectable position in the district were made guardians as a matter of course. There ought, too, to be more efficient control over the officers of the unions in the discharge of their duties. He could next refer to several cases in which the conduct of the officials had been such as that some punishment ought to have been inflicted on them. A case occurred last year which showed an utter want of proper feeling for the discharge of his duties on the part of a medical officer at Hampstead. A widow woman, fifty-nine years of age, committed suicide while in a state of insanity produced by the neglect of the officer. The coroner's jury in their verdict passed a severe censure on the conduct of the two relieving officers. The next point to which he would refer was the state of the lunatic wards; in 1856 the commissioner, Mr. Gaskell, reported that at St. Pancras none of the recommendations of the former report had been carried out. He would not further detain the House, although he had many cases in which the inhumanity of the officers had led to suffering and death. A more strict inspection was requisite, and more duties should not be imposed on the officers than they were able to discharge.

MR. D. NICOLL seconded the Motion.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the condition and administration of Metropolitan Workhouses, and into the arrangements made and carried out by the parochial authorities of the Metropolis for giving relief to the poor," instead thereof.

MR. W. WILLIAMS must say that the new President of the Poor Law Board (Mr. Bouverie) was most assiduous in the discharge of his duties, although his action with regard to some of the metropolitan workhouses was not very palatable to the local authorities. He had no objection to the appointment of a Committee, but he thought it could not give the House more information than it already possessed in the Reports of the Poor Law Board. With respect to the Marylebone board of guardians, to whom the noble Lord had referred, he (Mr. Williams) begged to say that they were elected by the vestry, the clergy being ex-officio members of the board, and their conduct towards the poor had, in his opinion, been distinguished by great humanity. The Lunacy Commissioners had certainly reported that the workhouse of that parish did not afford sufficient accommodation for pauper lunatics; but the guardians and the vestry immediately set about carrying into effect the suggestions of the Commissioners, and they also intended to erect a school, which would afford ample means for the education of pauper children. The noble Lord had referred to the employment of workhouse officials who were totally incompetent to the discharge of their duties; but that certainly was not the case in the parish of Marylebone, where the officials were most efficient, and received ample salaries.

MR. BOUVERIE hoped his noble Friend would not think he was guilty of any personal disrespect to him, if, being anxious that the House should go into Committee of Supply, he did not follow the noble Lord through the details into which he had entered. He thought the noble Lord had entirely failed to establish a case which would justify the appointment of a Committee. There were between forty and fifty workhouses in the metropolitan district, and, if a Committee were appointed to investigate their management with any care, the inquiry would necessarily extend over two or three Sessions. The noble Lord arraigned the conduct of the parochial authorities generally, and it would be necessary that before a Committee he should prefer regular charges against them, and that an opportunity should be afforded them of offering a full defence. The inquiry would, therefore, be almost interminable. The cases upon which the noble Lord mainly relied as justifying his Motion were those of St. Pancras and Marylebone; but he (Mr. Bouverie) did not think they afforded grounds for the appointment of a Committee. He could not say that he considered the administration of the Poor Law in those parishes perfectly satisfactory. They were governed under separate local acts, and he could not say there was no reason to complain of the manner in which the law had been carried out. Entertaining that opinion, he had thought it his duty last year to institute an inquiry with reference to the proceedings in St. Pancras. The result of that inquiry was laid before Parliament, and in consequence of the measures adopted by the Poor Law Board the evils pointed out had either already been remedied, or were in course of correction by the parochial authorities. The administration of the law in Marylebone had not been perfectly satisfactory; but occurrences which were represented to have occurred in the workhouse had been the subject of inquiry, and steps had been taken by the parochial authorities to prevent their repetition. The Poor Law Board were empowered by Parliament to superintend the administration of the Poor Law throughout the country, and, so far as his power went, he had investigated all alleged cases of abuse which had been brought under his notice, and had endeavoured to apply a remedy where any mal-administration was proved to exist. If, however, the Motion of his noble Friend were adopted, the effect would be that, so long as the sitting of the Committee continued, the Poor Law Board would be unable to exercise the powers vested in them by law, and their action would be entirely paralyzed. The Poor Law Board did what it considered just and right towards the poor; but at the same time it was matter of gratification that gentlemen were found who, without any remuneration, attended locally to the wants of the poor, and that with great zeal and success; and although the noble Lord appeared anxious to invest the Poor Law Board with greater powers, yet he (Mr. Bouverie) must say that, for his own part, he should shrink from the idea of having large centralized administrative powers placed in his hands. No doubt cases of hardship and mal-administration might arise, but these hardly afforded grounds for the appointment of a Committee. If, however, his noble Friend had any particular cases of hardship which he was able to substantiate by evidence, let him place them in his (Mr. Bouverie's) hands, and he would endeavour to see that justice was done.

MR. P. W. MARTIN, in supporting the Motion, said, that he was acquainted with the state of affairs in the parish of St. Pancras, and considered inquiry urgently called for. The inquiry to which the right hon. Gentleman referred took place in January, 1856, and no doubt the regulation which the Board had laid down in consequence of the Report were excellent. Nevertheless, the state of things had not improved, and in October last Mr. Hall reported that they were disregarded wherever they differed from the former practice. Dr. Bence Jones reported that the workhouse was overcrowded, the inmates of the infirmary suffered from a poisonous atmosphere, and much disease was the consequence; while in the lunatics' ward great abuses prevailed, such as compelling a cleanly and a filthy patient to sleep together. This was the state of things on the 20th of December last. But, bad as matters were in the house, the management of the out-door relief was still worse; and he contended, therefore, that there was a loud call for inquiry. He did not, however, wish to give power to a Committee of that House to make inquiry into the state of the workhouses all over the country, because he thought that was unnecessary. It was only in the metropolis, where nobody could be said to know his neighbour's business, and where, consequently, much suffering among the poor went unrelieved, that inquiry was called for; and having discovered the condition of one metropolitan workhouse, he wished to know what was the condition of the others. He should, therefore, strengthen the hands of the noble Lord (Viscount Raynham) by supporting his Motion for a Committee.

MR. DRUMMOND said, he thought the statement made to the House by the President of the Poor Law Board (Mr. Bouverie) made the case for inquiry much stronger than it was before. The right hon. Gentleman stated that he had abundant power placed at his disposal. If he had that abundant power, why did he not exercise it? He agreed with the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down that the poor in the metropolis, in consequence of their isolation, were much worse treated than in the country. There was one question he should like to ask, why, if the right hon. Gentleman had such full power in his hands, how he came to suffer the flogging of women in the Marylebone workhouse? Not many years ago Barclay and Perkins's draymen took it into their heads to insult and maltreat General Haynau, when he came to London, for flogging women—a thing, by the way, which he never did. No one, however, could expect the draymen of Barclay and Perkins to be very conversant with foreign politics. But there, in the Marylebone workhouse, were women flogged. Besides, when the Poor Law Board proposed to institute inquiry into the matter, that inquiry was resisted by most of the poor law guardians in the parish, and they were backed by the clergyman of the parish, who had since been made a bishop. But it was perfectly clear that the poor in these London unions were most shamefully treated. He did not choose to go into any details. He was, however, conversant with the treatment of pauper lunatics. In the rural districts the country gentlemen tried to get those poor lunatics into proper asylums, because they knew that there the unfortunate creatures would be kindly and skilfully treated by persons who really devoted themselves to the care of such people. In the country asylums, too, the condition of the lunatics was inquired into by the county magistrates periodically; but here in the metropolis there was no one who knew anything about such matters, and the result was, that the poor lunatics were most cruelly treated; they were huddled together in the most wretched manner, and had no one to look after them who understood the nature of their ailments. Was this, he would ask, a state of things to be allowed to go on under their very noses, and they were not to interfere? He did not know how the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bouverie) exercised his power. The right hon. Gentleman, it might be from modesty on his part, had not enlightened the House on that point; but he (Mr. Drummond) did not care in whom power was vested; what he wanted was, to see those poor people protected, and if he could not get that done through the intervention of the Poor Law Board, he would support the Motion for a Committee of inquiry.

MR. BRISCOE said, he would cordially support the Motion before the House, believing that the noble Lord, in bringing it forward, had shown ample cause for investigation, and in so doing deserved the thanks of the House. He was, indeed, surprised that the Government should oppose the Motion, especially as they were told that there were eight other workhouses in the same, or nearly as bad a condition as those of St. Pancras and Marylebone.

MR. BOUVERIE, in explanation, said the hon. Member for Rochester (Mr. P. W. Martin) had referred to the state of St. Pancras workhouse on the 25th December last. He (Mr. Bouverie) had been informed, on competent authority, that the parish of St. Pancras was now laying out a very large sum of money in making improvements which had been recommended by Dr. Bence Jones, and that all the material suggestions which that Gentleman had made had been either actually effected or were in the course of being effected. The hon. Member, therefore, was not justified in basing his Motion on statements made six months ago.

MR. ALDERMAN COPELAND said, his experience as a citizen of London and a magistrate had long convinced him that here poverty was regarded as a crime and treated as a crime. He felt bound to support the Motion of the noble Lord; but, considering the period of the Session, and the vast number of election petitions which stood for consideration by Select Committees, he thought it would not be advisable to add another Committee to the number, and that the noble Lord (Viscount Raynham) would do well to leave the matter in the hands of the President of the Poor Law Board for the present.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, the hon. Member who last addressed the House had made a startling and alarming statement—namely, that in this metropolis poverty was treated as a crime; but he trusted that statement was rather the result of the hon. Member's warmth of feeling than of his deliberate conviction. On the other hand, however, he could not but admit that, within the last few years, circumstances had transpired to show that the administration of the poor law in this great metropolis was not in a satisfactory state. He must say that, when the shocking revelations were made in the St. Pancras Report became public, he received a private communication from the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bouverie), in which he manifested as much interest in the matter as any one could; but the complaints were not confined to St. Pancras, and he must congratulate the noble Lord (Viscount Raynham) on having found an opportunity of bringing forward a subject to which attention had been long directed; for, in the course he had taken, the noble Lord had done a public service; but, considering the period of the Session—and, what was of more importance, namely, the spirit in which the Motion had been met by the President of the Poor Law Board—he thought the object of the noble Lord would be best attained by leaving the matter in the hands of that right hon. Gentleman for the present. He (Sir J. Pakington) understood that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bouverie) had promised to give his attention to the subject, and with that assurance the noble Lord might be satisfied. He (Sir J. Pakington) believed that much irregularity prevailed in the workhouses of the metropolis, and, unless the state of things there became more satisfactory, he thought the noble Lord, at the commencement of the next Session, would have abundant ground for repeating his Motion.

VISCOUNT RAYNHAM said, unless he received an assurance from the President of the Poor Law Board, that some steps would be taken in this matter, he should divide the House.

The House divided:—Ayes 73; Noes 52: Majority 21.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—MISCELLANEOUS ESTIMATES.

House in Committee of Supply; Mr. FitzRoy in the Chair.

The following Votes were agreed to.

(1.) £426,670, Government Prisons and Convict Establishments at Home.

(2.) £183,523, Maintenance of Prisoners in County Gaols, &c.

(3.) £43,815, Transportation of Convicts, &c.

(4.) £259,405, Convict Establishments (Colonies).

(5.) £11,504, Inspection and General Superintendence over Prisons.

(6.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £361,233, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the charge for Public Education in Great Britain, to the 31st day of March, 1858."

MR. HADFIELD rose to call attention to the great increase which had taken place in this Vote within the last few years. So recently as 1852 it was only £150,000, whereas for the last year it was £451,000, and for the present year £541,233, being an increase of £90,000 as compared with last year. The annual increase was now about £100,000, and Sir John Kay Shuttleworth had predicted that in a few years the rate would amount to £1,000,000, estimating the capitation fund for the rural districts alone at £800,000. According to the present rate of progression the Government would soon be in possession of the education of the entire people, and voluntary effort, which had accomplished such wonders in past times, would have no chance against the national Exchequer. It certainly was not fitting that the Committee should vote such a sum as half a million of money to be placed at the disposal of an irresponsible body. He complained that the duties of the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education were not so well defined as they ought to be. The whole system, in fact, appeared to him to be going wrong, and he thought it exceedingly desirable that before agreeing to the Vote the House should discuss fully and deliberately the question of national grants for education—grants voted without consideration, and distributed without responsibility—which they could not do at such a late hour of the night as half-past nine o'clock. He therefore moved,—

“That the proposed Vote of £361,233 for public education in Great Britain, in addition to £180,000 already voted, and making together £541,233, for the year ending the 31st day of March, 1858, be postponed for consideration, and be the last on the Estimates of Civil Services.”

THE CHAIRMAN stated, that he could not put the question which the hon. Gentleman had proposed. It was competent to the hon. Member to negative the Vote, but, according to the rules of the House, he could not move its postponement.

MR. COWPER said, it appeared as if the appeal of the hon. Gentleman for the postponement of the Vote must have been prepared under the supposition that the Estimates would not be taken so early. It was very unusual to postpone a Vote at half-past nine o'clock, and if the question could not be discussed at that hour, he despaired of securing a more suitable time. The Estimates now in the hands of the Chairman had been prepared upon a calculation of the payments that would become due in the current year, in accordance with the conditional grants made under Minutes of the Committee of Council. The increase over last year, amounting to £129,000, was owing to the increasing outlay on the part of local and voluntary contributors towards the building and management of schools, and was therefore not only a measure of the increased exertions of the benevolent and of those interested in education, but also an indication that the terms on which the votes of Parliament were administered were suited to the wants and acceptable to the feelings of a large portion of the community. The general acceptance of the terms was the best proof that could be got of their propriety. The necessity of this expenditure was tested not only by a careful examination of the circumstances of each case and by official inspection, but still further by the sacrifice of their own money by persons most conversant with the locality and best able to watch constantly over the proceedings of the school. They had also the best security for the economical application of the grant. They had not only the supervision of the Committee of Council but also the personal interest of those who were spending their own money, and who could not spend the public money without spending a proportionate sum of their own, and could not economise their own money without saving the public purse, for the public grants were so made as to be in proportion to the contributions from local and voluntary sources.

The position which the State occupied in relation to education depended not only on a correct view of the duties of the State but also on the position assumed by the instructors. Popular education in many parts of Europe had been directed by the Government. In England the efforts for spreading knowledge among the poorer classes had originated in times of religious zeal. The earliest epoch of our ancient schools dated from a time when the pious zeal of the people led to the foundation of schools in connection with conventional establishments. Many of the endowed schools—in which, however, much improvement was required—dated from the period of the Reformation, when there was a great desire that the new opinion on religious subjects should be widely disseminated, and the poor enabled to read the Scriptures and see for themselves the basis of the Reformation. The third epoch at which efforts were made for the extension of education among the children of the poor with permanent results was the commencement of the present century, when a great revival of religious zeal gave rise to the Evangelical movement. On the Continent popular education had been diffused from a different source. In Prussia, the present admirable system was framed at a time of disaster and discouragement. At a time when the Prussian armies had succumbed before the French invaders and their lands had been spoiled by the conquering foe, the statesmen of Prussia felt the necessity of making some resolute effort to awaken the intelligence, to revive the exhausted vigour, and to rouse the relaxed energies of the people; and in that moment of difficulty and depression they commenced the present system, which had since been extended through the Prussian dominions. In Germany and France state policy dictated schools. In England popular education originated with no statesmen, and was nurtured for no political end. It sprung from the action of the Church and the philanthropy of individuals. They traced it from the school of Mr. Raikes at Gloucester, who at the close of the last century established Sunday schools, and from the untiring exertions of Boll and Lancaster, who devoted their lives to the establishment of the monitorial system.

Mr. Hadfield

When, therefore, in the year 1833, the governing bodies of this country at last awakened to a sense of the duty of the State with reference to the moral and intellectual state of the people, and perceived that the State was bound to take measures to prevent ignorance and immorality, and to remedy the neglect of the education of the children of the poor—when, for the first time, a grant of public money, though only amounting to £20,000, was voted by this House—it was not possible for any State education to be framed in the way in which it had been established in continental countries. The field, being already occupied by persons associated together by an agreement of religious views, and philanthropic motives, the State naturally turned to directing and improving the schools which already existed; so that the present arrangement, which would not have been adopted as a system, was developed naturally from the circumstances, the march of events, and the state of opinion at the time it was introduced. The method to which Parliament was almost compelled to resort, when first it began to vote money in aid of schools, was the supplementing and completing the imperfect exertions already directed to give adequate education to the labouring classes. That system had developed itself and assumed a great variety of ramifications; but the present mode of administering the grant was exactly the same as was adopted in 1833. Now, the principle of that aid was this—the co-operation of the State with the exertions of individuals and societies in the promotion of education. In some respects it was defective, but it was an exemplification of the French axiom, Aide toi et le ciel t'aidera. Upon the same principle the world was governed by Divine Providence, for they saw that the prizes of life were not given to those who most needed them, but to those who most exerted themselves to obtain them. It had been admitted that the man who made a gift to another, benefited him less than the man who enabled him to help himself; and he was sure, with regard to schools, the State did more by stimulating managers and teachers to make a good school than they would by merely supplying the funds. The efforts of the Committee of Council on Education had been directed not merely to aid the schools by grants of money, but by giving them information, guidance, and help, and those suggestions which could best be given by a central authority viewing the whole education of the country, and being accurately informed of all that was going on by means of its inspectors. It was not centralization in an improper sense—for he presumed centralization in that sense was an attempt to do something which the locality could do better, while the right centralization was to do that which the central could do better than the local authority. It was local action under central supervision. In all matters of guidance and direction it was acknowledged that the Committee of Council had greatly benefited the local schools.

In considering the Minutes of the Committee of Council on Education he would ask what were the great impediments which prevented the spread of education among the children of the poorer classes? Those impediments were—1. Deficiency of school buildings. 2. Deficiency of funds for the maintenance of schools. 3. Inefficiency of education and imperfect mode of teaching. 4. Irregular attendance of children. 5. Early age at which children leave school. 6. Total absence of many children from the schools.

With regard to the deficiency of school buildings, the grants of the Committee of Council had done much to supply it. In the last year the sum spent on building and enlarging elementary schools was £74,000: 242 schools had been built and 262 enlarged during the year; 127 teachers' residences had been built, and an increase of accommodation had been provided for 34,000 children. From the year 1839 to the present year the sum of £580,000 had been spent in building, enlarging, and improving schools, and accommodation had been provided for 495,000 children. These grants had been made on conditions, under which they had been met by an expenditure of £1,512,000 in voluntary contributions; so that, on an average, the Parliamentary grant was met by three times the amount of the public contribution. If the Committee looked to the amounts awarded for building schools, there would be seen to be a rapid increase in the applications for aid which were entertained. In 1852 awards were made for building 285 schools; in 1853, 318; in 1854, 450; in 1855, 470; and in 1856, 575. At present there were liable to inspection 7,588 schools considered as institutions, not as school-rooms, many of them containing boys, and girls, and infants, in the same building. These having been partly built by public money, were liable, by their trust deeds, to inspection; though the actual inspection was usually restricted to those in the receipt of annual grants. Out of 7,588 separate institutions, 4,120 were last year in the receipt of annual grants and were actually inspected. In 1854, the number of school institutions liable to inspection was 4,788, of which 3,825 were actually inspected, and in two years the increase of schools liable to inspection had risen from 4,788 to 7,580 in the present year. These, it would be observed, were school-houses, not school-rooms. It thus appeared that under the present system the erection of schools was proceeding at a very rapid rate. It was true that this increase would be much more rapid if the public money were given on easier terms. Applications were constantly made to the Privy Council to make grants without exacting the usual proportion of local contributions, and in peculiar cases, where poor and populous communities were concerned, exceptions were made to the rule, and the Committee did not tie down the applicants too rigorously to the letter of the rule. He now came to the second point—the want of funds for the ordinary maintenance of the schools. This expenditure was met from the other grants of the Privy Council. It was found, from the average expenditure of elementary schools, that the annual cost of a child was estimated at 30s., and that the amount contributed by the public was 11s. 4d. The public funds, therefore, speaking generally, provided more than one-third of the ordinary expenditure of those schools receiving annual grants, and which came up to the requirements of the Committee of Privy Council. The third point—the inefficiency of the education given in the schools, had long been a great source of complaint, and a great impediment in the way of education. Many of the Minutes of the Privy Council dealt with this evil, but mainly those of 1846, which provided for the establishment of normal schools, the augmentation of teachers' salaries, and the adoption of the system of pupil teachers. The rapidity and extent to which normal schools had increased was most remarkable. Foreign educationists have great difficulty in believing that within ten years thirty-two normal training institutions had been established in this country, mainly by voluntary contributions, for such an achievement could only have occurred in this country. These normal schools were not only well provided with suitable houses and good teachers, but great care was being taken to adapt them to their proper object. They were becoming more practical, and were now producing the proper class of teachers that were required. Mr. Temple, one of Her Majesty's inspectors of schools, said, in his last Report:—

“The work done in the training colleges appears to me, with one exception, to be improving as steadily and as rapidly as could be desired. The definiteness given to the examinations by Mr. Moseley's programme has had the best effect both on the students and the lecturers. There is always a tendency in the infancy of such institutions to attempt more than can be accomplished, and the training colleges have not been free from this mistake. Year by year, however, they seem to see more clearly what they ought to do, what they can do, and how they can do it best, and the more definite character of the annual examinations contributes much to this result. The answers of the students are less superficial and less inaccurate than they used to be.”

The attention of the inspectors and of the Committee of Privy Council had been specially directed to secure that the education given in these establishments should suit the young men who were trained to be the teachers in these schools, and should avoid the charge of “flying too high.” It was, no doubt, extremely difficult to provide a master who would patiently and willingly teach children of from seven to ten years of age, and who was at the same time competent to instruct a pupil-teacher in those matters which would fit him in his turn to be a master. If, therefore, hon. Members were sometimes disposed to complain that too highly qualified a master was sent to a village school, it must be remembered that, besides the instruction of the class, the master must be capable of teaching a teacher. To reach the minds, sustain the attention, and influence the hearts of very young children was as difficult, perhaps, as teaching older pupils, and required a degree of skill and patience which could not easily be found. Some of the faults laid to the charge of the school-masters were to be traced only to the youthful age at which they had to take charge of the schools. This disadvantage, however, was in process of correction; and the average age of the trained masters was gradually rising. The training schools, also, could not give experience which must be acquired in after life, and experience was as necessary in teaching as in any other profession. The augmentation of the salaries of masters had been successful. Before the Minutes of 1846, it used to be remarked, that the schoolmasters of villages and country towns were generally men who had failed in some other occupation—that keeping a school was the resource of those who did not succeed in other pursuits—and that teaching was supposed to be so easy a matter that any one could undertake it without previous training or experience. They were often the discarded ushers of middle schools, incapable of exercising the lowest strata of the reasoning faculty. But this class of persons had disappeared from the inspected schools. The position of master had been invested with a respect more commensurate with its real importance, and was a coveted object of rustic ambition. There was no deficiency of candidates for masterships in schools where the payment was adequate and the opportunity of exercising their vocation was satisfactory. But the institution of pupil-teachers had most conduced to the efficiency of the schools. The monitorial system, which it superseded, had been bringing elementary education into disrepute, particularly with the parents who were dissatisfied that their children should learn of, or teach other children. The pupil-teachers were found to be really valuable as aids to the masters; and they offered this great advantage, that we had preparing for the normal schools young men who had a taste for educating, and who voluntarily entered into it, and were prepared during a five years' apprenticeship for that which would be their profession in after life. It was objected that the smallness of the remuneration produced some difficulty in obtaining pupil-teachers, and that a considerable proportion of their number did not afterwards become masters. But as to the allegation that the pupil-teachers were not adequately paid, it was doubtful whether any strong pecuniary inducement ought to be held out to tempt young men into the field of education. It was much better that lads should be left to embrace this profession from a peculiar aptitude and natural bent for it, than that they should be drawn away by increased emoluments from other occupations. And by affording to those pupil-teachers who discovered that they had no taste for the work of instruction a ready means of escape into other employments, there was a better chance that those who remained would be adapted for educational pursuits. Experience showed that no man succeeded in this occupation who did not take an interest in it, and had not a warm sympathy with children; and the success of a school-master depended more on the zeal he felt for his profession than on intellectual ability. This explained the success of ragged schools. The Ragged School Union had made no demand for Government aid; probably because the intellectual attainments of their teachers would not enable them to pass the examination for Government certificates. But the deficiency of special learning was compensated by zeal, aptitude, and by that lively sympathy with the children under their care, which was the real source of moral power over the tender mind. The great aim, however, ought to be to combine both of these qualifications in the teacher, and the training institutions to which he had referred afforded facilities for attaining that result. They supplied to the future instructors of the young the requisite intellectual acquirements and practical experience; while for those whose hearts were not in the work an easy outlet was provided to some more congenial occupation, and the training they had received was useful in other walks of life. The pupil-teacher system had been commenced at a school at Norwood by Sir James Kay Shuttleworth; it was subsequently tried in the Admiralty School at Greenwich, and was now adopted in all the best schools in England. In the important matter of pupil-teachers we surpassed the nations of the Continent, however efficient their systems of education were in other respects. In France there was nothing that corresponded to this feature of our institutions, and the want of it was felt. Another valuable provision was that the augmentations made to the salaries of schoolmasters and pupil-teachers were made to depend on their passing through examinations before the inspectors, and also on a rigid scrutiny of their paper-work in the Council Office. Every security was thus taken that the sums paid in increasing their remuneration should not be uselessly or carelessly spent. The irregular attendance of the scholars was, perhaps, the greatest impediments to the success of our elementary schools. From a return, including all the schools at present under inspection, it appeared that 42 per cent of the scholars had attended the dayschools for less than one year; that 25 per cent had attended for one year and less than two years; that 13 per cent had attended for two years and less than three; that 8 per cent had attended for three years and less than four; that 5 per cent had attended for four years and less than five; and that 4 per cent had attended for five years and upwards. In many of the schools, especially in Yorkshire, one-half of the children to be found there at one time were not in the habit of attending for more than six months in the year, and in the rural districts generally many of the children were taken away from school during the summer months. This irregular attendance above all other things tended to prevent a good result, for in the case of young children the impressions produced on the mind must be continuous, if they are to have any lasting effect. He had heard schoolmasters say that nothing was more distressing than to see the same boy who had left them at the age of eleven an intelligent, active lad, with all his wits about him, and able to use all the faculties he then possessed, returning to them at seventeen, after he had been at the plough, a heavy, dull, stupid, loutish sort of fellow, who, so far from being able to describe all those beautiful flourishes of the pen at which he used to be an adept when at school, hardly knew how to write his own name, and had nearly forgotten all that he had learnt. The capitation grant aided the school-fund in the way most calculated to stimulate frequent and regular attendance; and the reports from the schools showed that it had operated beneficially. It induced the managers and masters to exert themselves to get the children to attend regularly; and, it suggested to persons of influence to visit the parents in their respective neighbourhoods and to point out to them the absolute necessity of a continuous and consecutive course of instruction for any really beneficial and enduring result. At present the capitation grant was not paid upon more than 36 per cent of the whole number of scholars in attendance. So that only one-third were attending as they ought. To give the right to a share of the grant the child must have been at school for 176 days during the year preceding the inspection. It acted, therefore, as a direct stimulus to the masters and managers to increase the number of their scholars, and also, when they got them to school to keep them there. The early age at which the school-education ceased, could hardly be prolonged by any operation of a public grant. If a child earned money you could hardly ask his parents to consent to his abandoning work in order to go to school, unless you compensated them for the loss which they would thereby sustain; and of course no one would propose in that House a Vote to compensate parents in such cases. But much was being done to make it worth while for the parents to let their children remain longer at school, and efforts were being made to improve the education given in the primary schools aided by the State. Parents could appreciate that improvement more readily than was generally supposed. In his opinion the indifference shown by many of the working classes with regard to sending their children to school was not so much owing to their prejudice against education itself, as to their low opinion of the character of the education given to their children. They did not see that that education had a very obvious or practical effect upon their children's progress in life. To some extent he thought the parents were wrong, but he did not deny that the schools might and ought to be more efficient and furnish a more practical and special preparation for the future occupations of the children. In the best of schools there were some children who would not learn. He had known boys who exercised their ingenuity and cleverness in getting their lessons without study, and who could pass through even Eton and Westminster without carrying away with them anything that they could remember in after life. The reports of the school inspectors showed the pains they took to make the instruction more thorough, efficient and practical. Where industrial training could be given to advantage it was given; but if children, particularly boys, remained in the schools, on an average, only a year or a year and a half, it was clear that there was not time for them to learn more than the mere elements of intellectual teaching, and the withdrawing of their time to teach handicrafts would not be wise when their age was below ten or eleven. He believed that all the friends of education were now inclined to press upon schoolmasters the importance of making their teaching as special and suited to the children's future position in life as possible. In the girl's schools there was more opportunity of doing so, because girls generally remained longer at school than boys. Any one who read the report of Mr. Cooke, who inspected the female training schools, would see that he was continually repeating his exhortations to the teachers to bestow more pains on teaching the girls needlework and household work, and, where it could be done, household economy. In fact, some of the inspectors had become excellent judges of needlework. They had from the commencement impressed the teachers with the desirableness of making the education given to the girls as practical as possible. He believed that the more the quality of the education was improved, the more visible its results, the more it would be valued, and the more likely was it that the children would remain longer at school. Parents in the long run were not bad judges of what sort of education their children ought to have. He often found that a parent knew much better what progress his child was making in education than the visitors who questioned him and the managers who frequented the school.

With regard to the total absence of children from school, he thought the number of such children not so large as was generally assumed. It appeared, from the returns of the Registrar General, that out of nearly 5,000,000 children about 2,000,000 attended school; but assuming that children between the ages of three and fifteen remained in school on an average not more than five years, it would be quite compatible with those figures that every child in the country should have passed through a school. It was found, however, that children did not remain on an average five years at school. The children of the working classes remained at school, on an average, no longer than from a year to a year and three-quarters. He did not mean to assert that every child in the country had passed through a school, but the returns of the Registrar General were not inconsistent with that assertion. He believed that the number of children who never went to school was comparatively small indeed. Several inquiries had been made on that subject, and the results tended to show, that if you excluded the lowest class of children who swarmed in the courts and alleys of great towns, in which the most demoralized portion of the community dwelt, the number of those children who did not at one time or other attend school was not large. When he had had opportunities of questioning children who were grossly ignorant, he generally found that they had been at school, though they had forgotten what they had learnt. That fact showed, that even among the working classes there was an opinion that their children ought to attend school, although they were very careless about keeping them there. Many children, also, played truant, and disregarded the wishes of their parents that they should attend school. The scanty attendance at several of the schools was owing to the indifference and demoralization of parents, and the extensive employment of young children. Nevertheless, when he regarded what was being done in the primary schools, he found that amid much to distress there was also much to encourage. Those schools which had been brought under the operation of the Minutes of Council were rapidly improving; abler masters were employed, there was greater energy and talent in the management of the schools, and more practical knowledge was imparted. He saw day by day greater numbers of persons devoting their attention to this great cause, and the progress, though slow, was certain. Education was spreading its roots deeper and wider in a prolific soil. Benevolence, compassion, and charity were engaged in this work. They felt that it was not so much upon mere donations, as upon a sense of duty and noble emulation on the part of those engaged in our schools that the advance of education depended. The last objection to which he would advert was one which had been frequently urged against the system. It had been said that the Government withheld their aid from the poor, while they gave it to the rich. But that was not a fair way of stating the matter. They did not give to the rich as rich, nor withhold from the poor as poor—they gave their aid to those districts in which the people interested themselves about education, and were ready to make sacrifices for it, while they withheld it from other districts, not because those districts were poor, but because they were indifferent to the education of their children. Aid was withheld from certain parishes, not because they were poor, but because no persons lived within them who took a sufficient interest in the promotion of education among the inhabitants, or who were willing to make the necessary exertions for that purpose. There was, after all, no security for the proper expenditure of the public money so good as that of the voluntary exertions of self-denying zeal, and he, for one, should be the more satisfied that that money had been advantageously laid out if its expenditure were made dependent on contributions being made for the advancement of education by those who were acquainted with the wants of a particular locality, and who had proved the earnestness of their convictions by carrying out their views with the aid of funds drawn from their own resources. He did not think it was necessary he should enter into any further explanation of the Vote, as hon. Members had a sheet in their hands which fully explained all the details, but he should be ready to answer any question which might be put to him with reference to them.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he had listened with very great pleasure to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman who had just resumed his seat; and although he was unable to concur with him in many of the conclusions at which he seemed to have arrived, the Committee he felt assured could not fail to appreciate the calm and judicious tone by which the statement of the right hon. Gentleman had been pervaded, and he ventured to express a hope that the same tone would be found to animate any discussion which might take place upon the very interesting and important matter to which that statement related. He must also state that he derived great pleasure from the fact that the vote for educational purposes had been submitted to the notice of the Committee by a Minister directly connected with the department of education in this country, and who must be held responsible for the various items which the Vote contained. Having said thus much, he should not trespass upon the time of the Committee by entering into a discussion of the question generally; because it was his intention, after the conferences upon the subject which had just taken place, to take that course when he brought forward his Motion with respect to the general subject of education, for the introduction of which to the notice of the House the noble Lord at the head of the Government had, with his usual courtesy, been good enough to say that he would place a day at his disposal. The only object which he had in view upon the present occasion was to invite the serious attention of the Committee to the financial position of the question under discussion, to the growing amount of the Estimate for educational purposes, and to the manner in which the money voted for those purposes was expended. He agreed with the right hon. Gentleman as to the origin of this Vote, and he was very glad to have heard the right hon. Gentleman make the important admission that the present system of education was one which could not be defended if it had originated systematically. Whatever might be its faults or defects, much good had, no doubt, been effected under its auspices; but he (Sir J. Pakington) felt convinced that the time must soon arrive when Parliament would be obliged to direct its attention to the question whether that system was one which ought to be allowed to go on permanently, and whether they were to vote an annually increasing grant for the promotion of education without taking some greater security than now existed for the beneficial expenditure of the money which they so liberally advanced. The right hon. Gentleman had observed that the present system was one under the operation of which the State assisted and co-operated with the efforts of individuals; but he (Sir J. Pakington) should contend that the result was to afford that assistance to the richer which was withheld from the poorer localities. The right hon. Gentleman, indeed, foreseeing that objection, had adverted to it at the close of his speech, and had endeavoured to meet it by saying that aid was not withheld from the poorer localities because they were poor, but because no desire was exhibited upon their parts that assistance should be extended towards them. The practical consequence, however, was that the richer districts, which were in a position to help themselves, got a very large share of the grant, while the poorer, which were unable to do anything for their own advantage, got nothing. Now, that was a great evil lying at the very root of the existing system. There was also another important question connected with the subject—namely, whether the working of the present system was such as to render it certain that the country received a full equivalent for the money which was voted by the Legislature. The right hon. Gentleman deprecated centralization—he said, that centralization in an evil sense was when the State undertook to do what localities could best do for themselves. Now, his (Sir J. Pakington's) objection to the scheme of education as it now stood was that it tended to promote centralization to an undue extent; he was strongly of opinion that, in granting a large sum of money to be administered by a central department located here in London, Parliament was doing that for the country districts which they could more efficiently perform for themselves. It was absolutely impossible, for instance, that any department in the metropolis, however well conducted, could dispense money for the maintenance of schools in Devonshire or Norfolk with a due confidence that the money so expended had been laid out to the best advantage. He was of opinion, indeed, that education throughout the country could not be satisfactorily promoted unless the aid of the respective localities were obtained, and a scheme of local organization established to provide that the public money was laid out only on schools which, owing to the nature of the education which they furnished, were deserving of assistance. Before the dissolution of Parliament the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gladstone) complained of the growing amount of this grant. He (Sir John Pakington) did not complain of the amount; but he did think that it had now reached a sum which made it incumbent upon them, not in the capacity alone of friends of education, but as stewards of the public purse, to see that it was properly administered. They must also specially note the annual increase. That increase he was glad to say was mainly caused by an increased attention to the subject of education throughout the country, and mainly by the efficiency of the capitation system. That system had at the outset been limited to the rural districts, but it had by a Minute of last year been extended to the whole of England, and he had no hesitation in saying that the House of Commons would, if the system were permitted to continue, be called upon before long to vote £1,000,000 sterling yearly for the purposes of education. Now, he, for one, had no objection to see a large amount of money expended in connection with that most important subject, and that it should be the subject of an annual Vote. He might add, that certain localities ought, in his opinion, to be aided out of the general funds of the country, but then he must repeat that steps should be taken to secure the beneficial expenditure of the money thus laid out. While dealing with that question he should, with the permission of the House, read a few passages from the Report upon the state of education which had just been issued, in order to show the Government what their own inspectors stated upon the working of the present system. The Rev. Mr. Stewart, who was inspector of schools for Cambridgeshire, Bedfordshire, and Buckinghamshire, in alluding to the working of the present system, said,—

“The necessary consequence of these features is that it is extremely difficult, if not impossible, to maintain a satisfactory standard of instruction in the schools which are aided by Parliamentary funds.”

Again, the Rev. Mr. Mitchell, who was inspector of the Norfolk, Suffolk, and Essex district, said,—

“Of the 205 schools inspected (in 1856) 41 may be reported as being really efficient, and many of them excellent, offering not merely an ordinary education, but as good an education as I conceive to be possible, taking all the circumstances into consideration—i.e., the age and social position of the scholars; but of 35 I am obliged to add an opinion that they are so defective in every respect—teachers, fittings, books, apparatus, and general morale—that it would be better if they were entirely closed, as they only impede progress to a better state of things. On the whole, it is almost better to have no school than a very bad one. The remaining 129 schools are more or less efficient; some are progressing, others remaining stationary, and some, I fear, retrograding.”

Now, it was worthy of grave consideration whether Parliament should continue to vote large sums of public money for the support of a system on which the official inspectors pronounced no higher an opinion than this. He now invited the attention of the Committee to a table which appeared in the Report of 1854 and 1855. It was a tabulated statement of the quality of all the inspected schools, and the general result was that of those schools (the best in England, it should be remembered), only 50 per cent were in a satisfactory state. Another table, taken out of the Report for the present year, and to which he had referred yesterday at the Educational Conference, would bring pointedly before the Committee the necessity of some greater return for the expenditure of this public money. The table showed the merits of the schools under some seven or eight different heads of instruction, but he would only refer to one. He found with reference to the simple rules of arithmetic that 4,698 schools were reported upon, and at 3,085, or two-thirds, these simple rules were described as being well or fairly taught, at 1,202 they were moderately taught, and at 411, or 10 per cent, they were imperfectly or badly taught. There were, therefore, no fewer than 1,600 schools of which the inspectors were unable to say that this essential element of instruction was even fairly taught. Now, he was not prepared to record his vote in opposition to the present grant; on the contrary, he should be very sorry to take such a course; but he thought he had stated enough to prove that some further consideration was necessary before the House of Commons should go on from year to year making these grants without better security for their employment. Within the last few days there had been an interesting conference on the subject of education, and he could not refrain from expressing his great satisfaction that the Prince Consort should have come forward and exhibited such interest in this subject. That his Royal Highness had displayed his usual ability it was unnecessary for him to say, but it was a great and signal fact that the Prince Consort should have come forward in this way, and it was also most gratifying to see gentlemen assembled from all parts of England to discuss this question. Whether any great or immediate results would ensue from this conference he might be allowed to doubt. He did not wish to be misunderstood. These results would, at all events, he believed, follow from it—namely, an extension of public interest in the question, and a useful extension of information respecting it; and if only these two points were gained there would be much to rejoice at. The main object of the conference was to discuss that unfortunate fact which his right hon. Friend had spoken of as at present the greatest impediment to education—namely, the irregular attendance of children, and the early age at which they left the schools. Now, he had ventured to point out yesterday that one cause of this irregular attendance was the badness of the schools. He was glad to hear this to a great degree admitted by his right hon. Friend; and the fact really was that the schools were to a considerable extent so deficient that the working classes could not be expected to sacrifice the wages of their children for the sake of such imperfect instruction as was imparted there. His right hon. Friend had observed that it was impossible to give the parents any money compensation for the loss of their children's services. This was quite true—they could not give compensation in money; but there was a compensation which they could give and to which the poor man who gave up the wages of his children was entitled—and that was an adequate education. His belief of the working classes was, that if they saw their children properly taught at the schools, and learning there what would be useful to them in after life, they would have no objection to make those sacrifices which otherwise could not be expected from them. In one-third of the best schools of England, as he had shown, the common rules of arithmetic were not adequately taught, if taught at all. Now, those rules entered into nearly all the transactions of life—into the relations of working men with their employers, their landlords, their tradesmen; and how could they be expected to sacrifice those wages which contributed so much to their material comfort, for the sake of sending their children to school where they could not acquire even such elementary though essential knowledge? His object was now answered. He had stated at the outset that it was not his intention to enter generally into the state of education in this country, and that if he felt it necessary he would take another opportunity of doing so. No one would suspect him of being desirous of withholding pecuniary assistance for the advancement of education, but he had thought it his duty to make to the Committee this statement (confined as it had been entirely and completely to the estimate now before them), to show that the time had come for the reconsideration of the present system. As Sir John Kaye Shuttleworth had yesterday remarked at the conference, the people ought to be educated, and they must be educated. We might shirk it as we liked, but the real question at issue before Parliament and the country was, "Will you pay the price?" When, however, the country did pay the price, he thought it was their duty to see that they got the full value for their money.

MR. ALCOCK called the attention of the Committee to the expediency of doubling the present rate of the capitation grant, and of reducing the number of days of attendance from 176 days to 160 days, in order to be entitled to capitation money, and of increasing the grant to masters and mistresses, on account of pupil teachers, from £5 to £10 for the first pupil teachers. The hon. Member said that the number of days at present required for attendance in order to give a claim to the capitation grant was excessive, and ought to be reduced; and the capitation grant itself was too small. With regard to the number of days, when they took off the Christmas week, the Easter week, and the Whitsun week—when they remembered the distance at which children frequently lived in country places from the school, and the consequent difficulty they had in attending in certain states of the weather—when, finally, they recollected how often children were kept at home by the illness of themselves or their parents, he thought that the reduction of the number of days would be no more than reasonable. With regard to the pupil teachers, it was not worth while for any master or mistress to accept the very small pittance of £5, which was now allowed them on account of pupil teachers. It was a miserly and beggarly sum, unworthy of the House, and of the country. For the first pupil teacher, £10 ought to be given, and then, for subsequent ones, even so low as £3 might be given; but, to give but £5 where there was only one pupil teacher was niggardly in the extreme, and did not at all remunerate the master or mistress for his or her trouble and loss of time.

MR. W. EWART said, he hoped the proposal of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Alcock) would be ultimately adopted, but he believed that it could not be brought forward as an Amendment on the present occasion, because the forms of the House prevented any hon. Gentleman from moving an increase of a Vote proposed by Government. He fully concurred with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Droitwich (Sir J. Pakington) in the satisfaction he had expressed with regard to the educational statement which had been laid before the House that night; and also in his approval of that admirable Educational Conference, which had been so happily inaugurated during the past week, and from which he agreed that much advantage must be derived; but he trusted that the duties of the Vice President of the Educational Board would be extended, and that all the educational institutions in the country—the National Gallery, the British Museum, and everything connected with science and art, or that threw, even indirectly, a light upon the educational progress of the country—would come within his duty, so that he should be able to give to Parliament accurate information of the progress of science and art in this country. As to the present system of education, he was one who thought that it could not last. Undoubtedly it was an excellent substitute for a more permanent system, and had done signal good service to the State; but he could not regard it as anything more than a parenthesis in the history of our national education. He must say, on the part of the people of this country, that eventually they must take the charge of education into their own hands, and that a popular system of rating, after the manner of the Scotch or Americans, was the real basis upon which an English educational system ought to rest. What was wanted in the existing system was, the extension of industrial training in schools. It was the just judgment of the people of this country that, if their children were to have any education at all, it should be that which fitted them best to discharge the duties of their daily life; that it was not enough to give them that “little learning,” which was said to be “a dangerous thing,” but that it should be brought to their hearths and homes, or as Lord Bacon had said, to their “business and bosoms;” and, until that was done, he believed they would find their educational system to be practically deficient. One most important point in connection with the subject was, the education which was given to women. He deeply lamented to say that, in the homely arts of life, and in those things which made them good wives and mothers, the women of the poorer classes in this country were woefully deficient. He hoped, therefore, that whilst attending to the general education of the people, this particular branch of it would not be lost sight of; and that means would be taken for imparting an industrial and household education to the women. He hailed the introduction of the subject of education by his right hon. Friend that night, as the Minister of Education, as a happy augury of its progress hereafter, and he trusted to see the example which had been set that evening extended in future years.

MR. HENLEY said, he could very cordially agree with the right hon. Baronet and those who had followed him in bearing testimony to the ability with which the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cowper) had brought forward his statement that night, and with the hon. Member for Dumfries (Mr. Ewart) that unless the hearts as well as the heads of the people were instructed little real and permanent good would be accomplished. But he could not agree with him that the women in the poorer classes were unable to perform their domestic duties. On the contrary, he believed that it was not that they could not cook, but that very often they had nothing to cook, and taking the length and breadth of the land he believed there would be found in the houses of the poor no deficiency in those comforts which were the result of intelligent management; he believed that there was as much intelligence naturally displayed in the management of the scanty income of a cottager's family as could be taught by any school system. It had been said, and truly said, that the great difficulty which at present existed did not arise from the want of schools, but from the want of scholars, and the statement of the right hon. President of the Board of Education did not, in point of fact, apply to more than one-fourth part of the children who were receiving education from the country; for it had been calculated that of about 2,000,000 children who were receiving instruction in this country, only 500,000 of those children were receiving an education under the control of the Committee of Council. And it was not a little remarkable that the outcry about the difficulty of getting children to attend had proceeded chiefly from those schools—in fact, as he had before stated, the great difficulty to deal with arose, not from the want of schools, but from the want of scholars. He held in his hand a Report from one of the most skilled of our school inspectors, Mr. Canon Moseley. Now, what did that gentleman say? He said that all their efforts had had for their object the perfecting of the elementary school, and that they entertained a hope that when the children derived more good than heretofore from their attendance at school the parents would desire to send them longer, and by degrees public opinion would become so favourable that they would willingly sacrifice for a time the wages which the children could earn; “but,” added Mr. Canon Moseley, “I will not conceal from your Lordships that hitherto that hope has been disappointed, because the parents have thought, owing to the schools being now so good, that the children can get all the learning that they consider necessary earlier than they could before, and they therefore take them away sooner.” That statement of Mr. Canon Moseley had received a remarkable confirmation in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, who stated that the schoolmaster complained that he kept his boys till they were ten or eleven, and that they were excellent boys, wrote a good hand, and so on; and that they then went out to work, and returning again at sixteen, or thereabouts, were no better than clods.

The right hon. Gentleman had omitted to tell them what sort of capacity for earning a living these boys had acquired when they left school in the first instance; but that was really at the very root of the question—what sort of instruction had the boys received; was it intellectual only, or had they been trained to do their duty in that state of life in which it had pleased God to call them? He was glad to hear the right hon. Gentleman express a hope that the present system would combine the earnest moral training of the ragged school with the more intellectual training of the Privy Council, because he thought that the system hitherto had been rather to exalt intellect at the expense of everything else. He looked upon this as a mistake, and he suggested that they should take care in their examinations that no children took away the prizes of intellect unless they exhibited also a fair knowledge of matters of practical utility. The right hon. Gentleman, speaking of the absence of so many children from the schools, described them in a great measure as the children who swarmed in our courts and alleys. Now, that was just the class that we wanted to get hold of, and however capable the right hon. Gentleman might be of directing science and art and those higher branches of cultivation which grew out of education, he trusted that he would not be led away to neglect those destitute children, who, as the right hon. Gentleman emphatically expressed it, “swarmed in our courts and alleys.” It must be remembered that when we spoke of the criminal population as resulting from want of education, it was from that last mentioned class that the criminal population was recruited. He was afraid that we had overlooked that class too long, and that we had been striving too much to improve the quality of the education instead of teaching the people what they wanted to know. The people of this country—in the rural districts, at least—were quite alive to the advantage of education, if the children could be taught what would be useful to them and what would enable them to get through the world better. They always admitted it, and they would tell you that they kept their children at school as long as they could afford it. Another subject for consideration was the state of some of the present Government schools stated to be inefficient. His right hon. Friend the Member for Droitwich had read some reports which were not very flattering to the districts to which they related; and he (Mr. Henley) should like to be informed whether the Government withheld the grant from those schools which did not come up to the conditions that were required of them—whether those schools which were reported on as so inefficient got any share of the grant? That was a point which he should like to hear explained. With respect to the grant now proposed he did not at all object to its amount, and he did not see how they could take a better security for the proper application of the money than by allowing those who contributed two-thirds to one-third by the Government to look after the expenditure. Whatever system they might adopt, there were likely to be some failures, and he certainly preferred this plan of two-thirds' voluntary subscription and one-third contributed by the Government to that which was proposed two years ago by his right hon. Friend the Member for Droitwich, which would have done away with voluntary subscription, and raised half by local rates, while the Government were to contribute the other half. [Sir J. PAKINGTON denied that this was his plan.] That would certainly have been the result of the proposal of his right hon. Friend two years ago; and he should like to know in what way that offered a better security for the efficient expenditure of the money than the plan at present in use. One reason for the shortcomings of the present schools might be that the master devoted too much time to his pupil teachers and too little to his boys; because the pupil teachers were profitable to him, and it was no doubt, more agreeable to an intellectual man to teach the higher branches of learning than to be instructing those who were less advanced. But this was a question for the vigilance of the Government, and their attention being called to it, he had no doubt that they would guard against any inconvenience in that direction. He was very glad to hear that the inspectors were now supposed to be competent—he was going to say needlewomen, but he supposed needlemen was the proper title—it was a very useful accomplishment. What we had heard of Prussia was not calculated to make us too anxious for the system of education pursued in that country. The right hon. Gentleman had said that it was not until after Prussia was overrun by the French that school teaching was established in that country; but what the Prussians did in 1814, when they rose as one man to drive out the French, did not contrast very unfavourably with their conduct in 1848. For his (Mr. Henley's) part, had he been a Prussian, he would a hundred to one sooner have owned his country in 1814 than in 1848. Chevalier Bunsen had published a work in which he had contrasted the Prussian State education and its effects upon the population, with the voluntary system adopted in this country, and its effects, and his statements were not such as should induce us to abandon our imperfect system, if you were pleased to call it so, for that of Prussia. He (Mr. Henley) gave his cordial support to this Vote. He hoped that the efforts of the Government would be directed to those unfortunate children who swarmed in the courts and lanes of our large towns. By getting them into ragged, and, if need were, subsequently into higher schools, we should do away with the chief nurseries of sin and wickedness and consequent crime. It had at different times been urged, with some truth, that we had not yet reached to the lowest depth, and he thought that those poor districts that had hitherto received no advantage from the grant, had reason to complain. He hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would deal specially with those districts in which really special cases existed; but he could not understand the advantage of that remedy which proposed, that because certain districts had hitherto derived no advantage from the funds of the State, the system of aid from the State should be given up altogether, and that these districts should be called upon to tax themselves for their own education. That was a logic he could not comprehend: the country would never grudge the money which might be needed to deal specially with these cases. There was, indeed, no general objection to the amount of this grant. Those who objected to the grant at all, indeed, only did so because they wanted to supply the means of education in some other manner. He was glad to see in the recent Minutes of Council a decreased inclination to interfere, and he hoped that, ultimately, the Government would make the grant so elastic as to include within its four corners all the odds and ends to which he had referred, and thus completely to fill up the ground.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON explained that, in the Bill to which his right hon. Friend had referred, he did not contemplate the abolition of voluntary contributions for educational purposes. On the contrary, he had always dissented from that most erroneous opinion, that the establishment of a sound system of education which would reach all classes, and all parts of the country, would do away with voluntary contributions.

MR. BUXTON entirely approved the principle on which the Government acted, of helping only those who helped themselves, and thought that, in the case of neglected districts, it was better to wait a few years until the clergyman or some other active person originated a movement for the establishment of schools, than to erect and support them entirely out of State funds.

MR. LIDDELL asked the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire, why, if he attached so much importance to the education of children who swarmed about the lanes and alleys of our large towns, he, on a recent Wednesday, employed his acute intellect, his industry, and his sagacity, to defeat a humble measure which had for its object the training of these very children? It was erroneous to suppose that the establishment of schools and the expenditure of money would educate the people. You never could educate the people until they found out that it was worth their while to be educated. All the changes which were going on around us went to increase the value of skilled labour, and, by consequence, the inducement to parents to send their children to school. So long as a child was learning an industrial employment, however, it was not entirely without education. He contended that, in a great producing country like England, the knowledge of his trade was of the greatest importance to a child. The main point to be ascertained as far as possible, and it was to be hoped that it would be a result attained by that Conference which had just been held under high auspices, was, whether they were receiving that for which they were to pay.

MR. PULLER said, he could not but feel that the speech of the right hon. Member for Droitwich had been, in some degree, an impeachment of the existing system. He did not complain of anything unfair in the extracts read from the Reports of the Government Inspectors, but he thought the right hon. Gentleman should have drawn attention to the fact that, as the present system had been in existence but a few years, it was only during the last two or three years that they had a right to look for any extensive fruits from it. When the Minutes of 1846 were published there were only some three or four training schools for preparing teachers, there were now no less than forty, and, in a short time, they might expect satisfactory results from the teachers who would be sent out from those training schools. It was not by making grants for building schools that they could look for real improvement in education; it was to the master and mistress they must look. The present system was in an advancing state, but the supply of duly qualified teachers was not as yet nearly equal to the demand, and therefore the inspectors, whilst dissatisfied in many cases with the present teachers, did not always think fit at once to displace them, or by withholding their certificate to deprive them of the fruits of their exertions. So also, when the right hon. Gentleman said that the Government helped the rich parishes more than the poor ones, did the right hon. Gentleman wish the Government to begin with the smaller parishes, and advance to the more populous ones? The Government, no doubt, were bound to see whether their rules were not confined within too narrow limits, and if they thought they were, they were bound to consider how they could most wisely relax them. For instance, in ascertaining the amount of the capitation grant to any parish, there was a rule of the Privy Council which excluded all children except those who had attended a full year before the visit of the Inspector. If the child had attended continuously for any number of months and was still attending, those months ought to be included in the computation. Then he objected to the rule of the Privy Council, which did not allow the capitation grant to a mixed school with a certificated mistress, where the population was over 600. That was too low a limit, and prevented the schools in many small parishes from obtaining the benefit of the capitation grant.

COLONEL SYKES said, he objected to the present system of national education, on the ground that it did not combine religious with secular instruction. The difficulty, he thought, might be thus met. Supposing a general rate for education; the grant voted to each religious denomination might be proportioned to its numbers, which could be readily ascertained from the census. The whole sum allotted to educational purposes might be divided pro

ratâ amongst the various denominations, and thus each would educate their children according to their own views, and imbue them with their own principles; and thus they would cheerfully combine religious with secular instruction. No doubt there were difficulties in this plan; because in some parts of the country a particular religious community might be so weak as not to be able to support a school; but all difficulties would be met by persevering energy. Education was not the mere teaching a child to read, write, and cast up accounts; it was the implanting in the mind the powers of comparison and deduction by a careful observation of the affairs of life, with a view to the regulation of self-conduct.

MR. HARDY said, that those who were opposed to the present system were unable to point to any other system which they could substitute for it. The compulsory system which existed in Prussia could not be applied to this country. He would remind the Committee that in a town of Prussia, containing only 14,000 inhabitants, 10,000 were summarily convicted for not sending their children to school. Now, if such a state of things existed in Prussia, what might be expected in this country under a similar system, where there was perfect freedom of religious and political opinions, and where the people would never tolerate any such interference with them? He had no difficulty in supporting the Vote, because, while it acknowledged the supervision of the State, it also acknowledged the voluntary efforts and tended to encourage the moral and religious energy of the people, without which all educational schemes would be nought. Educational machinery might be set up in every part of the country, but inasmuch as men were of a different material from that on which machines were meant to work, and inasmuch as men could not be cut all into exactly the same shape, or drilled to present the same uniform appearance as a Russian regiment, such machinery by itself would be useless. With regard to the schools for the poorer population which had been alluded to, what he should wish would be that the inspectors should look carefully after them to see whether they were conducted by men who gave their whole minds and their moral and religious feelings to the work, and, if they were, that they should then be aided liberally by the State. The hon. Member for Dumfries

(Mr. Ewart) seemed to accuse the clergy of slackness in the work of educating the people, but this opinion was very different from that of Mr. Kennedy, who, in his Report said,—

“That he could not but attribute the main educational work effected in England (since 1843) to their zeal and labour, aided by the more wise and religiously-disposed members of their flock, but still essentially their work—theirs in scheme and design, in the collection of the funds, in careful supervision, and in many cases in actual teaching.”

He admitted that the laity had not aided this work by their exertions and their funds so energetically as they ought to have done; for, after all, the great point was to foster this voluntary spirit, which was daily gaining more advocates in that House, and therefore in the country. The great difficulty seemed to be the early age at which the children left the school, but it was quite a mistake to think that difficulty could be got over by an educational rate or by compulsory attendance; so long as children could begin at thirteen years of age to earn as good wages as were given to pupil teachers, it was quite impossible to insure their whole attendance at school. And, after all, the industrial teaching which they got in the work-shops, in the mill, or on the farm, was quite as important a part of their education to them as reading and writing. If this industrial education could be combined with the elementary instruction of reading, writing, and arithmetic, without attempting to carry them to the higher branches, which it was more for themselves to attain, the chief difficulty would be solved, for that difficulty was how to give the child instruction without withdrawing him from profitable employment. Young people were applying their industry to the best possible object when they were applying it to getting their own living, and the point was to add to that moral and religious education. On a future occasion he hoped to be able to explain at length the grounds of his objection to an educational rate, to which he believed the best friends of education would be found uniformly opposed. From what he had read of the Reports of the inspectors, he was convinced that there was a steady uniform educational progress, and he thought that might be best furthered by a system which fostered the voluntary energy of the people under a close and efficient Government supervision.

MR. W. EWART explained that he had not meant in the least to undervalue the labours of the clergy. What he had said was that it would be fortunate if they would attend to the moral instruction of the women, and more particularly the younger class of females, so as to prepare them for other education.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE thought it extremely inconvenient to include the elementary education and the scientific education under one class of Votes. The administration of the elementary educational Votes would soon be as much as the present department could manage, and the Votes for scientific and art education and schools of design would come far more legitimately under a department of public works, fine arts, and science, than it would under the organization of the Committee of Council.

MR. COWPER, in reply, acknowledged that the hon. Member for East Surrey (Mr. Alcock) had shown good reason why these capitation grants and payments to pupil teachers might be increased with advantage to the schools. It was not possible for him, however, to adopt the hon. Member's suggestion, as it was contrary to the general principle on which the Committee of Council acted, which was to get the maximum advantage at the minimum expenditure. That seemed to be attained by the present arrangement. The suggestion thrown out by the hon. Member for Herts was well worthy of consideration, but the ground on which the pupil teachers only received payment for twelve months was because the time was arranged from one inspection to another. The right hon. Member for Droitwich had complained that the education afforded in district schools was exceedingly imperfect. He (Mr. Cowper) found, however, in the Report of Mr. Tufnell, a comparison between the acquirements of the children educated in those schools and the acquirements of persons who were candidates for appointments in the civil service. Mr. Tufnell adopted as his test the words that had been misspelt by candidates for Government appointments, and he stated that in two of the district schools, containing seventy children, sixteen spelt the words correctly, nineteen committed one error each, eleven committed two errors each, and only one boy committed nine errors. It appeared, therefore, that these children, who were below twelve years of age, were better able to spell than many persons who had been educated in middle or upper class schools, and whose ages ranged between seventeen and forty years. He (Mr. Cowper) must say he believed that much better elementary education in reading, writing, and arithmetic was afforded in the district schools than in many of the middle and upper class schools. It was quite true, as the right hon. Member for Droitwich had stated, that schools of which a favourable report was not given by the inspectors did not receive any grants.

MR. MAGUIRE said, it was well the Committee should know that the fault lay less with the parents than with the culpable indifference of the class that called itself foremost. Mr. Kennedy, in reporting upon the educational state of Lancashire and the Isle of Man, said that comparatively few persons in Lancashire felt any real concern to see the people at large educated; that a few persons made a good deal of noise on the subject, but a still smaller number carried on the work liberally and zealously; and that the mass of persons were still hostile, or at best indifferent, on the matter. "A public feeling in Lancashire for education," said Mr. Kennedy, "has yet to be created." He (Mr. Maguire) asked what answer hon. Gentlemen connected with Lancashire could give to this damning indictment against them. It had been stated the other day by Prince Albert that out of 5,000,000 children in this country, between the ages of eight and fifteen, only 2,800,000 in England and Wales received any education whatever. He (Mr. Maguire) thought such a state of things was most disgraceful, and ought to make Englishmen pause before they indulged in taunts with regard to the system of education adopted in other countries. He considered that the statement of Mr. Kennedy as to the state of things in Lancashire was a complete answer to the advocates of the voluntary system of education, and that nothing could be better than the plan now in operation under Government supervision, which afforded ample room for voluntary efforts in particular localities.

MR. AKROYD said, he thought the only portion of the estimate to which any well-founded objection could be made was the capitation allowance. He took deep interest in this subject, and believed that any measures which tended to raise the standard or pupil teachers would be attended with most beneficial results.

MR. CHEETHAM denied the accuracy of the statement quoted by the hon. Member for Dungarvon (Mr. Maguire) from Mr. Kennedy's Report, and observed that there were few places in the kingdom which could boast of more public institutions devoted to educational purposes than Manchester and the other large manufacturing towns of Lancashire. He was convinced that the general establishment of Sunday schools had been attended with the utmost advantage to the mass of the manufacturing population, and if he had to choose between conflicting methods of instruction, he should prefer the method adopted in those schools.

MR. GARNETT also defended Lancashire from the imputation cast upon it in the extract read by the hon. Member (Mr. Maguire). In the county town which he (Mr. Garnett) represented there was a national school which Mr. Kennedy himself said was a model school for England. The extraordinary assemblage of 80,000 children to greet Her Majesty when on a visit to Lancashire testified that the people of that county were not so insensible to the cause of education as had been attempted to be shown.

VISCOUNT MELGUND said, they had heard nothing as to the feeling with respect to this Vote in Scotland. He was convinced that the system now in operation would never have received the sanction of the people of Scotland if it had been introduced by a Bill before that House; and he did not see why this important matter should be provided for by annual Vote when other things of less importance were settled by Act of Parliament. The system was sectarian in its character and productive of many evils in that respect. In the county with which he was connected (Roxburgh) the United Presbyterians, who were more numerous than the Free Church and the Established Church, did not take advantage of this grant. Believing that the Vote ought not to be increased, he moved as an Amendment that it be reduced by the sum of £90,020, being the increase as compared with 1856.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £271,213, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge for Public Education in Great Britain, to the 31st day of March 1858."

MR. AYRTON rose to address the Committee, but being met by loud cries for a division, moved, That the Chairman do report progress.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON hoped, after the interesting discussion that had taken place, that the hon. Member would not press his Motion, but allow the Committee to come to a conclusion upon the Vote.

MR. HADFIELD hoped his hon. Friend (Mr. Ayrton) would not withdraw his Motion. Those who opposed the Vote had had no opportunity of expressing their opinions. It was impossible to do justice to such a subject after half-past Nine o'clock, the hour at which the discussion began. ["Divide, divide!"]

Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report progress, and ask leave to sit again," put, and negatived.

Question again proposed.

MR. HADFIELD repeated that no opportunity had been given to those opposed to the Vote to express their opinions, and moved that the Chairman leave the Chair.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON hoped his hon. Friend would not press that Motion, which, if carried, would close altogether that Committee of Supply.

MR. HADFIELD said, he had been driven to make the Motion. It was a case of necessity. ["Divide!"]

MR. DILLWYN complained that by the hasty way in which the Chairman had decided the Motion to report progress of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) to have been negatived, the hon. Member, he (Mr. Dillwyn), and others on that side of the House, who would have supported him, had been precluded from going to a division. When the Chairman, after putting the question, said the "Noes had it," he (Mr. Dillwyn) and his hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Hadfield) cried out that the "Ayes had it," but in the confusion of the moment the Chairman did not appear to have heard them, and decided against them.

LORD JOHN MANNERS was understood to say that he distinctly heard the hon. Member (Mr. Dillwyn) say the "Ayes had it" after the question was put.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair," put, and negatived.

Question again proposed.

MR. DILLWYN said, he supposed he should be now in order if he moved that the Chairman report progress, and he moved accordingly.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report progress, and ask leave to sit again," put, and negatived.

Question put, "That a sum, not exceeding £271,213, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge for Public Education in Great Britain, to the 31st day of March 1858."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 7; Noes 163: Majority 156.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

The House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow.

Committee to sit again To-morrow.

HARBOURS OF REFUGE—COMMITTEE.

MR. WILSON moved the nomination of the Select Committee to inquire into this subject.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. WILSON be one of the Members of the Select Committee on Harbours of Refuge."

MR. E. ELLICE (St. Andrews) opposed it. If the Committee were appointed at all it should be referred to the Committee of Selection for nomination. He would move that the nomination be deferred for six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the nomination of the Select Committee on Harbours of Refuge be postponed," instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. KINNAIRD also opposed the nomination of the Committee at present, and seconded the Amendment.

MR. CHEETHAM concurred in desiring postponement.

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE, as it was now a quarter to Two o'clock, moved that the debate be adjourned.

MR. PEASE hoped that no unnecessary delay would take place in the appointment of the Committee.

LORD ADOLPHUS VANE-TEMPEST also supported the appointment of the Committee.

LORD NAAS recommended the postponement of the Committee.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Debate be now adjourned," put, and negatived.

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Ordered, That Mr. WILSON be one of the Members of the Select Committee on Harbours of Refuge.

MR. LOWE, MR. BARING, LORD NAAS, LORD ADOLPHUS VANE-TEMPEST, MR. KENDALL, MR. LIDDELL, SIR FREDERICK SMITH, MR. PHILIPS, MR. HASSARD, MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH, SIR ROBERT FERGUSON, MR. JOHN HENRY GURNEY, MR. TRAILL, and LORD JOHN HAY, nominated other Members of the said Committee:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records:—Five to be the quorum.

House adjourned at a quarter after Two o'clock.

DISTRIBUTION OF THE VICTORIA CROSS.

OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE said, that having seen a notification that tickets for admission to places to witness the ceremony of distributing the Cross of Valour could be obtained by application to the Quartermaster General's Department, he had applied, but had not received an answer—no doubt because the number of tickets was exhausted; but he thought it rather hard that as 6,000 or 7,000 persons had been admitted to places, a Member of their Lordships' House was unable to obtain one.

LORD PANMURE said, no doubt there was a general understanding that tickets of admission could be obtained on application to the Quartermaster General, and many Members of both Houses of Parliament having applied got tickets. He hoped the noble Earl would make some allowance for what had occurred, when he stated that 20,000 applications for tickets had been received, and Sir Richard Airey had been obliged to apologize by advertisement for not answering all the letters he had received.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, he had had the advantage of possessing a ticket, and had enjoyed every possible convenience, so that on personal grounds he had no reason to complain ; but he thought it an error that in cases of this sort Members of that House should have to apply for tickets to a subordinate officer. He did not make any complaint against Sir Richard Airey, but he thought on occasions like these Peers and Members of the House of Commons ought always to have accommodation provided for them in their collective capacity. It had always been the practice to do so ; it was so at Lord Nelson's funeral ; it was so at the Duke of Wellington's funeral ; and he thought it was not a very dignified course for their Lordships and Members of the other House to be applying, as a matter of individual favour, for that which ought to be granted as of course to Members of both Houses of Parliament.

LORD VIVIAN said, that less mindful than many Members of the House of Commons, he had not applied to the Quarter-master General, and at the last hour he was obliged to get a ticket from another quarter ; and he could say that it was impossible that any arrangements on the ground could have been better than those which had been made.

PROSELYTISM IN IRELAND—THE KILKENNY MAGISTRATES.

SELECT COMMITTEE MOVED FOR.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON rose to call the attention of the House to the Conduct of certain Justices acting in the City of Kilkenny, and to move for a Select Committee to inquire into and report upon the same. The noble Viscount said that he was fully aware of the invidious nature of the task which he had undertaken, and nothing but a strong sense of duty had led him to undertake it ; because, although it was never a pleasing thing to become the accuser of any class of persons, it was especially disagreeable when those persons were public functionaries. Therefore, in bringing the subject before their Lordships, he should avoid as much as possible going into details. In the month of January, 1856, several Scripture readers were assaulted and very much injured in the streets of Kilkenny by a mob of Roman Catholics. The case was brought before the justices of Kilkenny. Those justices were the mayor, Mr. E. Smithwick, Mr. Potter, Mr. Marshall, and Mr. Cullen, all Roman Catholics ; Mr. Greene, the stipendiary magistrate, his brother, Mr. Newport Greene, and Lord James Butler, Protestants. In the course of the case Mr. Smithwick took a very decided course against the Scripture readers. That gentleman appeared more in the character of an advocate than of one of the justices ; and he endeavoured to make out that the Scripture readers had posted upon the walls of the town offensive placards against the Roman Catholic religion. He inquired of Mr. Curtis, the superintendent of police, whether he had sent out Roman Catholic police to take part in the matter in which the Scripture readers were concerned. The answer of Mr. Curtis was, that he had sent out the police in their proper turn, without reference to their religious creed. Upon that Mr. Smithwick observed that it was a most improper thing to do ; and that he, being a Roman Catholic, would have disobeyed the order—he considered that any Roman Catholic constable was justified in disobeying such an order. He (Viscount Dungannon) asked whether any magistrate was justified in making use of such an expression ? It was true that he modified the observation on a subsequent day, but in his opinion that modification amounted to a distinction without a difference. During the examination of a Mr. M'Neill, one of the witnesses, Mr. Wynne, a Roman Catholic attorney, said to him, without being checked by any of the justices except Lord James Butler, " Go down, sir ; I should be very sorry to be near you with any money in my pocket." The inquiry was afterwards adjourned to the 20th of the same month, when the case was dismissed upon the ground that the magistrates were indisposed to believe what the Scripture readers had stated. Lord James Butler, however, declared that, in his opinion, the cases of assault had been fully established. Mr. Smithwick upon this occasion stated, in explanation, he did not mean to say the constables should have disobeyed the order, but that he thought it very wrong to send out Roman Catholic constables to protect those who were the enemies of their faith, and to hear things which would be insulting to their religion. No proof had been afforded that anything insulting to the religion of the Roman Catholics had been uttered by the Scripture readers. He would not enter upon the question how far it was advisable or otherwise to send forth those Scripture readers among the Roman Catholics, but their vocation was a lawful one, and so long as they kept within the bounds of the law they were entitled to protection. Here he could not help calling attention to the social position of some of these persons, who had been entrusted with commissions of the peace. Two of them kept small shops, in which they sold drams and whisky. The mayor also kept a small grocery shop in which whisky was sold. Mr. Smithwick was a brewer, and in a better position of life, but still, like his brother magistrates, not fitted by education to discharge the duties of a magistrate. He did not mean to say that the Roman Catholics must necessarily be wrong, and the Protestants right; but he could not help looking with more confidence to such men as Lord James Butler and Messrs. Greene, than to persons of such station as those to whom he had been referring. He wished he could have done with Mr. Smithwick here, but he should have to bring that gentleman before them in a still more objectionable light. In January of the present year two boys, twelve and thirteen years of age, while going about distributing tracts, were cruelly and severely beaten with a whip by a man named James Ryan, in the employ of Mr. Smithwick. He was brought before the bench on a charge of assaulting them. Mr. Smithwick gave evidence to the effect that he believed the man was utterly incapable of the act imputed to him, and then sat upon the bench and adjudicated upon the matter. A letter was afterwards written to a newspaper by Mr. Newport Greene, the stipendiary magistrate, saying that the decision was directly contrary to the evidence. He appealed to noble Lords whether, if such an act had been committed by any magistrate in this country as that of adjudicating upon a case in which he was directly or indirectly interested, he would not merely be cautioned and reprimanded, but struck off from the commission of the peace? There was also another charge of assault against several parties, and although evidence was given by the police of the extreme ill-usage which the prosecutors received, all of them were acquitted except one, who admitted that he had struck and tripped up one of the complainants. That person was convicted, but only fined 6*d*. Those three cases showed, at least, a disregard of the rules of justice, which would fully warrant the inquiry for which he intended to move. The impartial administration of justice was everywhere most essential, but more especially was it essential in that country where, lamentable as might be the fact, party feeling of a religious character prevailed, and nothing would tend more to lower the courts of petty session in the estimation of the public, than the idea that in any case pending between a Roman Catholic and a Protestant, the result must depend on whether a majority of justices of one persuasion or the other might chance to sit on the bench at the time. He asked for even-handed justice to all classes, of whatever religious persuasion they might be.

Moved, "That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into and report on the Conduct of certain Justices acting in the City of Kilkenny."

EARL GRANVILLE said, he need scarcely assure their Lordships that his noble Friend the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland was as anxious to extend even-handed justice to all classes of Her Majesty's subjects in that country as the noble Viscount himself could be, and he believed no departure from that principle had taken place in the cases to which the noble Lord had called attention. The statement made by the noble Lord in reference to the charge against Mr. Smithwick was substantially the same as the report which appeared at the time in The Kilkenny Moderator. The Lord Lieutenant having had his attention directed to that report, called upon Mr. Smithwick for an explanation; whereupon that gentleman wrote a letter stating that the report of what he had said on the 12th was quite incorrect, and what he had said on the 19th was much misrepresented; that a great deal of what he said was omitted, and much more misrepresented, and that the expressions attributed to him by the reporter he had never used. This explanation was accepted by the Lord Lieutenant as satisfactory; but he wrote at the same time to say that had it not been so he should have taken other steps. It would be a great mistake to interfere with the administration of justice by the local authorities without sufficient grounds. In the other case a trivial assault was committed; it was disposed of by the magistrates, and no complaint was made to the Government by the party who might be supposed to be aggrieved by the decision; but at a subsequent period a body of gentlemen calling themselves the Protestant Association, but whom the Protestants of Ireland repudiated as representing them, took up the matter and made this charge against the magistrates. That being the case, the Government did not consider there was any ground for inquiry. With regard to the Scripture readers, he thought it was a point worthy the consideration of those excellent men who desired to propagate the true faith of the Protestant religion amongst the Roman Catholics of Ireland, that they should pay some attention to the manner in which some of the persons they employed endeavoured to carry out the holy cause in which they were engaged. He (Earl Granville) had letters in his possession from chief constables and other functionaries, showing that the Scripture readers were in the habit of stopping Roman Catholics in the public thoroughfares, denouncing and ridiculing the peculiar tenets of the religion which their listeners professed, and thrusting their tracts upon unwilling passers by, interlarding their discourse generally with attacks on Her Majesty's Government. Their Lordships, he thought, would agree with him, that this was not the mode of propagating the Protestant faith amongst the Irish Roman Catholics, but that, on the contrary, it was the most likely means of exciting the public mind, and occasioning breaches of the public peace. To hold out the slightest encouragement of protection to persons engaged in proceedings of this character would therefore be most imprudent, and he would advise those who felt an interest in the progress of our religion to watch narrowly the conduct of these persons, and to check this excess of zeal. It was a very difficult matter for Government to afford protection to such persons, because the very fact of such protection enabled and encouraged them to persevere in offensive denunciations of the religion of their auditory. The one charge referred to by the noble Lord it appears was founded in error, and the other having been disposed of by the magistrate, and no complaint having been made by the parties themselves, he submitted that there was no case for interference on the part of the Government or of their Lordships. It must not be supposed that in these cases the Roman Catholic magistrates were always wrong and the Protestants always right, even were it possible for the Government to make any distinction either upon religious or personal grounds. They could not place more reliance on one magistrate than another because he happened to be a Protestant, or because he happened to belong to a high and wealthy family. He trusted that their Lordships would agree with him that no ground for an inquiry had been made out.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, that the noble Earl had failed in meeting the allegations of his noble Friend. The charges did not appear to be of a very grave nature; but two cases had been brought forward which, supposing the facts stated by his noble Friend to be correct, showed gross partiality on the part of a certain magistrate; and admitting that the superior credibility of one magistrate over another was a question that the Government could not entertain, much less a Committee of that House, still he thought the statement of his noble Friend demanded some more explicit answer than it had received. Mr. Smithwick, having been called upon to explain the language he used, it appeared contented himself with saying that the report was incorrect, and that what he said had been misrepresented by the newspaper; but it would have been more satisfactory if he had gone a little further and stated what he did say, and left others to judge of their effect. The important fact that he came forward and gave a character to the accused, and then as a magistrate gave his casting vote in his favour, was not denied; and supposing that such a circumstance actually took place, he must say it was one that was calculated to cast suspicion on the due administration of justice by the local tribunals of Ireland. It appeared to him that the subject was one that demanded more investigation than it had received; but he was not prepared to say that questions of this kind ought to be inquired into by Committees of that or the other House of Parliament. The proper course of proceeding was by reference to the Court of Queen's Bench in Ireland, and he was surprised that that course had not been adopted. One of the faults of the administration of justice in Ireland was that in every case of doubt or difference the Government was appealed to, and the impression generally prevailing that the result of such appeals depended upon the political feeling of those in high office. This was a great evil, and went far to destroy the independence of the local judicial authorities. He presumed his noble Friend did not intend to press his Motion for a Committee, which was one he (the Earl of Derby) could not support; but he thought his noble Friend was fully justified in bringing the case under their Lordships' attention, as one that demanded searching investigation on the part of the Government.

THE MARQUESS OF WESTMEATH said, that the practice of resorting to the Executive in Ireland as a court of redress in cases where the administration of justice was concerned had grown into an enormous evil. The principle of the Government ought to be to discourage such appeals, and to throw the full weight of their proper responsibilities upon the magistracy of the country. Perhaps, if that was done, a little less anxiety would be shown for the attainment of the commission of the peace and a greater ambition to become acquainted with the duties of magistrates. Cases like that brought forward by the noble Viscount that evening had been of late years of very frequent occurrence in Ireland, and he thought he was justified in saying that, primâ facie, they invariably put the Roman Catholic clergy in the wrong. For these Scripture readers were men whose characters had been closely scrutinized before their appointment to office; and, as far as his experience went, he must say they performed their duties in an inoffensive manner. On the other hand, they were habitually subjected to every species of malicious usage; as, for example, to having their garments covered with spittle. He mentioned that for the sake of justifying the missionaries, and to prove that where disturbances arose they could not fairly be attributed to them.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON, in reply, said he did not think that the noble Earl opposite had sufficiently met his statement, for he had made no reply whatever to the graver charge against Mr. Smithwick of having adjudicated in a case where his own servant was defendant. Still he would not press his Motion to a division, but content himself with expressing a hope that what occurred that evening in their Lordships' House would not be without its proper effect upon the country.

Motion (by Leave of the House) withdrawn.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE IN INDIA—PETITIONS.

THE EARL OF ALBEMARLE rose to present three petitions from the inhabitants of Calcutta; of British residents in Calcutta and the Mofussil districts of the Presidency of Fort William in Bengal, and not in the service of the East India Company; and landed proprietors, Indigo planters and merchants and traders in Calcutta, and the lower provinces of Bengal; against the abolition of Her Majesty's Supreme Court of Calcutta. The prayers of those petitions were in some degree different, but they all concurred in condemning those changes in the criminal law of India which were understood to be in contemplation, and which were recommended by the Indian Law Commissioners. Those changes would affect nearly every principle to which the people of this country attached importance. They would affect the implied conditions upon which British subjects had been induced to invest their capital in India, and would, if carried out, have the effect of driving most of the wealthy capitalists from the country. The petitioners were active, intelligent men, by whose exertions the resources and wealth of India had been developed, who sent annually £13,000,000 worth of produce to this country, besides £7,000,000 in one article—opium—to China. Upon that article they paid taxes which realized £3,500,000 a year, and without which the Indian Government would be reduced to a state of complete bankruptcy, its normal condition being a deficit of £2,000,000 annually. The petitioners complained of two sets of measures; one was actually under the consideration of the Legislative Council of India—the creation of a new procedure. To that the petitioners offered no objection, believing that any procedure must be an improvement upon the discreditable state of anarchy in which the courts of that country had been for nearly a century. They did, however, object that a new class of magistrates was to be created, and that British residents would be deprived of the protection of the laws of their country, if the functions of the Supreme Court were to be handed over to the magistrates and police of the Mofussil or Provincial Courts. The petitioners objected to the amalgamation of the Supreme Court and the Sudder Courts—that was of the Queen's and the Company's Courts—believing that the effect of that amalgamation would be not to raise the Sudder Courts to the estimation of the Supreme Court, but to lower the condition of the British residents in India to the miserable condition in which the Natives were now placed. The petitioners further objected to being deprived of the writ of Habeas Corpus and of trial by jury, as recommended by the Commissioners. The petitioners claimed, as heretofore, an exemption from the criminal jurisdiction of the country courts, until those courts should be presided over by competent and professionally qualified judges. After the comments which had already been made upon the report of the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal, it was unnecessary to quote much evidence; but, in order to show the unanimity which prevailed upon this subject, he (the Earl of Albemarle) would just read an extract from one of the petitions:—

“The criminal courts of the East India Company have been the dread and terror of the people. They are used as instruments of outrage and persecution. Convictions in them are regarded as evidence as much of misfortune as of guilt.”

These courts gave immunity to the gang robber, and were terrible only to the innocent. The gang robber knew, to borrow the words of the Lieutenant Governor, that “the administration of criminal justice in India is considered a mere lottery, in which the prizes are in favour of the guilty.” That fact was also known to his unhappy victim. Although proverbially disposed to litigation and little inclined to show mercy to those who had injured them, the Bengalese could hardly ever be persuaded to prosecute for robbery, “from the full conviction,” to borrow again the words of the Lieutenant Governor, “that the guilty men will be acquitted in the teeth of the clearest evidence.” Mr. Halliday stated that very few of the heinous offenders were brought to justice at all. Of every 4,000 persons charged with heavy crimes one-half eventually escaped. That was not owing to the want of evidence, for evidence was too easily procurable; but because the magistrates and judges were perfectly conversant with the manner in which the evidence was obtained, knowing the torture that was inflicted upon the prisoner and the witness. He would give one example of the mode in which evidence was got up as stated by Mr. Kenny, an indigo planter, at a great public meeting held to petition against the “Black Act,” as the measure with which the British subjects were threatened was universally called in India. Mr. Kenny related that in the village in which he resided, the body of a boy was found hanging to a tree. The circumstance was reported to the superintendent of police, and by him was brought under the notice of the magistrate. The latter took it into his head that the boy had been murdered, and told the superintendent that he was to bring the murderer before him within seven or eight days or to resign his office. The superintendent returned to the village and selected the master of the boy as the murderer. The man denied it. He was put to the torture, but persisted in declaring his innocence. The superintendent then seized upon an old woman in the neighbourhood. She was tied down; fire was applied to her nostrils and other tortures were resorted to which he could not describe to their Lordships unless they ordered the reporters to withdraw. The superintendent gained his object; the woman criminated the man, and both were brought before the magistrate. The woman then stated, that all she had said was under the influence of torture, and the magistrate dismissed the case, with a slight reprimand to the superintendent, telling him to be more cautious for the future. Plenty of similar cases might be brought before their Lordships; and it was with such administrators of the law that the British inhabitants of India were now threatened. Having now described the evil, he would proceed respectfully to suggest the remedy. He would suggest that the law should be administered by professional lawyers, and that there should be courts in proportion to the population and the area, including Benares, Patna, and other great commercial towns. He should also like to see unpaid magistrates, Native and European, wherever procurable; and he believed that if the courts were presided over by professional Judges, there would be no difficulty in finding an unpaid magistracy. He wished it to be distinctly understood that these courts should be open, entirely independent, and placed on the same footing as the Supreme Courts of our own country. He had high authority for stating that the lex loci should be the law of England. This was no new experiment. The law of England had been tried in four different countries. Persons of every religion, and of almost every nationality, had come under its influence, and it had given universal satisfaction from the security it offered to liberty and property, and the readiness with which it might be adapted to native laws and customs. But, it might be asked, how did he propose to pay the expenses of these works? The answer was a simple and obvious one—namely, that the same remuneration which was given to the incapable and incompetent boy-judges who now administered injustice should be continued to the professional lawyers. We now sent a young man of twenty out to India—a paid covenanted servant—for judicial employment. Till be reached the age of thirty, he could not properly be placed upon the bench. After twelve years more he was entitled to a retiring pension, so that while we paid him for twenty-two years' service he did only twelve years' work. The professional lawyer, on the other hand, educated himself; and he had reason to believe, from inquiries which he had made, that there were many gentlemen belonging to the English, Scotch, and Irish bars who would be perfectly ready to go out, provided they received the same salaries and retiring pensions that were now enjoyed by the servants of the East India Company. With these remarks, in the full conviction that the importance of the subject was recognised by Her Majesty's Ministers, he would lay the petitions on the table, unaccompanied by any Motion, hoping that the hands of the Legislative Council would be stayed until the question had been brought before their Lordships by one more competent to deal with it than himself.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE regretted to be obliged to infer from the silence of the Government that no progress was really being made in the decision of what he would venture to call the most important branch of the great Indian question. The state of India now was such that British capital, enterprise, and skill could alone be expected to develop its resources, restore its finance, and make it a valuable possession, instead of a burden upon this country. The advice given the other day by the Chairman of the Court of Directors to the merchants and manufacturers of Manchester—that they ought themselves to extract a supply of cotton from the soil of India—was very sound and judicious; but the great impediment to the establishment in India of indigo planters and cotton speculators was the maladministration of justice. British people would not venture their persons or embark their property where they had not the protection of good laws. He differed from the petitioners upon one important point. They prayed that no alteration should be made in the Supreme Court. He thought the Supreme Court ought to be amalgamated with the Sudder Courts. The Supreme Court gave universal satisfaction to Europeans and Natives, and it was as good as the Company's Courts were bad. He wanted to know why, after the amalgamation had been announced by Sir Charles Wood, years ago, it had not taken place? It was said that it was necessary to refer the matter to the Legislative Council in India. From that opinion he dissented, and he reminded the noble Earl (the Earl of Ellenborough) who on a former occasion had expressed his concurrence in it, that in 1833 he entertained a different view. Upon the ground of retaining the independent character of the Supreme Court, which had greatly contributed to raise it in public estimation, he thought that Parliament was the place where such legislative acts ought to be done. He doubted, indeed, whether, legally, the Governor General and Legislative Council had power to touch the Supreme Court. A clause in the Act of 1833 provided that the Governor General should not have the power of making any laws or regulations which should in any degree affect any prerogative of the Crown or the authority of Parliament, and another clause provided that the Governor General should not abolish any of the courts of justice established by Royal charter. The Supreme Court was established by charter, and, therefore, the Governor General and Legislative Council had no power to abolish it. But if it were contrary to Statute Law to refer the power of amalgamation to the Governor General and Legislative Council in India he submitted that the only proper course was to legislate here. The Judges of the Company's Courts, it should be remembered, were civil servants, who had received no previous legal training. The present system was one, therefore, which, in his opinion, required alteration. He saw no reason why a man should be sent out to discharge the duties of a magistrate in India simply because he had been called to the bar in this country; and there were, he thought, various modes by which a person's practical knowledge of the administration of the law might be tested before he received any such appointment. The noble Duke the Postmaster General had, upon a former occasion, stated that lawyers in this country got no regular professional education. That might be the case; but such men were never made Judges; and he might add that the magistrates in India disposed of cases of life and death without possessing the same competence to the discharge of their important functions which existed in the case of those who performed similar duties in this country, and without being exposed to the exercise of the same degree of watchfulness upon the part of the public. We sent out our civil servants to be collectors of revenue, and if it was found that they were not sharp enough for that position they were made magistrates, and even Judges after the lapse of a certain time. The system was, in fact, one of the most objectionable character, and he was only surprised that it could have lasted for so long a period. There were in our Revenue and Customs Departments in England men who discharged their duties in a manner the most admirable, but who, he should like to know, had ever thought for a moment of allowing them to preside at the Old Bailey or in the Court of Common Pleas? It was no wonder that petitions were submitted to their Lordships praying for some modification of a state of things which operated as a great grievance in India, and he trusted the petitioners would receive at their hands that redress to which they were entitled. He would conclude by asking whether it was within the competency of the Legislative Council at Calcutta to repeal, alter, or nullify an Act of the Imperial Parliament, and to assume the powers of a perfectly independent Legislature, by rejecting Bills laid before them in pursuance of announcements made to Parliament by the Ministers of the Crown.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL deprecated these repeatedly recurring discussions on the subject of India. The question raised by these petitions was whether Parliament should act upon the recommendation of the Indian Law Commissioners as to the amalgamating of these courts; but, surely, Her Majesty's Government were not open to censure for not acting on that recommendation without due consideration. There was not that concurrence of opinion on the subject that the noble Marquess seemed to suppose. He had had sent to him a pamphlet which emanated from a gentleman who represented the interests of the Europeans residing in Bengal. It was stated that the Queen's Judges, the Company's Judges, as well as the Members of the Council, together with the writer himself, who represented himself as a lawyer and a law reformer, regarded the plan recommended by the Commissioners, as a whole, as crude and impracticable. If the Government in India were not competent to hit upon a plan for the formation of a new court, then it would be for the Imperial Legislature to take proceedings in the matter; but there was, he thought, good reason why Her Majesty's Ministers should suspend their judgment until they had received the Report of the Indian Government. His noble Friend asked whether it was within the competency of the Legislative Council at Calcutta to alter or nullify any Act of the Imperial Parliament. Of course it was not; but he (the Duke of Argyll) apprehended that there was nothing in any Imperial statute to prevent the Indian Government from making such changes in the Supreme Court as might seem to them to be expedient. They could not, indeed, abolish that court; but they might modify its constitution, or alter its jurisdiction. It had been enacted that it should not be lawful for the Governor General in Council, without the previous sanction of the Court of Directors, to create any new court with power of life or death over the subjects of Her Majesty. It was clear, therefore, that the Legislature had contemplated conferring upon the Indian Legislature, when acting with the consent of the Court of Directors, power to establish a new court which might deal with questions of life and death, and since the period to which he had referred a new Act had been passed greatly improving the constitution and character of the Indian Legislative Council; and, as no power granted by the former Act was repealed, it was plain that the intention of the Legislature had been that the Indian Legislature should have ample power of dealing with the subject. He would not enter into the difficult question as to how far it might be prudent to bring the European subjects of the Queen within the jurisdiction of the Native Courts. He believed that it was most expedient that in those courts great reforms should take place, and it might be doubted whether bringing the European subjects of the Queen within their jurisdiction might not tend, from the additional publicity which would be given to their proceedings, to improve the administration of justice in them. The great difficulty in the administration of justice in those courts arose not so much from the character of the Judges as from the character of the suitors with whom they had to deal. It was admitted in all the petitions which had been presented against these courts that the great evil which existed arose from the facility with which false evidence might be adduced in them, and it did not appear by any means certain that that facility might not be removed by the introduction of English subjects of the Queen as suitors. The question, however, was one of considerable difficulty, and one with regard to which a great difference of opinion prevailed among persons best informed upon the subject. He would not express on the present occasion any opinion upon the subject; but he must say that he thought that it would have been very imprudent for the Home Government to have legislated without referring the subject to the consideration of the Indian Legislature, and he had seen letters from Lord Canning, in which that nobleman expressed a distinct opinion that it would have been disrespectful to the new Legislature of India if the Home Government had proceeded to legislate without consulting them.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH: My Lords, I do not pretend to say that I have made myself master of the contents of the 500 pages of printed foolscap which contain the new code prepared by English lawyers for adoption by the Government of India, and I must confess that I have not the smallest intention of undertaking that labour; but I cannot imagine that any gentleman who prepared that code could ever have suggested the abolition of the Supreme Court in India. I cannot imagine that he can have done so, because the Legislative Council has not the slightest power of doing so. It has the power of altering the forms of proceeding in the Supreme Courts and their jurisdiction—a power conferred upon it by special provisions, but it has not the slightest power of abolishing them, and I cannot believe that the legal gentleman who prepared this new code can have thought that it was not intended by the Acts which have been passed upon the subject, to maintain, as courts of original jurisdiction in the capitals of the different Presidencies, the Supreme Courts. The most important questions which come before those courts are questions affecting the interests of the East India Company, and of gentlemen in their service; and, strange to say, whether it be from the badness of the advocates they employ, or from some other cause, the Government are almost invariably beaten. What the result might be if four or five gentlemen in the service of the East India Company were associated with the Judges of these courts, I cannot pretend to say. With regard to the general question, I believe the case to be, that there is no power of compelling the Legislative Council of India to pass any law whatever. Parliament has reserved to itself the right of directing the officers of the East India Company, under penalty of being guilty of a misdemeanour, to do what they are ordered to do; yet I do not think, looking to the whole of the Acts of Parliament, that there is any power of compelling the servants of the Company to do anything in a legislative capacity.

The Duke of Argyll

By the new constitution of the Legislative Assembly, it contains members who are not servants of the Company. There are two Judges, and there is the legal Member, who is appointed by the Crown, and it is especially enacted that no measure shall be passed in the absence of those gentlemen, so that a mere abstinence from attendance upon the part of those gentlemen would be sufficient to impede legislation. As regards the question of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Clanricarde) I can only say, what does the Government of India know of any Minister of the Crown? It knows nothing of the President of the Board of Control; it knows nothing of Queen, Lords, or Commons, unless they speak through an Act of Parliament. In fact, it knows nothing but the orders of the Court of Directors. No doubt, the Court of Directors act under a Minister of the Crown; but no one knows what he puts into their letters, or what he strikes out. Many things, no doubt, which have been viewed with considerable favour have emanated from him; but, on the other hand, with him may also have originated many things which have brought great unpopularity upon the Court of Directors, and which have arisen from the economical views of the Queen's Government; and we may, therefore, fairly lay down the rule that the Minister of the Crown is entirely unknown in India. I will not say anything more, except a few words, with regard to one topic which has been adverted to by the noble Duke. I fancied that the closing observations of the noble Duke indicated a disposition to concur with the proposal for placing Her Majesty's English subjects under the jurisdiction of the Native Courts, and I earnestly recommend him, and I recommend the Government, and I recommend Parliament, to use the most extreme caution before adopting any measure with a view to that object. We are a small number of persons in the midst of an immense population, and we cannot submit to any change which may, in the slightest degree, impair the ascendancy and supremacy of England. I do not give utterance to my own views alone, for I have heard similar views expressed in stronger language by the late Duke of Wellington, and I would farther press upon the consideration of the noble Duke the question, whether he believes that justice would be obtained in those courts. I do not. I incline to think no Native Judge, who had probably risen from nothing, and might return to nothing, would dare to decide against an Englishman going to his court with all the authority of his nation and of his energy of character; but, be that as it may, I trust that no step will be taken without the most careful consideration.

LORD CAMPBELL said, that the present state of the administration of justice in India, both as regarded Europeans and Natives, was most unsatisfactory. Europeans in the most remote provinces were amenable to no courts but those at the chief towns of the Presidencies, and while this was a great hardship to any of them who were prosecuted, it was a still greater hardship to those who had to prosecute them. In point of fact, if an European committed an offence at a distance from the seat of Government, there was no practical remedy whatsoever. It was now proposed that they should be subjected to the local courts. That was a most desirable measure if the local courts could be made competent to administer justice. The problem which had to be solved was the reformation of the local courts. Years, however, had passed away, and nothing had been done; and he was afraid that if this delay continued, the safety of our Indian empire might be compromised. Therefore, supporting the prayer of petitions which he had himself presented, he most earnestly implored Her Majesty's Government to take effectual measures for removing the grounds of these complaints.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, that he saw no objection to the establishment of circuits of European Judges. On the contrary, he thought that much good would result from the adoption of such a measure; but he thought that practically there would be much difficulty in obtaining substantial justice if resident planters had to go before their neighbours.

Petitions read, and ordered to lie on the table.

MINISTERS' MONEY (IRELAND) BILL.

THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading read.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 3<sup>a</sup>.

THE EARL OF CLANCARTY: * My Lords, in rising, as I gave notice, to move that the third reading of this Bill be deferred to this day six months, I am sensible of the great disadvantage under which I labour, in consequence of the declaration of the noble Earl, who is the acknowledged leader of the Conservative party in this House, that he would offer no further opposition to the Bill. The state of the House sufficiently indicates the influence which the noble Earl exercises over those that commonly act with him, an influence to which I am myself by no means insensible, arising, as it does, from his high character, combined with eminent abilities—and it is never without great hesitation and reluctance that I venture to separate from the noble Earl in the treatment of any political question; but deference to the opinion of another must have a limit; and, having maturely considered the case as it now stands of the Bill before the House, and my duty with regard to it, I feel that I should do injustice, no less to the force of my noble Friend's arguments against the Bill than to my own convictions, if I did not go on with that opposition to it which, as an hereditary counsellor of the Crown, it is my duty to offer to any measure that ought not to receive the Royal Assent. I certainly understood the noble Earl to say, when he addressed your Lordships on the second reading, that his opposition to the Bill would be uncompromising, and the very full House that heard him expressed by their votes their cordial approval of such opposition. Great indeed, then, was my surprise when, on the question of the Bill being committed, my noble Friend, almost in the same breath that he reiterated his objections to the measure, declared that he would not oppose its further progress. I deplore this decision, involving, as the Bill does, the most objectionable principles, and fraught as it is with wrong and injustice, it ought to have been opposed to the last, even if the deliberative voice of the House had been less unequivocally expressed in reprobation of it than it was upon the second reading. The noble Earl despaired of being able successfully to oppose the Bill; but I am quite sure that the more it received consideration, the less would be the support of it, and the greater the number of its opponents. But upon one point my noble Friend was certainly in error, when he said, when withdrawing his opposition, that he threw the responsibility of the Bill upon the Government. My Lords, you cannot shrink from the duty of rejecting the Bill, without involving yourselves in the responsibility of advising its enactment, and in that responsibility every noble Lord will be included who either votes for it or withholds from voting against it. The Government has, no doubt, much to answer for in having submitted such a measure to Parliament; but from the moment that it passes this House the responsibility of it will be upon your Lordships, and not upon the Government. Nor do I think the noble Earl was in a position to say when he withdrew from opposing the Bill, Liberavi animam meam. The great influence the noble Earl exercises in the deliberations of the House pointed him out as the only Member under whose leadership the House could be saved from the discreditable act of passing this Bill; when, therefore, he withdrew, his mission was yet unfulfilled. In the House of Commons, so recently elected by constituencies favourable to the Government, the ready acceptance of the Bill as a Government measure was no matter of surprise; but its acceptance by your Lordships, by whom its principle and provisions could be and were more carefully and fully considered, and whose bounden duty it is to prevent any wrongful measure from being submitted for the Royal Assent, will grievously disappoint public expectation, and especially those who have been wont to look with confidence to this branch of the Legislature as Conservative of the great Protestant institutions of the country. If your opposition to the Bill was to have been limited to a mere exposure of its deformities, and you were to have acquiesced in its adoption directly you had shown it to be one that you ought not to sanction, far better would it have been from the beginning not to have opposed it at all; better would it have been to have spared the Government the exposure of the weak and unstatesmanlike grounds upon which they recommended it, and to have kept out of view the true character of a measure so calculated to imperil the Protestant establishment, and to bring the law into contempt; far better would it have been simply to have passed it as a Bill of indemnity in behalf of a Government that had been unfaithful to the first of its duties, that of causing the law to be impartially and firmly administered; but the House—those I mean who attended in their places—having gone fully into the merits of the Bill and heard all that could be said in its favour, voted against having anything further to do with it; they declined giving the Government an act of indemnity—they told them it was their duty to uphold and vindicate the law, and, if necessary, to have it strengthened; they declined being a party to abstracting from the funds in the hands of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners the pittance by which the incomes of clergymen of less than £100 a year might be assisted; they refused to offer reward to those who disobeyed or resisted the law; they rejected the measure as one utterly unworthy to be entertained in this House. Having done all this, though your decision was overruled by the votes of thirty-six absent Peers, whose proxies were in the hands of the Government, your Lordships ought to have persevered in opposing the Bill. With reference to the use made of the proxies upon the occasion, I ventured, on the question of going into Committee on the Bill, to point out as a reason for not proceeding with it, that the form of the preamble was not in consistency with fact; that supposing the Bill to receive the Royal Assent, it could not truly be said to be “enacted by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal and Commons in Parliament assembled,” for this simple reason, that the Lords Spiritual and Temporal so assembled neither advised nor consented to, but, on the contrary, in a very full House by a majority of six rejected the Bill. Their decision was reversed, as I have already mentioned, by the proxies of thirty-six absent Peers, who may have known nothing about the measure that had been discussed, and who probably little thought that their unenlightened votes had been employed to set aside the result of the deliberations of the House, numbering 230 Peers present, and that the Crown was to be thus deprived in a most important act of legislation of the advice of the assembled Lords of Parliament. My Lords, I received no answer or explanation upon the point I had felt it my duty to submit for consideration. The Government, who, by calling for proxies after the assembled Peers had rejected the Bill, created the anomaly I complain of, may have wished it to pass unnoticed; but public opinion will not tolerate in the making of the laws by which this great country is to be governed, such an abuse of the privileges of the Peerage. I will not, my Lords, after the very full consideration that the provisions of this Bill have already undergone, trouble your Lordships by discussing them anew; but before I sit down I must advert to one argument, upon which reliance was chiefly placed by the Government in favour of the Bill. It was represented as a measure for the removal of a grievance from the Roman Catholics of Ireland. My Lords, I ask, does the Government admit it to be a grievance for a

Roman Catholic to be called upon to pay a demand subject to which he purchased his property, simply because the payment would be applied to the support of the Established religion? If this is to be considered a grievance from which relief may be claimed, what Roman Catholic owner of a bishop's lease, or what occupier of lands belonging to our Protestant collegiate institutions may not, with equal reason, claim to be relieved from the payment of the reserved rent? or, to take a case more exactly analogous to that under consideration, what payer of the tithe rent-charge is there that might not, with the encouragement held out to him by this Bill, refuse to pay? It is said that Mr. S. Herbert will derive great pecuniary benefit from this Bill. Is he an aggrieved Roman Catholic? Has he petitioned your Lordships for relief? Is there any evidence upon your table that the payment of ministers' money is regarded as a grievance? Has there been a single petition presented to your Lordships in favour of the Bill? No, my Lords, there lie upon the table no less than 108 petitions from different parts of Ireland, including some from members of the Presbyterian body, against the Bill, but not one in its favour. The only petitioners to your Lordships are Her Majesty's Ministers. They pray you to exonerate them from the grievance of having to enforce a collection that they have very improperly allowed to get into arrear; they pray you to absolve them from the responsibility they have thus incurred. They pray you to sanction them in laying hands upon a fund which the Ecclesiastical Commissioners are entrusted with for the building and repairing of churches and other important objects connected with the Protestant Establishment; and they pray you to sanction this monstrous injustice, not for any public object—not on account of any proved necessity—not on any ground that they have put forward, but to enable them to distribute to the constituencies of eight corporate towns, returning each one or more Members to Parliament, a sum of from £12,000 to £13,000 a year, abstracted from the revenues of the Established Church. Such at least, and no other, will be the practical effect of the Bill if it should become law. I do not think the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland would desire the meed of the unjust steward which the passing of this Bill would obtain for him. Its supporters will, no doubt, be gratified by being called "liberal Protestants," and the Government receive from that party in Ireland, which is returned to Parliament under the designation of the "independent opposition," whose avowed and primary object is the destruction of the Protestant Establishment, a large amount of Parliamentary support, for which, all unconsciously I would hope, they are paying so heavy a price. The Bill is one for the partial disendowment of the Established Church, and as such it will be gratefully acknowledged as an earnest of what may be further effected by resistance to the law. There is at present very little of agitation in Ireland, no more, in fact, than might reasonably be expected in a free country, where it is the right of every man—a right that I hope will always be freely exercised—to canvass the reasons and principles of the laws and institutions under which he lives. But by this Bill a stimulus will be given to agitation of a very different character: it will afford at once a precedent and encouragement to a systematic attack upon the temporalities of the Church, and thence upon the rights of property generally, and your power, and the power of the Government in meeting it, will be seriously impaired by the policy to which you will have committed yourselves upon this occasion. My Lords, I will not further detain you; I regret that the defence of the temporalities of the Church against this wanton act of aggression should have devolved upon one so weak and uninfluential as the individual who now addresses you. Circumstanced as I am in the opposition I am offering to the Bill, I apprehend that the Vote I purpose recording upon the present occasion will only serve as a personal vindication, a kind of protest against having any part or share in the perpetration of a great legislative wrong; that others, however, may have the like opportunity, I beg to move that the third reading of this Bill be deferred for six months.

Amendment moved, to leave out "now," and insert "this day six months."

THE EARL OF DERBY said, that he should briefly state the course he meant to pursue; but he neither intended to repeat his speech against the Bill, nor, on the other hand, to defend it, as the noble Earl appeared to imagine. Neither should he repeat the reasons he had given on a former occasion for relinquishing any further opposition to the Bill; but he begged to state that those reasons had received, in writing, the approbation of the most rev. Primate of all Ireland (the Archbishop of Dublin) to whom the noble Earl had referred on a former occasion, and who had approved of the course which he (the Earl of Derby) had taken, as the only course, in fact, which could be adopted. The noble Earl had spoken of the influence which he (the Earl of Derby) was supposed to possess as having prevented a greater attendance of Peers to oppose the Bill. Now, he had to assure the noble Earl that he had said nothing, except those few words which he had on a former occasion spoken in that House, to induce noble Lords to withdraw further opposition; and from the state of their Lordships' benches on his (the Earl of Derby's) side, the noble Earl could judge what proportion of the Peers who sat on that side had approved of his (the Earl of Derby's) opinion, and what proportion of them had adopted the views of the noble Earl. He should be sorry to have it supposed that he at all relaxed in his opposition to the Bill; he retained all his objections to it upon principle, and he found himself placed in this difficult position—that he could not possibly vote in favour of the Bill; while, on the other hand, he had given an assurance to the Government that he should not offer any further opposition to it, and the state of the House showed the reliance which Her Majesty's Ministers had placed upon his good faith. Under these circumstances he should not give them any reason to cast any reflection upon his good faith; and, therefore, he should not vote at all upon this occasion.

THE EARL OF WICKLOW said, it would be in the recollection of the House, that previous to going into Committee on this Bill he moved, on the part of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, that their petition to be heard by counsel at the bar against the measure should be complied with. In making that proposition he took occasion to refer to a statement made in the other House of Parliament by the late Secretary for Ireland (Mr. Horsman), as containing an exaggerated account of the funds in the hands of the Commissioners, and he intimated that possibly the majority obtained in the House of Commons had been very materially influenced by such a statement coming from so high an authority as the late Secretary for Ireland. In making those remarks, he at the same time observed that he did not mean to impeach in the slightest degree the integrity of the right hon. Gentleman, as he believed that he considered the documents on which he based his statement to be perfectly authentic; but this expression of his confidence in the right hon. Gentleman's integrity did not appear in the published reports of his speech. Mr. Horsman, on seeing his observations in the papers, wrote to him on the subject, and a correspondence took place which ended in his (the Earl of Wicklow) seeing the accounts and documents on which the right hon. Gentleman made his statement in the House of Commons; and he was, after seeing them, perfectly convinced that there was nothing in the statement made by the right hon. Gentleman which was not taken directly from the public accounts before him. To explain the manner in which these accounts came into his hands, Mr. Horsman sent him a letter which he would take the liberty to read to the House. [The noble Earl here read a letter from Mr. Horsman. It stated, in effect, that an important circumstance had been kept from the knowledge of his Lordship, that on the 29th of May, when the House of Commons went into Committee on the Bill, Mr. Hamilton, one of the Members for the University of Dublin, took him aside in the course of the evening, and, showing him papers with which he had been furnished by the Commissioners to make an explanatory statement said, it would be more agreeable to the Commissioners if that statement was made by him (Mr. Horsman); that in this request he acquiesced, and wrote down from Mr. Hamilton's dictation the statement he was to make on the part of the Commissioners to the House; that Mr. Hamilton assured him this course would be perfectly satisfactory to the Commissioners if he would undertake it, and that on this assurance he made the statement on behalf of the Commissioners to the surprise of many of his friends; that he was much surprised when he saw that the Earl of Wicklow had alluded to the subject in the House of Lords, as he could not bring himself to believe that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, on whose behalf his Lordship spoke, were capable of so gross a breach of faith after the assurance he had received that his statement would be perfectly satisfactory to them.] Now, he had appeared before their Lordships the other evening, and made use of documents, at the instance of the Commissioners, and to him it was perfectly incomprehensible, after reading the papers which he held in his hand, how the Commissioners could have thought of renewing the attack, or of asking him to do so. Mr. Horsman expressed his surprise, but his surprise was not greater than his own, for he need hardly say, that if he had known of such an arrangement as had been entered into with the right hon. Gentleman, he would not have taken the part which he did the other evening. He could assure their Lordships that it would be a long time before he took charge of a case again.

EARL GRANVILLE said, nothing could be more fair or straightforward than the statement just made by his noble Friend. He was certainly very much annoyed at the accusations made against Mr. Horsman the other evening; and it was his intention to make some reply on the third reading, after having ascertained the facts, until he found that Mr. Horsman had wisely put himself in communication with the noble Earl. In the name of Mr. Horsman he thanked the noble Earl for the fair and honourable course which he had now pursued. The noble Earl who had just quitted the House (the Earl of Derby) had left to Her Majesty's Government the further defence of the Bill. He knew that the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Clancarty) was not a man to be convinced by arguments. In this case, indeed, he did not wish to convince him. He had announced that it was his intention to divide the House on the third reading, and, wishing that the Bill might go forth so as to meet with general approbation in Ireland, he was glad that the division would be taken under circumstances which would be favourable to that result.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON repeated that he considered this so flagrant an act of spoliation of the Established Church, and as establishing so dangerous a precedent, that, however small might be the minority, he felt bound for the last time to record his vote against it.

THE MARQUESS OF WESTMEATH recommended the noble Viscount to withdraw his opposition, and leave the responsibility on the Government. All he proposed to do might be effected by a protest.

After a few words from the Earl of CLANCARTY,

On Question, That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Motion? their Lordships divided:—Contents 23; Not-Contents 7: Majority 16.

Resolved in the Affirmative: Bill read 3<sup>a</sup> accordingly: Amendments moved, and negatived; and Bill passed.

MINISTERS' MONEY (IRELAND) BILL.

Against the Third Reading.

DISSENTIENT—1. "Because the Act 17 & 18 Chas. II. c. 7, for the Kingdom of Ireland, was applicable to every city and corporate town in Ireland, and created a moderate charge on the houses of all Protestants as well as Roman Catholics. Subject to which charges ever since the passing of the said Act all such property has been dealt with and valued, and it would have been better again to change the collectors and mode of collection by Act of Parliament, providing for a redemption of the said tax than to put the law into operation and then suspend all proceedings against defaulters, who are more favoured by an exemption from this tax than those who have obeyed the law.

2. "Because the withdrawal of this payment will render it more difficult to obtain the consent of Protestants to any future payment by the State of Roman Catholic priests (if such a measure should be hereafter contemplated), and may tend to strengthen the opposition to the Maynooth Grant, and thereby greatly retard the enlightenment of such priests, whose conduct at elections and whose influence as to scripture readers is such, as better-educated men probably would not exhibit, and which conduct and influence ought not to be encouraged and increased by concessions as a direct reward for disobedience to the law.

3. "Because this Act was passed in a House consisting of fewer Members thereof than are together usually elsewhere considered sufficient to constitute a deliberative assembly, and, therefore, it fails to establish the full evidence of hearty goodwill to the Irish people, which should accompany every measure relating to them.

“DENMAN.”

House adjourned at half past Eight o'clock, to Monday next, Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, June 26, 1857.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1° Probates and Letters of Administration (Ireland); Glebe Lands (Ireland); East Quay Wall Tax (Dublin).

2° Probates and Letters of Administration; Crown, &c. Suits (Scotland); Bankruptcy and Real Securities (Scotland); Bill Chamber (Scotland); Christchurch (West Hartlepool).

3° Hanley Borough Incorporation; Consolidated Fund (£8,000,000).

COMMON LAW COMMISSION—QUESTION.

MR. M'MAHON said, he would beg to ask the right hon. Member for Droitwich (Sir J. Pakington), When the Commission appointed to inquire into the present arrangements for transacting the judicial business, Civil and Criminal, of the Superior Courts of Common Law is likely to make its Report; and whether he has any expectation that such Report may be made in time to have a measure founded upon it introduced in the present Session?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON replied, that the Common Law Commission were now considering their Report, which he had no doubt would be presented before the termination of the present Session. He was, however, afraid that he was hardly able to answer the latter part of the hon. and learned Gentleman's question, because he did not yet know what amount of legislation the Common Law Commission might recommend, nor what might be the duration of the present Session.

LIFE INSURANCE—QUESTION.

MR. KER SEYMER said, he wished to ask the Secretary of the Treasury, Whether he intends to name an early day for the introduction of his promised measure on Life Insurance Offices?

MR. WILSON said, he was very anxious to bring in a Bill on this subject, but as it was likely to give rise to some discussion, it was very undesirable that it should be introduced at an unseasonable hour. He should have wished to bring in the Bill that evening, but the crowded state of the notice paper rendered it improbable that he could do so before midnight, and he was afraid that hon. Members would object to its being proceeded with at so late an hour.

LAND-TAX COLLECTORS—QUESTION.

MR. WILSON moved that the House at its rising do adjourn until Monday.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he would take that opportunity of asking the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether Members for boroughs will have equal right with Members for counties to recommend persons' names to be inserted in the Land Tax Commissioners Bill to be introduced this Session? He asked the question, because, having recently recommended some of his constituents as fit for that situation, a letter was sent to him from the Treasury, stating that the recommendations ought to have been signed by a Member for the county of Surrey. He had been a Member of that House upwards of twenty years, and that was the first occasion on which he discovered that there was any distinction between the privileges of borough and county Members.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, the distinction between county and borough Members with reference to the matter alluded to by the hon. Gentleman was not arbitrarily established by the Government, nor did it depend upon the Government to enforce or relax it. It was established by an Act of Parliament, and so long as that Act continued in force, he apprehended that Her Majesty's Government had no choice but to obey the law; and with regard to any course which the hon. Member had pursued and intended to pursue, he submitted that if borough Members were equal with county Members, one of the duties of all Members, whether representing counties or boroughs, was to obey the law; and he did not see how the hon. Member was asserting any legitimate prerogative belonging to him if he intended, on every occasion when opportunity offered, to propose something which was at variance with the law of the land. He was unable to state on what ground the distinction was established which drew the line between county and borough Members, and he was not prepared to say why a borough Member should not be entitled equally with a county Member to recommend to such appointments. But so long as the law continued in its present state, there was no choice in the matter. If the hon. Member, instead of asking the House to go against the law, would bring in a Bill to alter the law, he was not prepared to say that he saw any great objection to making the change required; but so long as the Act he had alluded to continued in force, it was no disparagement, he considered, to borough Members to yield obedience to the law.

DISTRIBUTION OF THE VICTORIA CROSS. OBSERVATIONS.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, he hoped that the House would not regard him as too fastidious if he should make some remarks upon the review that took place that morning in Hyde Park. He saw the Artillery, the Cavalry, the Guards, the Line, and the Marines well represented at the review, but the Navy of the greatest maritime Power in the world was represented by the First Lord of the Admiralty and about fifty sailors. He spoke more in sorrow than in anger when he said that that was not a fair treatment of our brave sailors; and he hoped that if ever such a review again took place, the Admiralty would endeavour to bring up as many sailors as they could possibly bring together. We must be badly off, indeed, if at least 1,000 or 1,500 seamen could not be collected. Instead of presenting themselves in their blue jackets and trousers they ought to come forward armed with their light guns, and pass before the Queen as other branches of the service. He believed that during the late war our sailors did their duty as well as anybody else, and especially at Sebastopol, where they were exposed to the greatest danger and labour and suffering in the trenches; and if war should break out again, they would again be ready to do their duty. On such a review, therefore, as had taken place that day, proper respect, he considered, ought to be shown by the authorities to the British Navy. There were some boys from the Military School at Chelsea, but there were no boys to represent the Navy that day in Hyde Park; and, in fact, it was the poorest display that he had ever seen in his life, as far as the Navy was concerned.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he thought that the right hon. Baronet the First Commissioner of Works was entitled to great praise for the admirable arrangements which he had made in so short a time to enable the public to witness the scene at Hyde Park that day.

JUDICIAL REFORMS IN INDIA. QUESTION.

SIR ERSKINE PERRY said, he rose to ask the President of the Board of Control whether, on the reference to India of the Judicial Reforms proposed by Her Majesty's Commissioners, it is competent to the Legislative Council in India to reject those reforms altogether, even though the Home Government approve of them; and whether it is true that the Legislative Council, consisting of nine Company's servants and two Queen's Judges, claims to act as an independent Legislature? He wished to draw the attention of the House to what was occurring in India at the present moment, where a branch of the Government was pursuing a course which, he believed, would be found most prejudicial to the good of that country. It would be in the recollection of many hon. Members, that in 1833, it was thought right to reform the courts of justice in India, and Mr. Macaulay drew up a scheme of a law Commission, which sat twenty years, cost the State nearly £800,000, and the result of whose sittings was absolutely nothing. They certainly sent home to the Directors of the East India Company a valuable series of Reports, but on the greater part of their recommendations no final decision had been made. This fact had been distinctly recorded by Parliament when legislating on the subject of India three years ago; and, such being the case, the Government determined, with the sanction of the House of Commons, to make at once a complete reform in the Indian law courts, and the present First Lord of the Admiralty announced that they had resolved on putting the Company's courts of justice under the Queen's Judges in India. The right hon. Gentleman, on that occasion, said he was exceedingly anxious to embody such a provision in the Bill, but he found it necessary to postpone any legislative measure until the report of a Commission in this country. A Commission was therefore appointed, consisting of most eminent men, and at the end of two years they presented a Report which had received the sanction of the most distinguished jurists in this country. When, however, legislation was expected here as the result of the Commission, a paper was circulated among Members of Parliament, to the great surprise of all who were interested in this question, stating that the Court of Directors had transmitted this Report to India for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of the Government there upon it. It appeared now, from what had taken place in India, that instead of transmitting their opinions upon the reforms proposed—which he admitted would be entitled to due consideration—the Legislative Council were undertaking to legislate upon the subject. They were doing even more than this, for they were setting aside the determination of the Home Government, and were about, if not stopped, to pass an Act which could be productive of nothing but unmitigated evil in India—they were going to put British settlers in India under the Company's unreformed courts which had so long been denounced, and were thus setting aside the fundamental position on which the eminent jurists he had referred to had based their reforms. Now, he wished to know, if the Legislative Council had really taken upon themselves to overrule the determination of the Home Government, what course his right hon. Friend proposed to pursue? Since the creation of the Legislative Council that body had been laying claim to almost uncontrollable powers of legislation. The late Governor General, Lord Dalhousie, had not countenanced these claims, and he (Sir E. Perry) should like to know what his right hon. Friend's views were on this important question, which had now been agitated for twenty-five years.

MR. VERNON SMITH said, it was true there had been a law Commission—a very expensive one, and that from it had emanated many Reports which had never been acted upon. It was also quite true that in 1853, during the discussion upon the Indian Bill, his right hon. Friend (Sir C. Wood) stated that his opinion was in favour of amalgamating the Sudder Court and the Supreme Court in Calcutta. Finding, however, that inquiry was necessary before any steps could be taken in the matter, a Commission was appointed to consider this question, and at the end of three years a formal Report was made by it. When this Report was submitted to him (Mr. Vernon Smith) upon first taking his present office, he came to the conclusion that the best course was to send it out to India for consideration by the Government there. He was never more satisfied on any subject than with the perfect

wisdom of this proceeding, because he heard from the Governor General that, if he had done otherwise, he would have affronted the whole Legislative and Executive Council of India. He would remind them that the Legislative Council was established after much deliberation in this House by the Act of 1853. It was an attempt to provide something like representative authority for India. Of course it was utterly impossible that they could have a representative Government in that country, but Parliament intended in 1853 to make a nearer approach towards something like representation in that Council than previously existed. Was it expedient, then, that his first official act should tend to set that Council at naught, and to set up his own ipse dixit founded upon the Report of the Commission? He contended that to have done so would have been an act of the greatest folly and imprudence. Accordingly he sent out Acts on the subject of these judicial reforms, directing that they should be submitted to the Legislative Council, who were probably on such subjects much better able to legislate for India than the House of Commons. Had such Acts been proposed in this House every lawyer would be starting up to make objections to them, and he would appeal to his hon. and learned Friend whether, after his experience of this House he thought they should be able to secure anything like an attendance of hon. Members for the consideration of such a subject? He thought, therefore, he was perfectly justified in the course he had pursued, and he was glad to hear this impression confirmed in another place by one of the highest authorities upon India—a noble Earl who had filled the office of Governor General. Fortified by such authority, he thought it would have been most inexpedient in him to submit to the House of Commons Acts which might afterwards have met with the reprobation of the Legislative Council of India. His hon. and learned Friend had asked him whether the Legislative Council had power to reject these Acts, and also what course he (Mr. Vernon Smith) proposed to take in case they did so? Of course that Council had power to modify or reject any reforms which might be suggested by the Home Government, but he should not tell his hon. and learned Friend what course he should pursue in such a case until he knew what had actually passed in the Council. This, however, he would tell his hon. and learned Friend :—If the Legislative Council passed Acts which, in his opinion, were prejudicial to the good government of India, he would annul those Acts; and if he could not induce this body to amend them, he would then, and not until then—not until he had exhausted every means—call upon Parliament to legislate upon the subject. It was not supposed, however, that whenever a conflict of opinion took place between the Home Government and the Legislative Council those gentlemen were to be dismissed; and such was his (Mr. Vernon Smith's) opinion of the civil service of India, that he believed, if he were to dismiss the Legislative Council under such circumstances, it would not be easy to find gentlemen to fill their places. Measures of judicial reform would no doubt be passed in good time, perhaps rather slower than he and his hon. and learned Friend might wish, owing to the cautious habit of that body, which required a period of three months to elapse between the second reading and the Committee of a Bill; but that the Council would pass such a measure as would be palatable and agreeable to the whole of India he had no doubt, and, if they did so, that measure would become law.

MR. WILLOUGHBY said, he concurred generally in the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Control, and he could not help observing that, probably, no man was less fitted to be a guide in the matter of Indian law reform than the hon. and learned Member for Devonport (Sir Erskine Perry); for perhaps the three evils which most seriously afflicted India were English law, English lawyers, and the English language as the medium for the administration of justice. His main object in rising, however, was to ask the noble Lord at the head of the Government whether he could not fix a day for the renewal of the debate on the question of cotton-growing in India, which had been adjourned on Tuesday last? Considering the gross misstatements which had been made with regard to the government of the East India Company, and reflecting upon an honourable body of servants who were not there to defend themselves, he thought that a resumption of the debate was imperatively called for. He would not trespass further on the time of the House, but would rest satisfied with having called the attention of the noble Lord to the real urgency of a full discussion on the affairs of India, reminding him that the question involved was not merely whether India could supply England with cotton, but whether India were well or ill governed.

LORD ADOLPHUS VANE-TEMPEST said, he rose to support the request of the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down, because, as Motions on the Ballot and the Civil Service Superannuation were appointed for Tuesday next, to adjourn the debate on the Motion of the hon. Member for Stockport to that day was, in fact, equivalent to adjourning it sine die. The question raised by that debate involved the question of the good or ill government of 180,000,000 of people, and was, therefore, of the last importance.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he wished to remind the House that the Motion for adjourning the debate had not been made by the Government but by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Devonport; and according to the custom in such cases, the hon. Member who moved the adjournment had fixed the day for resuming the debate. Government did not undervalue the importance of the debate, but it was difficult in the present state of public business to appoint a day for the purpose, and he thought that it was premature to talk about another day for renewing the debate before it was ascertained that it could not be resumed on Tuesday next.

THE ORDNANCE SURVEY—QUESTION.

MR. LIDDELL said, he understood there had been a slight error in what was stated by the Secretary to the Treasury the other day, in answer to a question as to the Ordnance Survey. He would repeat his question, and state exactly the information he wished to obtain. The House was aware that the county of Durham had been already surveyed on the 25-inch scale, but in consequence of the Vote come to the other evening upon the Motion of the hon. Member for Mallow (Sir D. Norreys) he believed that the Government had determined that no publication of the maps should take place on that large scale. He begged to ask the Secretary for the Treasury, however, whether it would be competent for the proprietors of land in that county, upon payment of all the requisite expenses, to obtain maps on that large scale? He also wished to ask whether there would be any objection to furnishing a return of the names of the parishes and places in the counties of Northumberland and Durham which had been surveyed on the 25-inch scale, distinguishing those portions of the survey which had been already published from those which had not been published. From what occurred the other night with respect to the Scotch survey he understood that it never had been intended to publish maps for general use upon the 25-inch scale, but that they were only to be obtained upon special application. He thought it right, therefore, to acquaint the Secretary for the Treasury that he had been informed, upon authority which he could not question, that in the counties of Peebles and Ayr maps were now published and exposed for general sale upon that large scale.

MR. WILSON said, there would be no objection to give a return of the parishes in Durham and Northumberland which had been surveyed on the 25-inch scale, and there could be no doubt that in regard to the parishes surveyed on the 25-inch scale the landowners could get copies of them on payment of the necessary expenses for the purpose. He stated the other night that the publication of certain maps would be made in the course of the present year, but in consequence of the alteration of the scale some further time must elapse before the publication.

Motion agreed to.

House at rising to adjourn till Monday next.

PROBATES AND LETTERS OF ADMINISTRATION BILL.
SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, it would be altogether superfluous for him to dilate on the evils and grievances attending the continuance of the present system of obtaining probates of wills and letters of administration, in the Ecclesiastical Courts. Those evils had been so long admitted, had been the subject of so many Reports of Committees of that House and of the other House of Parliament, and had formed matter of inquiry and recommendation for so many Commissions, that he might well assume that there would be found no difference of opinion with respect to them. In fact, for nearly thirty years different Governments had attempted to accomplish the change now proposed, and unquestionably these Courts would have long since succumbed to the attacks made on them if their assailants had not been divided in opinion as to the edifice to be erected in the place of that which all were unanimously agreed to pull down. He should, however, in a few observations call the attention of the House to the state of the existing law in order that the House might be enabled to judge how far the provisions of the Bill, which he was presently about to state, met the necessities of the case and were calculated to remove the evils complained of. The House was aware that anterior to the Statute of Wills of 1837, a remarkable difference existed between wills relating to personal estates and wills relating to landed property. Under the old law, a will of personal estate needed no attestation, and a most informal document might be admitted to probate, while a will conveying real estate required to be attested by three witnesses and executed with peculiar solemnity. In 1837 an Act was passed taking away altogether that distinction, and requiring that all wills, whether relating to personal estate or to real estate, should be executed and attested in one and the same manner and with the same solemnity. It might naturally have been expected that the Ecclesiastical Courts, the jurisdiction of which the House was aware was confined entirely to wills of personal estate, would have been abolished, and their instruments, the effect and character of which was to be determined by one fixed law, should have been made subject to the view and impress, as to their authenticity, of the ordinary tribunals of the country. That being the state of the law, the anomalies which had previously existed became more glaring and more mischievous, namely, that whilst they had one single form in which the will must be affirmed, there were nevertheless two tribunals to which it must be submitted, first with regard to its validity so far as related to personal estate, to the Ecclesiastical Courts; and then to the ordinary tribunals of the country so far as it related to real estate. If there were both real and personal estate, and there were any contest relative to the sanity of the testator or to the execution of the instrument, that subject could not be determined by one single tribunal once for all, but the parties were compelled to take the matter to two different courts having different forms of procedure, and which might arrive at different and opposite conclusions. And this was not a mere hypothetical case, because such cases did occur. Only in the last year they had witnessed one of the most glaring examples of this. A testator in Ireland was pronounced by the Ecclesiastical Courts of that country sane as to his personal estates, but in the courts of common law, in reference to the real estate, he was pronounced insane. And again, in England, he was found to be sane as to his real estate, while there had been no probate as to his personal estate in England. Could anything be more monstrous? And yet such cases occurred perpetually in the present state of the law; and not only was there this difference of opinion between the Ecclesiastical tribunal and the ordinary tribunal, but the same conflict and variety of decision might arise between the ordinary tribunals of the land as to real estate. For instance, if a man died, having land in Surrey, a jury in Surrey might find him insane, but if he had also land in Middlesex, a jury in Middlesex might find him sane. The first conclusion, therefore, this state of the law seemed to point to was the expediency of appointing a tribunal competent to decide once for all on the validity and invalidity of wills, whether relating to real or personal estate, or to both. The next thing to be considered with respect to the Ecclesiastical tribunals was that their mode of arriving at a decision was different from the form of the ordinary tribunals of the land. He believed that all hon. Gentlemen who had attended to the subject would admit that matters relating to the sanity of a testator could not be tried in a satisfactory manner except before a jury, for there was no other mode by which the evidence could be so well tested or examined. The proceedings of the Ecclesiastical Courts, however, were formed on the model of the civil law procedure, and constituted a very cumbersome mode of dealing with the question, and the conclusion was arrived at quite in a different manner from that in which a jury in a common law tribunal came to a decision. It was undoubtedly a great desideratum that the Probate Court should have one uniform and simple mode of trying disputed facts through the medium of a jury, unless all parties were desirous of submitting the case, when there was no necessity for the sifting of evidence, to the determination of the Judge. These were the two conditions necessary to be observed in order to make the proposed change of jurisdiction conducive to the three great requisites — uniformity, simplicity, and economy, and he should now proceed to state to the House how he proposed to effect them. The Bill proposed to abolish at once all the existing Ecclesiastical and peculiar courts in which wills were at present adjudicated on. The House was probably aware that their name was legion. There were some 400 of these courts, which existed in every corner of the country, and they were so many pitfalls into which the unwary suitor was entrapped, and in which he was entangled. Their existence, indeed, was of no manner of use except to produce the most admired confusion, embarrassment, and disorder, which so often prevailed in our system in consequence of the extreme tenacity with which we clung to old institutions long after they had ceased to be of the slightest practical benefit. Under this Bill, however, they would be entirely swept away, and a single Court of Probate would be established in their place. In the ordinary process of proving a will in common form—or, to simplify the matter, he would say of authenticating a will—it was necessary to have the assistance of a court in consequence of the great number of minute and technical forms, the observance of which was required by the statute of wills. The new Court of Probate would be the tribunal where wills would in future be proved in common form, or authenticated, subject to rules of procedure much more simple, and he hoped, also, much more economical, than those which were now in force. The Court of Probate, possessing this universal jurisdiction, would of course be located in the metropolis, but for the convenience of the country at large districts would be formed, and local registries would be established, to which the executors of deceased persons who had a fixed abode within any district, and whose personal property did not exceed the value of £1,500 might resort, if they chose, in order to prove wills, without applying to the principal or metropolitan registrar. The limit of £1,500 had been fixed, because, although the concession must unquestionably be a great advantage to persons living in the country, upon whom a heavy burden might be imposed if they were required to come to the metropolis to obtain probate, it was thought that wills relating to a larger amount of personal property and to real estate could not be examined in the local districts with the same amount of care and experience which would be applied to them in the metropolitan registry. In order to show the danger of extending the jurisdiction of the district registrars, he would suppose the case of a will admitted to probate with a want of some proper solemnity, and which might ultimately turn out to be a will which ought not to have been admitted to probate at all. The executor under such a will might go to the Bank of England, to a railway company, or to any public company issuing stock, and obtain a transfer of the testator's stock, and convert it to his own use. If the will under which these proceedings took place proved to be informal, and another will was subsequently admitted to probate in favour of different parties, the Bank of England or the companies would be compelled to make good the property they had parted with upon the faith of the antecedent informal, or improperly proved instrument. It had, therefore, been deemed desirable, in conformity with the recommendations of the Commission, while giving the country the benefit of local registrars, to limit their jurisdiction to the sum of £1,500, and to insist on all the more important cases being taken to London where, of course, greater care and accuracy could be ensured. The establishment of local registries would also have the advantage of enabling original wills to be retained in the districts in which the testators had resided. Persons in a humble position of life residing in the country were frequently anxious to have the opportunity of examining the wills of their relatives, and satisfying themselves by personal inspection that such wills were the genuine acts of the testators; and under this Bill the district registrars would be enabled to grant probate of wills to the limited amount he had mentioned, and to retain the original wills in their custody, transmitting copies for registration in the metropolitan court. The form of proving the will, therefore, might take place at the option of the parties either at the principal registry in London, or, if the amount did not exceed £1,500, at the local registry. There was, however, another form of proving wills, which was not so simple as that which he had already described, but which provided a more solid and formal means of ascertaining the validity of such instruments. He alluded to what was technically called, in the Ecclesiastical Courts, the proving of a will in solemn form—a process which was resorted to when, although there might not be any immediate question as to the validity of the instrument, the parties interested were anxious that testimony to its due execution and to the sanity of the testator should be recorded and preserved. In cases, also, where it was probable that doubts might subsequently be raised as to the validity of a will, it was desirable to obtain a formal examination and proof of the instrument. The Bill provided a mode by which this object might be attained in a manner which would render the will conclusive in point of validity, both in the case of personal and real estate. It would be merely necessary that a person desiring to prove a will should bring it before the court with a simple allegation that it was the will of a testator of sound and disposing mind, and that it had been duly executed in conformity with the law. The heir at law, next of kin, and every other person interested in contesting the instrument, would be cited to come into court to see and hear the will finally concluded and established. The witnesses to the document, and any others whose evidence might be deemed requisite, would then be examined before the Judge of the court, and, when this testimony had been taken, the sentence would conclude and settle the validity of the will. Hon. Members would see that this enactment would be most beneficial in its operation, for under the existing system wills relating to real estate might be contested at a distant period. Suppose a man made a will in the present month of June by which he devised his real estate to his son for his life with remainder to his children. Supposing that in the month of August he made a second will by which he made a different disposition of his property. Suppose, too, that the son took the property under the later will, and that thirty or forty years afterwards he (the son) also died. In a case like this his eldest son might raise a question as to the validity of the second will, and claim the property under the will of June. The result was, that in the present state of the law no certain title could be given to real property in a great variety of cases where a will formed one of the links of the claim. Well, that would be altered by the institution of the tribunal which would be set up by the Bill, for that tribunal would proceed at once to try the validity of the will; and having decided that, it would thus finally conclude all question on that score. The next species of business with which the court would have to deal was what was called the contentious business, which would comprise the suits instituted by parties hostile to any particular will. With respect to this jurisdiction, he must warn the House not to derive their opinion from the clause in the Bill which made the procedure of the Ecclesiastical Courts the form of procedure under the Bill, for it was necessary to commence with some foundation until new forms were arranged and new orders could be suggested for the subsequent practice of the court. He had, however, the authority of the Lord Chancellor for stating, that should the Bill pass in its present form orders would be shortly framed for the purpose of bringing the procedure and practice of the court into the simplest possible form, and for assimilating them to the mode adopted at common law. The procedure would be of the simplest possible kind. There would be an allegation of ten words by the plaintiff, which would be met by a response of about half-a-dozen more on the part of the defendant; the whole process would be referred to, and conducted by, a Court of Common Law, and the verdict, if not set aside by an order for a new trial, would be embodied in the order of the court, and be final with the parties. With regard to the constitution of the court, the present Judge of the Prerogative Court might, if he pleased, become the Judge of the new court in the first instance, but it was not proposed that the new tribunal should derive its occupations and functions from the testamentary business alone. It was proposed by the Bill that, as soon as ever the office of Judge of the Court of Admiralty became vacant, the Court of Admiralty should be united to the new Court of Probate, so that one Judge would preside over both tribunals, and the two existing tribunals be consolidated into one; and he trusted, in a future measure, to have the opportunity of asking the House to render the procedure in the Court of Admiralty much more simple, general, and useful than it now was, so that the one tribunal to be constructed out of the two existing tribunals should answer the purposes of both, in a manner the most beneficial to the public. But the functions of the Judge of the new court would not stop there. The House would probably, before long, have their attention directed to the Marriage and Divorce Bill, which, as well as this, had originated in the other House of Parliament; and, in the event of that Bill passing into a law, it was provided by it, as it now stood, that the Judge of the Court of Probate should be one of the Judges in marriage and divorce cases. Accordingly, the new Judge of the court about to be established would have a long range of duties to discharge, and his time and attention would be fully occupied by those several departments. This; therefore, was the mode in which, according to the Bill under consideration, the jurisdiction would be established, and those would be the opportunities henceforth afforded for proving wills. But the jurisdiction of the court would not stop there. One of the great inconveniences felt under the existing system was, the want of a tribunal charged with the duty of preserving the property of a deceased person during the litigation about the validity of his will, or the rights of the representatives. It must have occurred to many hon. Members, that if there was a dispute touching the sanity of a man of wealth dying, and leaving a will which was likely to be contested, in the present state of the law there could be no representation while that dispute lasted. The consequence was, that his real estate was neglected, and his personal estate was not collected or properly administered. The present Bill armed the new court to be established with power to appoint, ad interim, a manager of the deceased's personal estate, and, ad interim, a receiver of his real estate, so that care would be taken of both while the litigation was pending. Those were the principal functions which the court would have to discharge. Its daily and ordinary functions would chiefly have reference to questions that might arise on the proving of wills in common form. With regard to the officers of the court, it was proposed, so far as it was possible, to transplant the officers of the existing tribunals to the new tribunals. As far as it was possible, the officers of the Prerogative Court would become the officers of the new court, and the diocesan registrars would also be transferred to the district registries, so far as that could by possibility be done. The officers to be added to the court would be exceedingly few in number—not more than four—and that addition would not involve any great expense. There were many other provisions in the Bill with regard to other subjects, to which he thought it desirable to call the attention of the House. He would particularly beg to refer to the relations which it would be necessary to establish between the metropolitan registry and the district registries. Those would require a good deal of attention, and would, probably, give rise to some discussion when the Bill was in Committee. One question might be, whether it was desirable that papers should be taken from the district registries to the principal registry, to have the approbation of the principal office in London before they were finally admitted to probate. No doubt that would interpose delay, and occasion some additional expense, and therefore that course had not been thought advisable. The House would also have its attention directed to the question of caveats as between the registries in the country and the metropolis, with the view to the prevention of error, and he meant to propose a clause which he hoped would tend to remove all difficulty in matters of that kind. In addition to the provisions he had stated, one great improvement was proposed to be effected, by all the existing wills being collected from all the various depositories throughout the country in which they now were, and brought to one great principal place of registry. To that great place of principal registry copies of all wills proved in the country, but not proved in London, would also be brought; and the Bill proposed to make arrangements which ultimately, after a few years, would lay the foundation for access to improved information with regard to matters of title throughout the country, including, among other things, a system of indices which would be compiled, and copies sent to every district registry, and also to the principal cities of Edinburgh and Dublin. By this means great facilities would be given for obtaining knowledge of facts which at present could only be arrived at by a tedious and protracted search. Another advantage which would be accomplished was, that of creating a place of deposit for wills when made, in which a person about to travel abroad might lodge his will, and to which members of his family might have access at his death. There were many other provisions for the purpose of removing existing difficulties and of introducing improvements into the present practice with which he would not trouble the House; but he might state that there was hardly an inconvenience suggested in the Reports of the different Commission on the subject which the Bill did not aim at meeting, and, if possible, removing. That being the state of the case with regard to the court, he should next call attention to the case of the various officers in the present courts throughout the country, whose courts would be abolished by the operation of the present Bill if it passed into a law. This was a part of the case which he approached with pain and reluctance, since it was impossible to doubt that in some quarters the expectations of suffering and loss were very great. But, first of all, the House of Commons, in dealing with a subject of this nature, were bound to look at what former Parliaments had placed upon record for their guidance. These enactments would establish the conclusion which he had before stated, that the Ecclesiastical Courts had been long ago condemned by Parliament as institutions that ought to be abolished. So long ago as 6 & 7 Will. IV. a statute was passed in consequence of the changes made by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, which contained an express enactment, that from and after the passing of the Act no officer appointed to any office in any diocesan court, in any peculiar court, or in any ecclesiastical court, except the Judge and Registrar of the Metropolitan Court of Canterbury, should be entitled to any compensation if his office were abolished. That Act was passed in 1836, and twenty-one years' warning had therefore been given to the holders of these offices. Nor had the Act been permitted to remain a dead letter, for during the interval repeated attempts had been made to accomplish the destruction of these tribunals. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Carlisle, than whom no one had more distinguished himself in his endeavours to reform these tribunals—no one had more distinguished himself by his zeal to accomplish the overthrow of these mischievous tribunals—was in office when this particular statute passed, and it was repeated by 10 & 11 of Her present Majesty, by which it was most positively enacted that no officer of these courts should be entitled to compensation if his office were abolished. That enactment affected the Judges, the deputy Judges, and the Registrars of the country courts, and also of the Prerogative Court of York. He admitted that it did not comprehend the proctors and all the other officers of the court. He did not now bring forward a Bill to repeal or fly in the face of these Acts of Parliament, and he proposed that all those officers who held their offices anterior to the passing of the Act 6 & 7 Will. IV. should receive full compensation. As to all those who had received their offices since the passing of that Act, one could not bear to turn them adrift without compensation, and he therefore proposed that they should be regarded as holding their offices during pleasure, and should receive compensation as on that principle. Thus, the one class of occupants would be held entitled to a freehold tenure, and the others would be regarded as holding their offices during pleasure, and would, of course, be treated in a different manner; but no one would go without compensation. There remained another class of meritorious officers to be provided for, whose condition he owned, in a great degree, excited his sympathy, and it would be for the House to consider whether the compensation to them should or should not be enlarged beyond the words of the clause. He alluded to the managing clerks of the Registrars and officers of the Metropolitan Court of Canterbury. The Bill provided compensation for these persons who might be supposed to be too old to enter into a new employment, and those who had served in this capacity for fifteen years would receive compensation under the Bill. He now came to another class of persons—the proctors, to whom the Bill secured a portion of their present monopoly. The condition of the proctors must be described with some distinctions. The Bill continued to proctors of the Prerogative Court of Canterbury a monopoly of what the Bill designated, by a term borrowed from their own vocabulary, as the “common-form” business. They would have the exclusive right of all the business of proving wills and obtaining letters of administration in the Metropolitan Court in cases where there was no contest and no dispute. Those who had read the Report of the last Commission would see that a number of proctors were examined by the Commissioners, and that they seemed to agree that if they could get the “common-form” business secured to them for a certain time they would have no cause to complain. The office of a proctor appeared gradually to have acquired a monopoly in the Ecclesiastical Courts, and the proctors relied upon a particular statute, 53 Geo. III. How this statute was passed he knew not, but that statute prohibited the proctors from associating their business with that of ordinary attorneys and solicitors and from any participation in their profits. This statute had given the proctors a complete monopoly of the gains of their office. The monopoly of the proctors of the Prerogative Court was so far recognised by the Bill that they would secure the benefit of all the gains of the common-form business. The House would also recollect that by the abolition of the Chester Court, in which the number of wills proved was very great, and also by the abolition of the Prerogative Court of York, and the diocesan and country courts the business in the London Court must be very greatly augmented. The present estimate was that the Prerogative Court of Canterbury transacted one-third of the common-form business of the country, and the House would judge what an amount of business the persons practising in this court would be likely to obtain from the introduction of all the common-form business in cases where the personal estate exceeded £1,500. But he did not rely exclusively on this source of income. The Bill would consolidate three Courts—the Admiralty Court, the Marriage and Divorce Court, and the Court of Probate. The House would observe how greatly the functions of the Court of Prerogative were augmented by the Bill. At present the Court of Prerogative dealt with contests arising from personal estate alone. Hereafter there would be brought into that court contested cases of real as well as personal estate. If the personal estate were not very considerable, the real estate might be of great value, and, remembering how constantly business ran in the same channel in which it had been accustomed to flow, he thought he should not be wrong in anticipating—and he sincerely and earnestly hoped his anticipations might be realised—that the condition of the proctors would be improved instead of injured by the Bill. The House would recollect that on former occasions he had presented things under a different aspect. It was his desire to have thrown the court open by abolishing the monopoly of the proctors, and he therefore thought it right to give them compensation. The Bill of last year and the preceding year proposed to give them annuities for life amounting to half the clear gain which, upon an average of some years, they had derived from their testamentary business. But he had been unable to please these gentlemen by his proposals, and principally through their opposition he had been prevented from carrying his Bills. What the present Bill proposed was to give them a monopoly of the “common-form” business in addition to the advantages he had mentioned. It was impossible, with regard to practitioners in courts, to do anything more than merely speculate whether a change would or would not be for their advantage.

It would be idle, indeed, for that House to assume to itself the power of prophesying as to the future, and, predicting with confidence that loss would result to individuals, to proceed to vote away the public money, when it might after all turn out that such generosity was wholly misplaced. They could not on public principle recognise the right of legal practitioners to a vested interest in the profits they might derive from the delay, inconvenience, loss, and suffering to suitors consequent on the defective state of the law. Such, persons, therefore, had no claim to compensation for improvements in the law which introduced expedition, simplicity, and economy in its administration. What would be said of the physician, the surgeon, or the apothecary, who, on some important discovery being made in medical science—like that of Dr. Jenner, for example—which afforded the means of mitigating much human suffering and of preventing disease, should think of demanding to be indemnified by the country for the abridgment of his professional gains? Therefore, he could not admit the right of the legal practitioner to compensation for changes of this kind made for the public good. The case might be different when a man's office was entirely done away with, but when the office was retained, and his practice and profits were to a great extent continued, the right to compensation could not be allowed. He believed he had now referred to all cases of compensation except that of Viscount Canterbury, whose right of succession to the office of registrar had been recognised by an Act of Parliament, 9 Geo. IV., and they had consequently no other resource but to provide that nobleman with an annuity. He had now gone through the matters to which he thought it right to call the attention of the House. Some hon. Gentlemen might imagine that the Bill ought to contain further provisions; but its main object was to effect those amendments in the law which had from time to time been suggested by the calmest and most temperate advisers as lying within the limits to which legislation on this subject should extend. The measure, though by no means as large and comprehensive in its character as previous schemes of this kind, would, he thought, be received with general approbation. It was founded, as far as it went, on a sound and just view of the case; and he believed it was calculated to remove all the most pressing evils, and meet all the most important requisitions which had been brought forward within the last thirty years by the greatest minds which had studied this question. The hon. and learned Gentleman concluded by moving the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. HENLEY said that, under ordinary circumstances, he should not have trespassed on the attention of the House; but having had the honour to be a member of the Commission to which the Attorney General had referred, and this Bill being conceived very much in the spirit recommended by the majority of that Commission, with whom he had the good fortune to agree, it was only right that he should express his approbation of it by seconding the Motion before the House. He had always thought that among the various improvements which were demanded on this subject, the four chief points were first—that, if a will dealing with real and personal property was by due legal process declared to be valid, it should enure as a good instrument both for real and personal property, and be readily carried out anywhere within the four corners of the kingdom. There might be a good deal of disputation as to the construction of wills and the administration of assets, but the amount of really contentious business in regard to wills was practically found to be almost infinitesimal. He rejoiced, therefore, that the Government had now directed their attention to the discovery of a convenient mode of conducting the "common-form" business, because it had hitherto been too much the habit of our great jurists to overlook this, which was, after all, the most important branch of the question, and to allow their views to be moulded chiefly by their own experience in the contentious cases. In fact, this circumstance accounted, to a great extent, for the failure of many previous attempts at legislation of this description. Another matter of complaint was the evil connected with the doctrine of bona notabilia, which loudly called for a remedy, and which this Bill would entirely set to rights. He must also express his satisfaction that this measure would furnish an index which would enable parties to find out where wills had been proved, and letters of administration, had been taken out; and thus the frightful expense incident to searching here and there, and employing attorneys to perform all those blessed journeys, which often ended in nothing but vexation and disappointment, would be wholly got rid of. He regretted, however, that advantage was not taken of the vast depository of information at Somerset House, the will stamp department, by means of which that excellent public officer, Mr. Trevor, stated that parties could easily learn, at the cost of 1s., where any will had been proved, or letters of administration had been taken out, within the last forty years. If this could be grafted upon the Bill, a great boon would be conferred upon the present generation, and the public saved an endless amount of trouble; whereas, the effects of this clause would not be felt for many years to come. Another valuable feature of this measure was, that it fully recognised the advantage of local jurisdiction within given limits. The people, and more especially the poorer classes, ought to have facilities for dealing with wills and obtaining administration, brought as far as possible home to their own doors. In turning his attention to the "common-form" business, as the hon. and learned Attorney General had done, he had avoided the rock on which so many of his predecessors in this enterprise had split. No doubt changes such as those now proposed must create a great deal of disturbance; but he believed this Bill would effect them with as little injury as might be to existing rights. It was wiser to pass a measure which would effect a great practical benefit than to strive unsuccessfully for something which might be more theoretically perfect, as the House had striven on this subject for the last thirty years. The Bill of the hon. and learned Gentleman contained the principal alterations which he (Mr. Henley) had for years wished to see effected in the granting of probates of wills and letters of administration, and he thought that the House and the country were much indebted to the hon. and learned Gentleman for waiving his own views and propounding a practical measure, which would in all likelihood receive the approbation of the Legislature, rather than as the bent of the hon. and learned Gentleman's mind would, in all probability, have inclined, one more theoretically perfect, but which would be rejected. There was a question of detail with regard to the constitution of the proposed Court of Probate, upon which he wished to observe, that when the Bill came to be discussed in Committee, it might be well for the House to consider whether or not the Admiralty Court should be amalgamated with the Court of Probate. He could not help thinking that such a step would have a tendency to overload the new court with business, and he threw out the hint now, merely that the point might receive due attention. There was another provision of great importance in the Bill—that by which every precaution would be taken for securing the means of taking care of property during litigation. This was a thing greatly needed and would give the greatest satisfaction to the country. As to the procedure of the proposed court, he, of course, must leave that matter to be dealt with by the legal Members of the House. He would, however, observe, that he hoped the sanguine expectation of the hon. and learned Gentleman as to the simplification of the process would be fulfilled. The hon. and learned Gentleman had stated, that the length of the process would be diminished one-half by his Bill, and sanguine as was his expectation in that respect, he (Mr. Henley) must say, that nobody was more capable than the hon. and learned Gentleman, of providing an effectual remedy for any evil to which he might direct his attention. He hoped that part of the provision with respect to the transmission of wills, by which the title to property was to be proved, would remain open for further consideration in Committee. People living in the country were very jealous about the custody of their documents of title. He was quite sure that the Bill would not facilitate the proof of their titles, and he therefore hoped that those documents would be allowed to remain where they were. Many of them affected the title of a poor man to a small cottage, and if all the wills of the country were to be hustled together, and sent to London, such a man could have little hope of vindicating his rights. The clause on that subject was rather obscurely drawn. He had received many communications from persons living in the country on the subject of the Bill, from which it was evident that they assumed that all wills, both past and to come, were to be kept in the district in which the property affected by them was situate. On no point were people living in the country more anxious than on their documents of title being easily accessible. It was more important that wills made up to this time, than those to be made hereafter, should be thus accessible, because the probates of the latter would, under this Bill, be admitted as evidence with regard to the property affected by them. In speaking upon the question of compensation, the hon. and learned Gentleman had altogether omitted to notice the claim of the proctors practising in the courts out of London to compensation. He (Mr. Henley) had no complaint to make of the manner in which he had dealt with the claim of the London proctors. Those practising in the country he believed were very few, and chiefly in Chester, York, and Exeter. They were not solicitors as well as proctors, and as solicitors were empowered to practise in the district courts, this Bill would unquestionably deprive them of all their business. He hoped that the House would consider their claim to compensation in a fair and liberal spirit. With regard to the proctors practising in London, he confessed that, after having sat on Commissions and Committees on this subject, he could not undertake to say whether they would lose or gain by the proposed change. The observations of the hon. and learned Gentleman on that point ought to be received with some reservation, and he hoped that the Government would not preclude the House from freely discussing it. The Bill would take away from the London proctors a class of business which was wholly irrespective of the amount bequeathed, that was to say, all wills relating to the funded property of the country. Under the present system, every will relating to funded property, whether of large or small amount, had to be proved in London. That class of wills undoubtedly gave a great deal of business to the London proctors. He was at first disposed to open the profession to solicitors, but the testimony which he had heard convinced him that the safety of the public would be best consulted by keeping it as it was. It seems there is a statute which prevents proctors from entering into partnership with solicitors, in other words, of sharing the spoils with them, when the solicitors brought them business; and the testimony conclusively established the fact that the present limited body of practitioners stood even-handed between the court and the client—that if the proctor observed anything in the will brought to him by his client, upon which he thought there rested the shadow of a shade of suspicion, he directed the attention of the court to it, feeling that, as an officer of the court, it was his duty to do so. It might be very difficult for the Judge of the court to be well acquainted with the character of each of the 150 proctors who practised in his court; but, if the business were to be thrown open to 10,000 or 11,000 solicitors, how was it possible for him to acquire such a knowledge of their moral reputation as would justify his reposing that confidence in them which he might well repose in the present limited number of the practitioners? The evidence was irresistible as to the great security with which the “common-form” business had been hitherto transacted, and he did not think it would be wise to disturb the existing system for the sake of the imaginary advantage of opening the business to solicitors.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that with reference to one suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman, he wished to explain that he had omitted to mention that a distinction should be recognised between the proctors of York and Chester and those of London, and that he thought they stood upon a different footing. This case was under consideration. He had neglected, also, to point out that there was another class of persons entitled to the greatest consideration—he meant those clergymen who acted as surrogates, and who would be converted into commissioners by the Bill. Perhaps the House would also allow him to state that a provision was introduced into the Bill for disposing of contentious cases with regard to real estates, where the amounts involved were very small, through the agency of the County Courts.

MR. COLLIER said, that he intended to support the Second Reading of this Bill, believing it would be a very great improvement upon the existing state of things, anything worse than which, indeed, it was difficult for the imagination to conceive. He would not dwell upon the merits of the measure; they had already been ably pointed out; but he felt bound to say that it possessed very serious defects—so serious, in fact, that if he did not think they could be remedied in Committee he should have some doubt as to the course he ought to pursue. His objections were twofold. In the first place, he deemed it unnecessary to create a new court at all; and, in the second place, the court which was about to be created was an inefficient one. He was justified in supposing that this was not the Attorney General's Bill, though, having it in charge, his hon. and learned Friend, of course, felt bound to say all he could in its favour.

The Bill introduced by his hon. and learned Friend last year was not only a different Bill, but might be said to be diametrically opposed to the one before the House. That was the largest—this might be described as the smallest possible measure. The former Bill of his hon. and learned Friend proposed to consolidate three jurisdictions respecting wills—the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts, which related to the validity of wills in personalty; the jurisdiction of the Courts of Common Law, in wills involving realty; and the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery, which related to the administration of assets real and personal. His hon. and learned Friend proposed to unite these three jurisdictions, and if that proposal had been acceded to, undoubtedly a new court with a new Judge would have been required. Whatever might have been its defects—and of those, as the Bill was dead and gone, he would not speak—that was a bold and comprehensive idea; the measure was throughout conceived in no narrow or pettifogging spirit, and was not unworthy of his hon. and learned Friend's great reputation. The present, however, was, he repeated, the smallest possible measure. Instead of consolidating three jurisdictions, it dealt only with one—that of the Ecclesiastical Courts, and actually cut that in two, giving the greater and more important part of it to the Courts of Common Law, and reserving the residue for a new Judge. It called into existence a new court with all its paraphernalia of officers, trainbearers, &c., saddling the country with precisely the same pecuniary burden as the measure of last year, whereas it would transact only a small portion of the business arising out of one of the three jurisdictions which the other Bill united. It established a new Judge and a new court for the purpose of dealing with a portion only of the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts—namely, that which related to non-contentious matters, and some questions of law; while all the important issues on the great questions of fact, such as the sanity of the testator, the question whether undue influence was exercised upon him, whether the will was a forgery, or whether it was duly executed, were not to be tried by the new Judge, but by the Courts of Common Law. This Bill perpetuated what he thought might be described as the game of battledore and shuttlecock—well-known in our judicial system—whereby a suitor was with a good deal of noise knocked about from court to court, generally losing a portion of his feathers at each flight. In the present instance he would go into the new court, with its affidavits and interrogatories, which the proctors would take care to maintain as long as possible; next he would be sent into a Common Law Court, then he could come back into the Court of Probate, and the chances were that Chancery would claim him besides. Now he (Mr. Collier) contended that if the suitor in all important cases was to go to the Courts of Common Law in the end, he might just as well go there at once. There was no necessity for a new court to try cases of no great importance, referring all great questions of fact which arose to the Courts of Common Law. In place of this, he proposed that the Courts of Common Law should transact all contentious business, and that all the non-contentious business should be disposed of, not by a new Judge, but by an office and a registrar with a salary—say, of £1,500 a year. Such an officer would be able to transact satisfactorily all the “common-form” business, while the contentious business would be transferred at once to the superior Courts of Common Law. Among the complaints made respecting the administration of justice in this country he had never heard it said that we did not possess a sufficient number of courts. There were Courts of Common Law, Courts of Chancery, Ecclesiastical Courts, Courts of Bankruptcy and Insolvency, County Courts, Courts of Quarter Session, and what not, and it was owing to the conflict of their jurisdiction that much of the scandal attaching to our law arose, and that such expense, and occasionally ruin, were inflicted upon suitors. They had recently witnessed an example of this conflict of jurisdictions in the struggle between Chancery and Bankruptcy for the carcass of the Royal British Bank. Well, at this moment a Commission was sitting to inquire whether the fifteen common law Judges should not be reduced in number, because they had not enough to occupy them in consequence of the County Courts having taken away a great part of their jurisdiction; and it would be a strange thing to create a sixteenth Judge at the very moment when this Commission might say that fifteen were too many. If the House came to consider this matter, what was there with respect to a will of greater interest and complexity, or which made it more difficult to deal with, than a deed or contract, or any instrument whereby a man disposed of his property during his life? The civil law drew no such distinction, instituted no peculiar mode of proceeding with respect to a will, and created no privileged or monopolizing practitioners in will cases. In no other civilized country, indeed, besides our own, was such a distinction recognised. In America the County Courts dealt with wills; in India no courts of probate, no doctors, no proctors, existed, and his hon. and learned Friend the late Chief Justice (Sir E. Perry) would probably bear him out in saying that no difficulty was found there in transacting the testamentary business by the ordinary tribunals. But there was an example nearer home. About thirty years ago the Commissary Courts of Scotland, which succeeded the old Ecclesiastical Courts of that country, were abolished precisely as they now proposed to abolish the Ecclesiastical Courts in England. Was a new court created to fill their place? Not so. The Scotch would not endure, would not pay for, any new tribunal. The jurisdiction was transferred to the ordinary tribunals of the country—to the Sheriff's Court and to the Court of Session—and he should be very much surprised indeed to hear from any Scotch Member that these tribunals were incompetent for the business transferred to them, and that a new court was desiderated. He wanted to know why the Courts of Westminster Hall should not do in England what the Court of Session could do in Scotland? He said, then, that there was no necessity for a new court, but that this jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Court was in the nature of a diseased excrescence upon our judicial system, which a healthy action would remedy and absorb. The Lord Chancellor, in introducing a Bill very nearly similar to this, last Session, said—

“Under the measure I propose the Judge of the Court will have really next to nothing to do. The registrars will in ordinary cases determine whether a new will is in force or not, appealing to the Judge for assistance whenever they require it, and when a question of fact arises—for example, whether the testator were a man of sound mind, or whether the will was duly executed—I propose that such questions should be dealt with exactly in the same manner as an issue is directed by the Court of Chancery to be tried in a court of law, and that nothing shall be done by the Judge, except sending them wherever they can most conveniently be tried . . . . This being the case, I cannot honestly propose the creation of a new Judge.”

Mr. Collier

That was on the 10th of February in this present year; yet, now, in June, a Judge was proposed who would confessedly have next to nothing to do. The Lord Chancellor, in introducing the present Bill, had been induced, he believed, to propose the new court and new Judge against his better judgment. Indeed, the noble and learned Lord stated that the suggestion had been forced upon him—whether by the proctors or not he (Mr. Collier) did not know—but he still expressed his opinion that the new Judge would not have enough to do. That being so, he made the new functionary assistant-judge in the Divorce Court; but, even then, he would not have sufficient to occupy him, and so, some time or another, although when was not stated, the Admiralty jurisdiction also was to be given to him, and then it was supposed that he would have something to do. But what a medley of jurisdictions was given to this court—wills, ships, and marriages; what on earth had they to do with one another? They might just as well take the various branches of our law alphabetically, and refer them in threes to different jurisdictions—thus, bankruptcy, burglary, bills of exchange, or poaching, parish law, and piracy. Or they might shake up all the jurisdictions in a bag and put them together three at a time, just as they came out: the system would be quite as sensible and intelligible as the one now proposed. But this did not seem to him to be the plan on which they ought to proceed, and to legislate upon such a principle—if principle it could be called—did not say much for the hopefulness of the cause of law reform. It was most important for the purpose of reducing to order and harmony the entangled system of our laws, not merely to look to the exigency of immediate operations, but to take a comprehensive view of the entire judicial system, and to deal with each part in reference to the harmony of the whole. Upon a review of the main provisions of this Bill, then, he thought that he was justified in saying that it saddled the country with a new court where a new court was not necessary; that the court which it provided would not be an efficient one, and that the Judge of that court, if he were a man of active mind, and had a great appetite for intellectual and judicial nutriment, would be starved—that he would be fed upon husks and straw while the fatted calves of litigation would be devoured by others. He (Mr. Collier) should endeavour by means of Amendments in Committee to reduce that new court to an office with a registrar, and to refer the whole of the contentious business to the Courts of Common Law. That would be in accordance with the Bill which he had introduced four years ago, which had often received the active assistance of his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General, and he was sure that the fact of his hon. and learned Friend being now in office would make no difference in his opinion. He objected, also, to the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty being given to the new court, because he was of opinion that it ought to be transferred to the Court of Common Law. The latter courts decided cases of collision and awarded damages, and he could not see why they should not be entrusted with the power of apportioning damages between the vessels themselves. There were some other points of detail to which he entertained objections, and he would say one word with regard to the appeal. There was a provision in the Bill allowing an appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, who were again to hand the case over to the House of Lords. Here was an instance of the shuttlecock and battledore system again. With respect to the administration of the law, it was of the utmost importance to give the County Courts jurisdiction in cases of probate, because not to do so would amount to a denial of justice to the poor man. But he could not understand why the County Court districts should be adopted for contentious purposes, and the diocesan districts for non-contentious. Nothing could be more unsystematic than to have one set of districts for trying the contentious, and a different set for trying the non-contentious questions. This would very much limit the public accommodation. There was only one place of registration for Westmoreland and Cumberland for instance—namely, Carlisle. Peterborough was the place of registration for part of Northamptonshire, Huntingdonshire, and Cambridgeshire. He should take the sense of the House whether the County Court districts should not be adhered to. His hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General adopted his proposition on that point in the Bill of last Session. These were the outlines of the objections he felt to the present Bill, and he should submit clauses for the purpose of introducing the Amendments he had pointed out. He was strongly of opinion that they ought altogether to get rid of the old cumbrous and obsolete Ecclesiastical Courts, and transfer the jurisdiction to the ordinary tribunals of the country.

MR. ROLT said, he should certainly despair of the cause of law reform if the views expressed by the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth (Mr. Collier) were adopted. He should not, however, follow his hon. and learned Friend through all the details which he had brought before the House, and which were more fit for consideration in Committee, but would merely observe that, as a member of the Commission whose recommendations the present Bill substantially carried out, he understood that the great crying grievance requiring remedy consisted in the multiplicity of independent jurisdictions with respect to the probate of wills and the grants of letters of administration, and the difficulty, nay, almost practical impossibility of determining with anything like certainty the particular jurisdiction which had to deal with particular cases. That inconvenience had been admitted for nearly the greater part of this century, but it was a grievance arising, not from any defect in the original constitution of the tribunals, or from any abuse of the jurisdiction exercised, but from the rapid increase of wealth in respect to personal property, from the formation of canals and railroads, by which the amount of personal property had been so greatly increased and complicated that the simple jurisdiction, which was amply sufficient when these tribunals were first instituted, became wholly unfit for the purpose of regulating the succession to personal property. To meet the inconveniences arising from this state of things some remedy was of course required. Various remedies were suggested, but he would now refer but to three—namely, reducing the existing testamentary tribunals to one or two, and improving the jurisdiction where it was defective; transferring the jurisdiction to some existing court or courts, as the Court of Chancery or the Courts of Common Law, and lastly, the creation of some new court, which should deal with the whole subject. According to his notions of law reform these subjects were even yet hardly quite ripe for discussion in that House. They were mixed questions of law and fact, which he felt his hon. and learned Friend and every hon. Member in that House must be unacquainted with, unless they had taken great pains to inform themselves on the subject. It was idle to attempt to legislate on the subject without knowing the whole facts and exactly how the law was administered in these tribunals. To obtain that knowledge required patient research, so that the investigation was fitter for a Select Committee or Commission. Upon this subject there was a Royal Commission in 1830, which reported in 1832. That was followed by a Select Committee of that House, by a Select Committee of the House of Lords, and again by a Select Committee of the Commons; and lastly there was the Chancery Commission issued some years ago, to which a supplemental Commission was issued in 1850. This Commission had all former proceedings submitted to it, and yet, in addition, it devoted a considerable portion of time in examining witnesses, ascertaining the state of the law, and inquiring respecting the course pursued in the Ecclesiastical Courts. The constitution of the Commission was numerous and varied. It consisted of one of the Lords Justices, the Master of the Rolls, the two Vice Chancellors, one Judge of the Common Law Courts, the Dean of Arches, the Queen's Advocate, the Attorney General, two gentlemen from the Chancery Bar, the right hon. Member for Carlisle, and the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire. When he mentioned as members of that Commission Lord Justice Turner and Vice Chancellor Page Wood, he felt that their great legal knowledge and judicial impartiality afforded a sufficient guarantee that everything which could be done would be effected to apply some proper remedy to the inconveniences which were felt to exist. He thought it would be a sound proceeding, in attempting law reform, for that House to consider, and, in the main, to adopt what such a Commission recommended. The Commission came to the conclusion that the right course to pursue was to sweep away the existing multiplicity of jurisdictions and establish one tribunal in London in their stead. His hon. Friend said that the new tribunal would have nothing to do, but his hon. Friend totally misunderstood the nature of "common-form" business. The bare authentication of the will was not all that was required, for it was really business of importance, requiring great checks, great knowledge, and great experience. When a will existed it was necessary to decide who was to be the executor to deal with the personal estate. In a large proportion of cases there was either no executor named or the executor renounced the probate, or it was doubtful who was the executor. In cases of intestacy, it was necessary to determine who was entitled to administer—often a question not easy of solution. Then there were the difficulties arising on the deaths of heirs or administrators before the estate was fully administered. These were questions of the highest importance, and his hon. Friend was mistaken in supposing that it could be satisfactorily disposed of by some one gentleman in an office with £1,500 a year. If they were to proceed in that way in effecting law reform, they would find that they would be sacrificing the rights of property. A large proportion of the "common-form" business necessarily went to the Judge to consider, and it must not be supposed that, because the Judge did not sit in open court for six hours every day he had, therefore, nothing to do. He thought it might be very possible to engraft upon the business of the Testamentary Court a portion of those legal proceedings which were based on the civil law. Three members of the Commission—the Attorney General, the right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir James Graham), and the Master of the Rolls—were in favour of transferring the testamentary jurisdiction to the Court of Chancery, but the majority were opposed to such a measure; but, whether it were transferred to the Court of Chancery or to a Court of Common Law, it would only become a separate department of such court, for the business was so considerable that it would afford occupation enough to a department. Whether the business were transferred to the Chancery or Common Law Courts, or elsewhere, there would necessarily be a new and distinct department with its own officers. The Commissioners, after carefully considering the subject, arrived at the conclusion that it was not desirable to transfer the jurisdiction either to the Courts of Chancery or Common Law, but that the best course would be to create a new and independent court, which should deal with the whole of the business, and he (Mr. Rolt) would oppose any attempt which might be made in Committee to prevent the establishment of such a tribunal. There were certainly some provisions of the Bill which he did not fully approve, but he thought the time had arrived when hon. Members ought to be prepared to sacrifice their opinions as to matters of detail in order to carry into effect a great reform which would sweep away the existing multiplicity of jurisdictions and establish a single jurisdiction in their stead. One question of considerable importance which had been mentioned during this discussion was that of compensation. He believed there was no reason to fear the rejection of this measure because it provided some compensation for those who would sustain loss in consequence of the legal reform which it would accomplish, and he had no doubt the noble Lord at the head of the Government would be grateful to the House if it enabled him to do justice to those whose interests would be affected. He considered that compensation ought to be afforded to a greater extent than was contemplated by the Bill in its present form. If he could agree with the Attorney General that the object of the measure was to secure a monopoly to the proctors, he, for one, would oppose such a monopoly. He denied, however, that the office of proctor was a monopoly. It would be as reasonable to speak of his hon. and learned Friend's monopolizing the office of Attorney General as to speak of the monopoly of their offices by the proctors. Those gentlemen were officers of the court, and if they were abolished to-morrow, a new body of clerks or officials must be created, under some other name, to supply their places. The only question would be whether or not the new officials should receive the same fees as the proctors. It was absolutely necessary, when many thousands of wills were proved annually, that a body of officials should exist whose experience enabled them to detect attempts at fraud, and to advise upon the nice questions which were constantly arising. Parliament might transfer the business to others if they pleased, but the Judge of the court would find it necessary to appoint officials who would perform the duties of proctors under some other name. He believed that if the House was satisfied this measure would deprive the proctors of a considerable portion of their business, to the detriment of the public, they, as well as the Government, would be prepared to do justice to those gentlemen. This subject had received long and careful consideration. The present Bill was the fourth measure relating to testamentary jurisdiction which had been introduced since 1852, and he hoped the House would be of opinion the time had arrived when any petty difference as to questions of detail should be disregarded, and when an attempt should be made to remedy the serious grievances which resulted from the existing multiplicity of jurisdiction. He wished, before he sat down, to correct a misapprehension on the part of the Attorney General, who, as he understood, stated that a Bill previously introduced on this subject had been opposed by the proctors, because it only proposed to afford them compensation to the extent of one-half the amount of their receipts. If he (Mr. Rolt) was correctly informed, the proctors, although they did not think that measure harmonized with the Report of the Commissioners, did not as a body offer any opposition to it, but would have been perfectly content if it had passed. He hoped the House would assent to the second reading of the present Bill, and that it would receive such Amendments in Committee as would ensure its passing into a law.

MR. COLLIER observed, in explanation, that when he said the new court would have next to nothing to do, he did not use his own words, but those of the Lord Chancellor. The hon. and learned Gentleman seemed to suppose that he (Mr. Collier) was expressing his own opinion.

MR. MALINS said, he had, on former occasions, uniformly opposed the measures proposed on this subject by the Government; but he was much gratified at finding he was able to give his support to the second reading of this Bill, which would carry into effect the views he had advocated during the last four years. He entertained some objection to the details of the measure, but thought on disputed points some arrangement might be made which would be generally acceptable when the Bill was in Committee. The great evil which he desired to see removed was the existence of so many different jurisdictions, amounting to some 400 in number. One great evil in the present system was the rule as to bona notabilia, which required a will to be proved in every diocese where the testator had property. He had always said these subjects ought no longer to be matters of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, but should, on the contrary, be dealt with by a court emanating directly from the Sovereign, as the fountain of all justice, and therefore to the proposal for a new Court of Probate he gave his cordial support. He thought, however, that this principle would not be carried out in a satisfactory manner under the Bill as it then stood, as he strongly disapproved, for instance, of the proposal that an appeal should be to the House of Lords instead of the Privy Council. But he would reserve to himself the right of objecting to matters of detail, and, with that reservation, give his general support to the Bill, but upon one understanding. This was a measure which destroyed great interests, and called on many persons in the country to make great sacrifices, and he was therefore gratified to hear his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General concede that the case of the proctors of the Prerogative Court of York was entitled to consideration in reference to the question of compensation. Those proctors of the Prerogative Court of York were a privileged body of men, whose offices had existed during several centuries, and who had succeeded to their business only by slow degrees and after great pecuniary sacrifices in early life; and he would say, if a Bill had passed that House which abolished the rights of such a body of men as that without awarding them compensation, it would have been anything but a creditable piece of legislation. He was, therefore, glad that his hon. and learned Friend (the Attorney General) had, as soon as their case was stated to him, conceded the pressing nature of their claims. The principle, then, being conceded, he (Mr. Malins) came to questions of fact; and if his hon. and learned Friend was right in conceding the claims of the proctors of York and Chester, it followed that he must make a similar concession where the same state of things existed. But his hon. and learned Friend had stated that he could not grant the concession with regard to the proctors in London, and gave as a reason for that distinction that the House could not compensate where improvements were to be made. But the principle of his hon. and learned Friend was either right or wrong, and if the principle was wrong why did he compensate the proctors of York, seeing that they, too, were to be the victims of an improved practice? [Viscount PALMERSTON: Because the Bill sweeps their offices from the face of the earth.] The noble Lord said their offices were to be swept from the face of the earth. Because, therefore, the proctors of York, as such, were to be swept from the land the noble Lord would award them compensation, but would refuse it to a class of men whose interests would be so damaged by the operation of this Bill that they would hereafter gain only £100 by their practice where they now earned £400. These were men, about 120 in number, of station in society and of great respectability, and many of whom had large families depending upon them. They had privileges which they and those who had gone before them had enjoyed for six centuries; many of them were men of great age, some of them of middle age, and others who were just commencing life; and was the House prepared to annihilate, as it were, 120 families, and send them destitute into the world? Although the Bill preserved to the London proctors the "common-form" business in Doctors' Commons, he was convinced that the privilege they had enjoyed would be gone in substance, and hereafter exist only in name, and that they would be deprived of at least four-fifths of their emoluments. If the Bill, in preserving to the London proctors the "common-form" business had preserved to them the great bulk of their practice, he (Mr. Malins) would have been the first to say that theirs was not a case for compensation; but if it destroyed, as he submitted it would, the great bulk of their business, then he contended they were, on principle, as much entitled to compensation to the extent of their loss as the proctors of York, and that in a case of public necessity, where public interest required the privileges of individuals to be abolished, public justice also required that those whose privileges were abolished should be compensated for the loss. He had that very evening presented to the House the petitions of two young men, one of whom had paid £840, and the other £900 premium, on being articulated to the profession of a proctor, in addition to the stamp duty of £120 to the Government in each case. He had seen these gentlemen, who had devoted seven years to the study of their profession, and they had stated to him that they were willing to forego all the loss of time they had spent in making themselves familiar with a profession which would now be practically valueless to them by the operation of this Bill, but they appealed to the justice of the House that they should be at least reimbursed the money they expended on their entrance to it. He repeated that the effect of the Bill on the London proctors would be to deprive them of something like seven-eighths of their present emoluments. He was surprised to hear his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General say that the London proctors would have their business increased by the present Bill. The number of wills proved and administrations granted in England was about 25,000 a year; of these not more than 100 were contested, so that it appeared that the non-contentious business produced the greater amount of their profit. The Attorney General, however, proposed to throw open the contentious business to the profession; another class of cases he gave to the County Courts, while he required that in all cases where the property did not exceed £1,500 it should be proved in the district courts; and if the statement of the London proctors were true, that four-fifths of their business would be lost if the present Bill passed, it was reasonable that, like the proctors of York and Chester, they should receive compensation. This was a question of fact; and in Committee he should go into statements which would place it beyond all doubt. And he would warn the noble Lord, that if this fact were proved he would yet meet with difficulties in passing the Bill, if he did not concede a principle which the House and the country were satisfied was founded in justice. He yielded, however, to no one in the desire to see this question settled, and a single Court of Probate established. He should, therefore, support the second reading, but he did not thereby pledge himself to support the future stages of the Bill unless a fair and full measure of justice were given to those concerned. Last year the Attorney General proposed to compensate the proctors to the amount of half their receipts, calculated on an average of the last five years, by means of the fee fund, so as not to throw any additional burden upon the public. The same principle ought to be conceded by this Bill, and carried out in the same manner; and a clause to that effect would be proposed in Committee. If the hon. and learned Gentleman would grant fair and just compensation by means of the suitors' fund there would be nothing to prevent the Bill becoming law during the present Session.

MR. WESTHEAD said, that the city of York, by its ecclesiastical jurisdiction, had authority to a considerable extent over at least twice the population of Scotland, and over an immense amount of real property. The case of the proctors of York was, however, different from that of their London brethren. In some respects they formed a body quite unique. Their constitution had been unchanged since the year 1311. Eight proctors existed then, and the same number held office now. They took their offices by seniority. Each proctor had a clerk, and each clerk in the order of his seniority took the place of a proctor when a vacancy occurred. They did not practise as attorneys, and under this Bill their occupation as proctors in York would be entirely gone. The county of York, under this Bill, would be divided into four districts—the East Riding, the North Riding, certain parts of the West Riding, and the Leeds district, containing the populous towns of Leeds, Sheffield, Huddersfield, &c. The effect of the Bill would, therefore, be to impose some inconvenience upon the residents near York, for those who lived one or two miles from the city on one side would have to go to Hull, and those who lived a mile or two on the other side would have to go to Richmond to prove their wills. He was glad to hear the assurance given by the Attorney General that attention would be paid to the equitable claims of the proctors of York to compensation.

SIR ERSKINE PERRY said, that he also agreed in the opinion that minor differences must be sunk in dealing with this question. The objection had not been rightly stated as to the existing tribunals. The complaint was not so much to the number as to the conflicting powers and limited jurisdiction of the existing 400 tribunals. So far as these were local courts, giving administration and probate upon simple terms, they did good; nor was he without apprehension that in forming one grand court the taking out of probates and administration might become more expensive to the country than at present. He was glad therefore that the views of the Commissioners against local courts had not prevailed, and that jurisdiction had been given in certain cases to the County Courts. The sound principle evidently was to allow them to exercise jurisdiction, whether contentious or not, at the option of the suitors, who were the best judges whether the courts satisfied them or not, but with the utmost facility to any of the parties to go before the Superior Court in London whenever they chose. The Bill proposed to appoint registrars throughout the country to give administration in non-contentious cases. Why those functionaries should not be attached at once to the County Courts he was at a loss to imagine. These, however, were points upon which he would not dwell, his principal object in rising being to say a few words upon the claim advanced on behalf of the proctors for compensation. It might be deemed an ungracious step for any one belonging like himself to the legal profession, to stand up and answer the arguments which had been laid before the House upon that subject; but, nevertheless, he ventured to entreat the noble Lord at the head of the Government not to listen to the plausible appeals which had been addressed to him, unless a much stronger case were made out than anything which the House had yet heard. Feelings of benevolence were easy enough to indulge when the purse was large and did not belong to the benefactor. Last year the Bill on this subject would have saddled the country with compensation to the extent of £100,000 a year, and he believed that the clause in question was one of the main reasons of the measure being lost. The proctors, it was said, had offered to accept a monopoly of the "common-form" business for ten years as a sufficient compensation to them if the courts after that time were thrown open to the profession. This Bill, however, proposed to give to them a perpetual monopoly. That was a subject deserving the attention of the Government and the House. For his own part, after considerable experience in law reforms, when he presided over a Court of Justice, he had always found every step in the way of improvement impeded by appeals for compensation, and he had been obliged, after consultation with the Government authorities, to consider each case on its own footing, subject to the general principle that officers of the courts must yield to the public necessities. He was in hopes, however, that in the event of the new court being established, and with the additional practice which the Divorce Bill, now under discussion in another place, would produce, the proctors would succeed in acquiring a larger amount of practice than they had hitherto enjoyed; and, if so, it would be a waste of the public money to accede to the claim advanced on their behalf by the hon. and learned Member for Wallingford. They knew by the experience of the present Session that the noble Lord was extremely powerful, and could carry any measure he chose, but they had also seen that on questions of economy the House asserted a will of its own, and he trusted the noble Lord would not listen to the claims urged on him, but adhere to the principle he had already adopted, and carry the Bill as it now stood.

MR. HUDSON said, that he felt grateful to the Government and the House for the consideration which they were evidently disposed to give to the claims of individuals who would be affected by the operation of this Bill, and he could assure them that no body of gentlemen could be more entitled to their consideration than the proctors of York. Some of them were so aged that they could not be expected to remove to London. He wished to call the attention of the Attorney General to one defect in the Bill. When the measure passed, a person residing within half a mile of York, if he wanted to make his will, would have to go fifty or sixty miles for that purpose. He would have preferred to have a local jurisdiction altogether; but if that were not to be the object of this Bill, at least he trusted that York, a very ancient city, the centre of a populous district, would be named one of the places in which wills might be proved. It had long possessed that jurisdiction, which he hoped would not be taken from it now.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he rose for the purpose of congratulating the House, and the country at large, upon the prospect which, judging from the unanimity of sentiment which had been expressed on all sides that evening, they now had of witnessing the accomplishment of a great measure of legal reform. From the time he had first commenced the practice of his profession this subject had engaged the attention of all legal reformers, and since he had the honour of a seat in the House various Bills had been introduced. All were agreed on the necessity of reform, but while they were contending as to the proper mode of destroying the existing jurisdiction, that jurisdiction continued; and unless some such measure as this was introduced, coupled with a strong appeal to the common sense of the House to forgo all minor differences, Doctors' Commons would yet flourish for many years. It was very gratifying to see that while the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth (Mr. Collier) excepted in some degree to the Bill before the House, he did not maintain that it was not calculated to get rid of the evil which it was intended to cure, but merely said that it did not effect that object in the best possible way. The hon. and learned Gentleman had always been of opinion that the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts should be transferred to the Courts of Common Law, and had in 1852 introduced a Bill to that effect, and had repeated that course in various subsequent Sessions. He (the Solicitor General) had given his support to those measures of his hon. and learned Friend, but he could not forget the fact that not one of the Bills which had been introduced for the purpose to which he had referred had ever been read a second time. The transfer of jurisdiction in small matters to the County Courts was a feature in the Bill of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Plymouth (Mr. Collier) which met with his (the Solicitor General's) approval, and he rejoiced to think that in the present Bill the same feature appeared, as it contained provisions for referring to local and cheap tribunals disputes on property of deceased persons which was of little value. Looking at this as a practical measure, which would effectually get rid of existing evils, and, by uniting various opinions as to the best mode of getting rid of them, insure its safe passage through the House, he felt not the slightest hesitation in doing that in office which he would have done out of office—namely, give the Bill his unqualified assent. In one sense this would be a new court, but it would be constructed of materials at the disposal of the Legislature, and thereby many difficult questions, including that of compensation, would be avoided. He did not doubt that the court would be fully occupied, when, in addition to the "common-form" business, it had to dispose of questions of marriage and divorce, and matters now disposed of in the Admiralty Court. The hon. and learned Member for Plymouth, when he spoke of the transfer to the Courts of Common Law, must have contemplated the ultimate transfer of all that business: otherwise the Admiralty Court and a new court for marriage and divorce would be required; but he thought the Judges of the Common Law Courts, notwithstanding the Commission which was now sitting, would scarcely be prepared to take upon themselves that additional burden, and he doubted whether the machinery of those courts would enable them to deal with the whole business in a manner satisfactory to the public. Again congratulating the House at the prospect of getting rid at last of widespread grievances, he would conclude by expressing his hope soon to see this useful and practical measure passed into a law.

Mr. HEADLAM said, he also desired to express his congratulations to the Attorney General in having at last introduced a Bill which promised to bring this long-pending controversy to a conclusion. The framers of this Bill had steered clear of the rocks on which former measures had been shipwrecked. One great fault of these measures was, that they tended unduly to centralize not only the legal business but the deposit of the wills in London. This Bill, however, was clear from those objections. Another difficulty incident to former measures was, that they tended to throw the decision of all questions affecting wills into the Court of Chancery. With that objection he sympathized to a great degree. He believed that many objections to the present system were rather founded upon sentiments arising out of their ecclesiastical character, than upon real existing faults and grievances. Now, the Court of Chancery was open to the same kind of objection; and he was therefore glad that this Bill did not propose in any way to transfer the jurisdiction to that court; a fact, which he thought would be very satisfactory to the country. He was not desirous of entering into matters of detail on that occasion, but he did not think that the case of the city of York called for any especial consideration from that House. But the case of the York proctors stood upon quite a different footing from those of Canterbury, and he hoped that the House would be ready to consider carefully any fair claims they might have. He could only, in conclusion, say how much he rejoiced at the prospects of an early settlement of this question, and he hoped in Committee they would unite in endeavouring to make the Bill as perfect as possible.

Mr. CAIRNS said, he was quite ready to join in the congratulations which had been expressed at the prospect of the measure meeting with the approbation of the House. He thought the unanimity with which it was attended was owing to the discretion of its framers in not going too far, but accommodating themselves to the necessities of the case, and thus steering clear of the objections which had been fatal to former propositions. This was not the time to discuss minute details, yet as the distinction between principle and detail was somewhat fine, he would throw out some suggestions for the consideration of the right hon. Gentleman the Attorney General. He quite agreed that, as they were going to establish a Supreme Court, to be called the Court of Probate, the Judge of that court, with respect to salary and other provisions, should be placed in a position to give him weight and importance, and when they had assigned to him such a position, the next care must be to give him something to do. He was surprised to find that, with regard to the contentious business, in every case in which the heir-at-law desired to dispute a will the matter would be withdrawn from the Judge of the Court of Probate, and sent to be tried as an issue at common law. He was quite aware that there was no satisfactory way of deciding claims to real estate except by the verdict of a jury, but he wanted to know why that decision could not be obtained under the direction of the Judge of the Court of Probate? It had been the disgrace of the legal system of this country that it had been in the habit of bandying suits from one court to another. A suit was instituted in one court, handed over to another to decide a question of fact or of law, and then brought back to the court in which it was instituted for ultimate decision. That was exactly what it was proposed to do with regard to cases in which the heir-at-law disputed the will. It might be right to appeal to a jury, but why could not that be done before the Judge of the Court of Probate—why need it be handed over to the courts of common law? If the Judge of the Court of Probate were competent to sit at the head of that court, he was also competent to direct a jury in the trial of a question of fact relating to a will. According, however, to this Bill, the Judge of the Court of Probate, with all his special knowledge of the law applicable to wills, with all his peculiar aptitude for investigating questions affecting the sanity or insanity of the testator, or the exercise of undue influence on the part of the person obtaining the will, was not to direct the jury, but they were to be directed by a common law Judge, whose experience was entirely confined to a different branch of the law. That was an anomaly which he trusted would be corrected when the measure went into Committee. Another provision that excited his surprise was, that all appeals from the Court of Probate were not to lie to the tribunal to which all such appeals had hitherto gone—namely, the Judicial

Mr. Cairns

Committee of Privy Council—but were to go to the Judicial Committee of Privy Council at stage No. 1, and then to be referred by that court to the House of Lords at stage No. 2. Of all the courts of the country none was more popular than the Judicial Committee of Privy Council, and no part of the business of that court was more satisfactorily transacted than the appeals from the Ecclesiastical Courts respecting wills. This provision appeared to have crept into the Bill in another place out of deference to the prejudices of those who had charge of the measure. In the last Parliament they had a discussion on the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords, with the result of which they were all familiar, and nothing that had since occurred had furnished a substantial remedy for the complaints made against that tribunal. Was there, then, any valid ground for taking away this appellate business from a court which had heretofore discharged it to the satisfaction of the suitors, and transferring it to a tribunal which had never yet possessed it, and which was not, to say the least, in the very best odour with the public? No doubt it would be wise to allow contentious cases of trifling amount to be decided in the County Courts, but, singular to state, it was proposed that appeals in regard to those will cases were to go to the same Common Law Court as ordinary appeals from the decisions of the County Courts. Surely this was multiplying courts of appeal with a vengeance and laying a foundation for differences in practice and decision. These appeals from the County Courts ought, beyond all doubt, to lie in the first instance to the new Court of Probate, and should then follow the course of appeals in the other cases tried there. It was then proposed that forty-one country districts should be established for the proof and registration of wills, where the property was under £1,500, and in the office of each country district the original wills were to be kept. Therefore, for the safe custody of these documents forty-one distinct buildings of solid construction and fireproof, together with as many separate staffs of officials, would be indispensable—an arrangement that would yield no advantage at all commensurate with the great expense it would occasion. He thought that it would be much better to have a central registry for wills in London where the advices might be kept, leaving copies only in the country. As the measure stood a will for less than £1,500 might be proved in any district in which it was sworn on affidavit that the deceased resided, and that proof was conclusive. The person who obtained probate on such affidavit might at once proceed to London and transfer any stock which stood in the name of the deceased. Now, supposing a person wanted to lodge a caveat against the proof of a will, how would he be able to do it. It was certainly proposed that a caveat might be lodged at the central court in London, and that notice of that should be forwarded to the district in which the deceased was said to reside, and should there prevent the proof of the will. But how would that affect the proof in any of the other forty courts to which a person might go, either wilfully or by mistake, in order to prove the will? He thought that provision ought to be made for notifying immediately by electric telegraph, for instance, to all the country courts a caveat lodged in the central court in London. He next came to the question of compensation to the parties, which he admitted to be one of extreme difficulty. The observations, however, which had been made by the Attorney General that night on that subject were not marked by his usual spirit of fairness. The London proctors might or might not be entitled to compensation, but that question ought to be left open for a fuller discussion in Committee. The hon. and learned Gentleman had described the principle of compensation as altogether vicious and absurd, and said it would be as reasonable for physicians to claim to be indemnified for the losses they sustained by the discovery of new methods of medical treatment as for the proctors to demand indemnification for the results of alterations in the rules and practice of their profession. If that were the hon. and learned Gentleman's present opinion, he had certainly changed his mind within a very short time, because, in the Report of the Commissioners to which his name was attached, it was stated that it would be necessary, in common justice to the proctors, that compensation should be made to them if their business were thrown open. True, the hon. and learned Gentleman said that when he expressed his former opinion he intended to abolish the whole trade of the proctors, whereas now he meant only to modify their rules and practice. But it should be observed that the passage of the Report to which he had just referred did not speak of the abolition of the office of the proctors, but simply of throwing open their business.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL was understood to say he did not propose to abolish the office of proctors, but to give them that which in their evidence before the Commission, they had said would content them, namely a continuance of the "common-form" business.

MR. CAIRNS said, he was aware the hon. and learned Gentleman never spoke of abolishing the office of the proctors, but the Report which he had subscribed declared that if their business were thrown open they ought to be compensated. The hon. and learned Attorney General said that the proctors had expressed themselves satisfied with the manner in which this Bill would deal with them, but what they really said was that if the "common-form" business were left to them untouched and unaltered they would be content to give up the contentious business. Would this Bill leave the common-form business untouched and unaltered? It proposed to deprive the proctors of all "common-form" business with regard to wills in the country under £1,500 value. And what proportion was that of the whole of the business?—seventy-nine per cent. Had not the proctors, then, a claim to compensation? Their case was very peculiar. It was perfectly idle to compare it with that of barristers, physicians, or other professional men. They were in number about 100. Their profession had grown up with an existing state of things which obliged them to pay an enormous fee for permission to enter it. If that fee was paid merely as the price of a monopoly of trade, he admitted that a great deal might be said against giving them compensation; but, according to the sound view taken by the Commissioners, the fee was not paid for a monopoly of trade, but in order that certain officers might legally take part in the business of a court established for the proof of wills. It was said that the officers who practised in the Ecclesiastical Courts at York, and throughout the country were entitled to compensation. Their claim only complicated the case the more. If they ought to be compensated, so ought the London proctors. But that question had better be adjourned until the Bill was in Committee. It was the sincere desire of himself and of many hon. Gentlemen around him to contribute to the improvement and to facilitate the passing of the Bill; and he, therefore, hoped that the

hon. and learned Attorney General would do something on his part to render the future discussions upon it of practical effect.

MR. AYRTON said, that he fully concurred in the general principle of the Bill, but he wished to call the attention of the Government to the position of the House in regard to it, and the difficulty which would be met with when they came to discuss it in Committee. It would be very inconvenient if they were asked to discuss a Bill which would abolish a considerable number of offices, and substitute others, without being supplied with authentic information as to its financial operation. The Government ought to furnish hon. Members with a tabular statement or estimate of the pecuniary burden which it would impose upon the people of this country, and of the effect which it would produce upon the incomes of the proctors and other persons who claimed compensation. It was quite obvious that the Government already possessed information on those points, for it must have been very easy to ascertain how large a portion of the proctors' income was derived from the probates of wills disposing of estates under £1,500, which were to be transferred to the local courts. It was clear that if they deprived them of eight-tenths of their income in this way, and also took from them the exclusive practice in contentious cases, they must be very severe sufferers. He was the last man to advocate compensation to any person, and he thought that the House committed a very unfortunate mistake when they commenced the practice of compensating men on the ground of their offices having been abolished for the sake of the public good. The principle of compensation was unsound and wholly indefensible, but as it had been admitted and acted upon so long, it would be the greatest injustice now to raise that general question. So long as the House thought that Viscount Canterbury should be compensated for an office which he had never held, but only expected to hold (and which, in fact, this Bill would abolish) and should be treated as if he actually held it and discharged its duties, it would be a great scandal if the House were to deprive a whole class of people of almost the whole of their incomes, by preventing them from discharging their duties, and yet allow them no compensation. It ought to be distinctly understood that the offices to be created by this Bill were to be filled by persons who were already employed under the present system in the transaction of business corresponding with that which would attach to the new offices to be created by the Bill. The observations of the hon. and learned Member for Belfast (Mr. Cairns) as to questions of fact being left to a jury under the supervision of the court, applied only to cases arising in London, because, with regard to all other trials throughout the country, the court would be on precisely the same footing as any of the courts at Westminster, which left questions of fact to be tried before a court of assize. In that respect, therefore, the Bill was in conformity with the existing system. But, with regard to trials in London, he thought the Bill was open to the objection raised by the hon. and learned Member for Belfast, because he could not understand why a man who was fit to preside in a Court of Probate was not fit to superintend an investigation before a jury, and take their verdict, instead of sitting, as the Judge of the proposed court would do, one half of the year doing nothing, while he sent the business to be transacted by Judges who were already fully occupied with their present duties.

MR. NAPIER said, he also begged to tender his thanks to the Government for the introduction of that which he believed, upon the whole, to be a very valuable measure. There were, no doubt, objections to some of its details, but the subject was one with respect to which persons holding different opinions must be contented to enter into a compromise, in order that a practical result might be obtained. The hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down seemed to think that the system of giving compensation was an unjust one; but, upon that point, he was entirely opposed to the view which the hon. and learned Gentleman had taken, although no doubt there might be, in particular instances, an unfair application of the principle. If they interfered with the rights of public servants, they ought not to do so without making a fair compensation to those persons. With respect to the observation of the hon. and learned Member for Belfast (Mr. Cairns) to the effect that the issue involving disputed facts should be tried before the Judge of the new tribunal, he would only say that he believed those facts would be more satisfactorily dealt with before a jury directed by a common law Judge, who might, from the nature of his duties, be assumed to be more competent to deal with such questions. He was also of opinion that the House of Lords now constituted an excellent court of appellate jurisdiction, and that there could therefore be no objection to its being the court of last resort under the operation of the Bill. That, however, was a point which might be more satisfactorily dealt with in Committee, and the same remark, he thought, applied to the question of compensation, in reference to which his own feeling was, that the proctors were entitled to consideration. He was the more strongly disposed to maintain that view because, from the evidence which had been given before a Committee of which he had been a member, it appeared that no case of fraud had been made out against the proctors in the discharge of their duties, notwithstanding the facilities which were presented for its commission in dealing with small amounts of property. Seeing that the Bill had been brought forward in a friendly spirit, he thought they ought all to unite, both in the House and out of it, to give their best assistance to forward the Bill when it came into Committee, and to come to an understanding on the few points on which they were likely to differ with respect to it.

COLONEL SYKES said, he should vote for the second reading of the Bill, in the hope that due consideration would be given to the claims of those who might suffer by its passing into a law. There was, in his opinion, but a very slight difference between the entire abolition of an office and the taking away of nine-tenths of the profits which it afforded.

MR. ADAMS said, that he trusted the Government would not peril the success of the Bill by being too niggardly in reference to the amount of compensation to be granted to those parties whom its operation would affect. He wished particularly to recommend to the attention of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General the proctors who practised in the various diocesan courts, whose emoluments the Bill would entirely destroy. He would also suggest, whether it was necessary to confine the limit to £1,500 with regard to wills which might be proved in the country. With regard to many probates the amount was not material, and where there was no difficulty, he thought an option should be given either to take it out in the country or to have recourse to the court in London. The point, however, upon which he was most anxious to dwell, was the transfer of the Admiralty jurisdiction to the new tribunal. That jurisdiction was one of the most anomalous character, and if that portion of the Attorney General's proposition were carried out, it would be placed in a more unsatisfactory position than at present. It related principally to the decision of disputed facts connected with shipping, and might, in his opinion, more properly be confided to the consideration of a jury acting under the direction of a common law Judge, than to the Judge of the Court of Probate, or to the Judge of the Court which had hitherto dealt with such cases. The point was one which he should feel it to be his duty to press upon the notice of the House when the Bill went into Committee.

MR. WALPOLE said, he would not enter upon the general principle involved in the Bill. This had been well alluded to by the hon. and learned Member for West Gloucestershire (Mr. Rolt), and he congratulated the House on the presence of that hon. and learned Gentleman, whose ability and knowledge would be of great assistance in its deliberations. The measure was probably as good an adjustment as was possible of this difficult question, which had so often been ventilated, but had never been brought to a satisfactory conclusion. He had some doubts, however, whether it was wise to establish any tribunal which would not possess complete control and authority over all the matters which were likely to be submitted to it. He could not agree with his right hon. Friend (Mr. Napier) that it was advisable, in order to secure a division of labour, to transmit a portion of the testamentary business from one court to another. By one of the clauses of the new Bill, it was provided that the new Judge of the Probate Court should, if necessary, have a common law Judge to assist him, and why, therefore, should he not be empowered to try any issue which might arise? Again, he was fearful that the County Courts, upon which the Bill conferred a jurisdiction in certain cases, would introduce various customs and give many conflicting decisions, unless there was some tribunal to keep them to a uniform and correct standard. The only way in which this evil could be remedied was, by taking care that you had one, and only one, Court of Appeal to which these questions should be referred. As to the question of compensation, that must be left for consideration in Committee. At present, he would only express his concurrence in the thanks given to the Attorney General for settling a very difficult question in the most practical manner perhaps in which it could be settled.

Bill read 2<sup>o</sup>, and committed for Friday next.

FRAUDULENT TRUSTEES, &c., BILL.
COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

Clause 1.

"If any person being a trustee of any property for the benefit, either wholly or partially, of some other person, shall, with intent to defraud, convert or appropriate to his own use or the use of any person other than the person entitled thereto, or shall, with intent aforesaid, otherwise dispose of or employ such property, or any part thereof, to or for his own benefit, use or purposes, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanour."

MR. ROLT said, his main objection to this clause as it stood was that it would in all probability tend to prevent persons of character and responsibility from accepting the office of trustee; and the object of the Amendment he had to propose, connected, as it was, with another Amendment upon the same clause, which also stood in his name upon the notice-paper, was to diminish that tendency. The extent to which trusts were now created—the desire universally entertained to regulate the enjoyment of property by the objects of our affection and bounty—and the opportunity now afforded us of realizing that desire with comparative certainty by the appointment of trustees—all this combined should lead them to deprecate any measure which would destroy the very basis of the system—namely, the willingness on the part of persons of character and responsibility to accept offices of this kind. He did not desire that a criminal trustee should be relieved from all liability to punishment, but he anticipated that from its one uniform definition and standard of punishment and crime this Bill would sweep into its net offences wholly different in character and degree, at the same time that from attempting to be comprehensive, it reached the region of the indefinite, and would thus both enable and induce many disappointed beneficiaries to bring charges against trustees who had no fraudulent intention whatever. Now he asked the Committee to draw a distinction between trustees and agents for hire—as bankers or others. A gratuitous trustee had at best a fruitless and thankless duty to perform; and it was necessary, moreover, to consider that that duty was not one of a simple character. The charge accepted by him extended over long periods of time, dealing with persons to him at first unknown, and perhaps unborn, involving always questions of great difficulty. It would not do to say merely that, if the trustee were innocent, he would be acquitted, for the mere risk of being subjected to criminal charges under a penal enactment of great severity would probably be the feather which would turn the scale and determine him not to accept the office. According to the interpretation clause, the word "property" comprehended "every description of real and personal property, money, debts, and legacies, and all deeds and instruments relating to or evidencing the title or right to any property, or giving a right to recover or receive any money or goods." Then, to Clause 1 there had been added, since the Bill was last under consideration, the words, "or the use of any person other than the person entitled thereto;" so that, according to the clause as it now stood, if any person being possessed of any money on any trust appropriated it with a fraudulent intent, not for his own benefit but for the benefit of any person other than the person entitled thereto, he would be guilty of a misdemeanour. Now, he wished to draw the attention of the Committee to the distinction between trust-money rightfully in the hands of trustees, and stock which the trustee had no right to convert or to deal with in any way until he handed it over to the cestuique trust. In the former case, if a trustee, having trust money rightfully in his hands, became insolvent while a debtor to his trust, he stood in no worse position in point of real criminality than a man who incurred debts which he knew at the time he contracted them he could not pay, and he ought to be treated as an insolvent or, at most, as a criminal insolvent, and should be dealt with under the bankruptcy or insolvency laws; but under this Bill he would be guilty of a misdemeanour, and would be liable to seven years' penal servitude. In the case of a trustee, however, selling out stock and appropriating it to his own use, hoping to be able to restore it at the proper time, as, for instance, when the infant cestuique trust reached the age of twenty-one, the offence approached the crime of larceny;

he had no more right to touch that stock than he had to touch stock standing in the name of another person. The nature of the obligation in the two cases was distinct. In one, the obligation was to pay the debt when it was due, just as there was an obligation upon a man to pay any other debt when it was due; but in the other case the obligation was to render up the specific stock or the specific chattel. Again, let them look at the nature of the evidence as it affected the two cases. The gist of the offence was the intent to defraud, and in the case of a man selling stock and appropriating it to his own use when he ought to hand it over to the child when it attained the age of twenty-one, there would be no difficulty in showing the intent to defraud, because the act of conversion would prove the intent. But in the other case, when the trustee had the money rightfully in his hands, it would be difficult to prove the intent. Indeed, those words "with intent to defraud" might ultimately save him; but it would involve a nice point, and no man of honour would like to incur the risk of being charged with such an offence as he might be innocently liable to under this Bill. He knew that it would be said that a trustee could protect himself by investing the trust money in a separate account with his banker; but there might be many cases in which persons rightly having money belonging to the trust might be unable to do that—they might not be aware of the necessity of doing so, or they might have no banker, or the money might be paid in such small sums that it would be inconvenient to do so, or debtors to the estate might pay in money to the general account of the trustees with their bankers without their knowledge. He contended that the distinction between these two cases, then, was plainly marked, and that while one approached either forgery or larceny in its character the other came within the category of criminal insolvency. He suggested, therefore, that they ought to limit the description of property, the misappropriation of which was to constitute the offence; for by so doing they would meet the great bulk of cases with which they were anxious to deal, while they would exempt from the operation of the Bill that class of offences which properly belonged to criminal insolvency, and they would by that means not deter men of honour from becoming trustees. After all, in legislating upon this subject, it was material to bear in mind that the whole matter was one of trust and confidence, and that when Parliament had done the best it could for those who created trusts they should know that the greatest safeguard was in the simplicity of the trusts they created, and in the trustworthiness of those whom they selected to act as trustees; for it was idle for persons to create intricate and complicated trusts which no one could understand, or to select dishonest persons to discharge duties the very essence and pith of which were trustworthiness and confidence, and then to complain that the trusts had not been properly executed or that the funds had been misappropriated. He would conclude, therefore, by moving—

"In line 8, to leave out 'property' and insert 'estate or interest in any land of any tenure, or of any share or interest in any Public Stock or Fund, whether of this Kingdom or of Great Britain or of Ireland, or of any Foreign State, or in any Stock or Fund of any body corporate, company, or society, or of any security for money whatsoever, or of any chattel.'"

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that in the general tendency of the observations of his hon. and learned Friend he concurred, but he could not concur with him in the Amendment he had proposed. He did not think that it would be desirable to substitute particular enumeration for a general denomination, which would include every description of property, because if that were done, however carefully the particular enumeration might be drawn up, the skill of a criminal lawyer might possibly be able to discover a loophole through which an offender might creep. In many cases where fraud was committed money might be lawfully in the hands of the trustees, and the fraud be as great practically as if the trustee had converted securities into money and then appropriated the money to his own use. Suppose, for instance, that a man had collected £500, and having 500 sovereigns, leaves a man his executor, and the executor takes the 500 sovereigns, and applies them to his own use, and robs the widow and orphan of the testator, was he not something more than an insolvent trustee, and was he to be exempted from the operation of this Bill because he had not got the money by the sale of stock? Again, a man died, and directed his trustee to sell his property, to get in his debts, to invest the proceeds and divide them among his children, and the trustee having turned the property into money, and then converted it to his own use, was he to be exempted from the operation of the Bill? How impossible was it to say that if a trustee took money only he incurred a debt, and that a trustee who took stock, or any other security, and turned it into money, and used it for his own purposes, committed a crime. If you left out the word "money," the most painful instances of fraudulent robbery would escape punishment, for he hoped that the Bill would reach numerous cases in which small sums passed into the hands of fraudulent trustees, and were used by them. He objected, therefore, to a particular enumeration of the nature and kinds of property, for his object was to render every fraudulent trustee liable under the Bill, and for that purpose he (the Attorney General) would retain the general word "property." He desired not to interfere with the relations of trustee and cestuique trust, but here there was nothing to frighten the most nervous man; for no one could by possibility come within the scope of the Bill unless he wilfully appropriated to his own use the property of a person which he was bound to protect. He hoped the Committee would not agree to this Amendment, because it would deprive the Bill of its greatest security.

MR. HEADLAM said, he thought the whole clause would be productive of more harm than good. There might be extreme cases of fraud which would be met by the Bill, but when it was considered how small the number of these cases would be, and how large would be the number of persons deterred from accepting the office of trustee, he had come to the conclusion that the Bill was calculated to be more prejudicial than advantageous in operation. Trustees would be subject to be charged with a crime subjecting them to seven years of penal servitude, while the difficulty of proving their innocence would be extremely great. That might certainly happen in the case of any complicated trust. He knew the pressure which had been got up and the exaggerated language which the press had made use of on the subject, and, therefore, he was not surprised at the stringent character of the Bill. He desired as much as any one to see extreme cases of fraud on the part of trustees adequately punished, but it was not his opinion that the grossest cases would ever be brought into court, for the persons committing them would probably be members of the family of the person beneficially interested, and it would naturally be the wish of the family, after the lapse of some time, that the matter should not be exposed. The practical working of the Bill would have this effect, that a great number of persons would be threatened with indictment, but very few would be convicted. It must not be supposed that there was no punishment under the existing law for dishonest trustees, as in some cases they fell within the jurisdiction of the Insolvent Debtors Court and received punishment there. Indeed, the complaint had hitherto been that the rules of Chancery were too severe in their application to trustees, but the effect of this Bill would be that the proof would be cast upon an honest trustee to show that he was not worthy of seven years' penal servitude.

MR. SERJEANT KINGLAKE said, he was as anxious as any one that the law against the fraudulent conversion of trust property should be made most stringent; but in legislating upon the subject it was necessary to take care that they did not include within the language of the clause the honest as well as the dishonest trustee. He did not think that the words "with intent to defraud" were a sufficient guard and restriction; for who was to decide upon "the intent" but a jury?—a tribunal which, he should say, was not by any means the best fitted to refer such a question to. Cases had been put on the one side, but let him now put a case. Suppose a man died leaving two or three hundred pounds, and appointing his brother as trustee for his widow and family. The brother might put the money into his own business, honestly intending to allow the widow 8 or 10 per cent—more, in fact, than he could invest the money for in any other way. But suppose the man's business failed, and the money was lost; suppose a case like that going to a jury, and an appeal being made to their feelings on the one side or on the other, was it possible to imagine anything more unsatisfactory? It was agreed that it would be unsafe to allow prosecutions to be instituted at the mere motion of any disappointed party; and so Clause 11 provided that the consent of one of the Judges must be obtained previous to the commencement of proceedings. But that clause afforded no adequate protection; for how could a Judge come to a correct decision upon mere ex parte affidavits? Besides, it was wrong to put the Judges in so invidious a position as to call on them to decide in London that there was a prima facie case of fraud, when it might happen that the very same Judge that authorized the institution of proceedings might have to go down to try the charge. He (the learned Serjeant) had reason to know that this was an objection which was felt by many of the Judges themselves. Under these circumstances he begged to call the attention of the Government to an Amendment, suggested by the hon. and learned Member for Belfast (Mr. Cairns) which would entirely remove this difficulty. Let the proceedings be instituted only by the direction of a Judge either in Equity or in Bankruptcy, under whose judicial notice the case might have come.

MR. BARROW said, that from long experience of trustees in the lower ranks of society, he was quite satisfied that this Act would operate most injuriously upon the interests of the widows and orphans on whose behalf the Attorney General had appealed to the House. By discouraging the acceptance of trusts it would do more to injure the lower classes than any legislation which had taken place since he had been in that House. The hon. and learned Attorney General had said that if a gentleman mixed trust funds with his own money at his banker's and afterwards overdrew his account, but was able to pay the money when it was wanted, he would not be liable to a prosecution under this Act; but surely in such a case the offence had been completed, and the subsequent repayment of the money would not prevent its being an offence. He would also observe that the Bill not only involved the responsibility of the trustee himself, who might be able to avoid all irregularity, but it would actually involve his executor. The mere threat of a prosecution would deter many an honest man from consenting to become a trustee; for, he agreed with the learned Serjeant who had just spoken, that a person would run but a poor chance of a favourable construction being put upon his motives, if he happened to be opposed by so eloquent an advocate of the widow and orphan as the hon. and learned Attorney General.

MR. NAPIER said, that the objection which had been raised to the Bill ought to have been taken on the Second Reading, because they attacked its entire principle. The essence of the crime was the intent to defraud, and that was only such a question as was ordinarily submitted to a jury, as, for instance, in the case of a person tried for intent to murder, which was itself a capital offence. In such cases the whole question was as to the intent. The question before the Committee was whether the word property should be used with its wide and extended sense, or whether by omitting it the operation of the clause was to be limited in the manner proposed by his hon. and learned Friend. He believed that in Scotland it was made a special reason for prosecuting that a person had been entrusted with property and had fraudulently dealt with it. The essence of the criminal law was the intent, and this clause was intended to bring within the operation of the criminal law a class of offences which had hitherto escaped, and for that reason he should oppose the Amendment. There were quite sufficient safeguards contained in the clause, and he hoped the Attorney General would not consent to have it frittered away.

MR. AYRTON observed, that he thought that the difficulty arose from the expression "intent to defraud." On the one hand, it was supposed that every proceeding would be considered a fraud under the Act which was a fraud in a Court of Equity. On the other hand, it was thought that the word fraud merely meant what twelve jurymen would consider to be a fraud. He begged to suggest that the Attorney General should insert words to show that the expression was confined to fraud as determinable by a jury.

SIR GEORGE GREY suggested that the Committee were not now discussing the clause.

MR. WIGRAM said, that if the clause were meant to apply to persons who were guilty of the offence of appropriating to their own use property which was not their own—in other words, of embezzlement—he did not care how large its words were, but as that was not quite clear he hoped that the Attorney General would state whether the clause was meant to apply to that class of offences only, or was to extend to cases where persons appropriated property to other persons' use, although they themselves derived no advantage from it. If the latter effect was meant to be given to it, he doubted whether the Bill would carry public opinion with it. At all events the point should be made clear, for the Committee must remember they were introducing a new class of offences, and, therefore, the country ought to be properly awakened to what those new offences were.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he thought the question of his hon. and learned Friend would be best answered by putting this case. Suppose a person, being a trustee for the sum of £5,000, were on his son's marriage to transfer to him that stock; that would not be an appropriation to his own use, but to the use of some other person, still it would be a fraudulent appropriation, and one which would go unpunished unless the words which he had proposed were inserted in the clause.

MR. WIGRAM thought that the case put by the hon. and learned Gentleman amounted, in fact, to an appropriation by a trustee to his own use.

MR. CAIRNS said, that if ever such a singular case should arise, it would be met by the words to be found later on in the clause,—“otherwise dispose of or destroy such property.”

MR. WARREN was of opinion that the majority of the objections urged against the clause were those arising from the timidity of Chancery lawyers in approaching the pale of criminal liability. The essence of the clause, as it seemed to him, lay in the words, “with intent to defraud.” That was enough to constitute a misdemeanour. He thought the hon. and learned Attorney General, after much consideration, had hit a class of cases to which the common sense of the public had long since assigned a criminal liability, and he thought he would do well to retain the words.

MR. ROLT said, he considered that if the law applicable to criminal insolvency was not sufficiently stringent it ought to be rendered more severe; but he did not think that extreme cases should be taken out of the category of offences to which they properly belonged. He was desirous that a sufficiently severe punishment should be imposed to prevent the commission of crime, but he was unwilling to commingle offences of different characters and classes. They should not, in short, confound criminal insolvency and larceny. He would, therefore, press his Amendment.

Amendment negatived.

MR. BLAKE said, he would express his satisfaction that the Bill would apply to Ireland, where there was great necessity for legislation in consequence of the number of defaulting and fraudulent trustees, and in order to prevent the escape from punishment of fraudulent charitable trustees, he would move that after the word, “person,” in line 9, the words, “or for any public or charitable purpose” be inserted.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he was ready to assent to the Amendment, unless any of his hon. and learned Friends saw reason to doubt the propriety of inserting the proposed words in the clause. He would also endeavour to carry out the object of the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Wigram) by proposing to insert, after the word “appropriate,” the words “the same or any part thereof,” and to omit the words “or the use of any person other than the person entitled thereto.” The clause, with the Amendments, would then stand as follows:—

“If any person being a trustee of any property for the benefit, either wholly or partially, of some other person, or for any public or charitable purpose, shall, with intent to defraud, convert or appropriate the same or any part thereof to or for his own use or purposes, or shall, with the intent aforesaid, otherwise dispose of or destroy such property, or any part thereof, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanour.”

On the Motion that the clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill,

MR. WALPOLE said, he quite agreed with the views generally taken in reference to this clause, but he wished to suggest that the clause, as it stood, did not sufficiently distinguish between an actual and an implied trustee. The consequence might be that a man, who was not really aware that he had all the duties of a trustee cast upon him, might be liable to be indicted under this clause. He suggested that the word “trustee” ought to be more clearly limited and defined.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he would give the suggestion his consideration.

MR. NEATE objected to the clause on the ground that it brought the criminal law into operation in reference to transactions which had been hitherto exempt from the interference of that branch of the law. That, too, was an application of the criminal law which did not meet with the unanimous concurrence of the members of the legal profession. He also understood that the Judges were opposed to it, while it was proposed by an hon. and learned Gentleman who had been chiefly concerned with civil law. The great objection to the clause was, that it did not recognise the difference between trusteeships of a public character and those of a private character. He approved of its application to the former. In the case of a bank or a railway company, confidence was placed in the directors, not from any knowledge of the private character of individuals, as was the case in private trusteeships; therefore in the former case it was necessary that the law should interpose to protect the public. Nor did the clause sufficiently recognise the distinction between direct trusts of property, and indirect and resulting trusts. He did not deny the necessity of legislation, but thought it would be sufficient to give Equity Judges the same jurisdiction over defaulting trustees as the insolvent Commissioners had over insolvent debtors. As regarded fraudulent transfers of stock, he thought it would be wise to compel the Bank of England to take notice of trusteeships, by entering such stock in a separate book, and allowing no sale without the concurrence of all the trustees. He would suggest to the Attorney General that it would be better to confine the Bill to public trusteeships, and reserve for future consideration that which was really a difficult subject—how far private trustees should be subjected to what was entirely a new state of the law.

Clause agreed to.

MR. HENLEY said, with reference to frauds on the part of bankers he wished to ask, supposing a man put £1,000 into a banker's hands in the ordinary way, expecting to get it back again when he wanted it, and the banker, as was usual in such cases, applied the money in any way he liked while it was in his possession, and supposing the bank went on for ten years and then the bank broke, what constituted in that case the act of fraud?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, if a person left money in a banker's hands in the ordinary way, that money was in law a loan from the customer to the banker—it was lent to the banker expressly to be used in the ordinary way by him, and he was bound to repay it to the customer in the way he might direct; for if he lent money to a man without stating the express manner in which he should employ that money, there would be no fraud in the appropriation of the money, nor would there be a fraud though the borrower, when the customer asked for his money, should be unable to meet the debt.

MR. HENLEY said, he must repeat his question. He wished to know what were the circumstances under which a banker might apply money to his own use? and what was it that constituted a fraud when he did so?

MR. WARREN said, the words of the clause disposed of the difficulty. When any person intrusted with money converted it to his own use "with intent to defraud" then he came under the provisions of the Bill.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, if he took a bag of money tied at the mouth to a banker, and said to him, "There, keep that for me as it is," and the banker cut open the bag and took out the money, he would be applying it to his own use, and come within the meaning of the clause. The difference lay between money lent in the ordinary way and money deposited. If he packed twelve bills of exchange in a parcel and deposited them with a banker to be kept by him, he would be guilty of a misdemeanour if he appropriated those bills. The principle was well understood in the City, where a parcel of bills was frequently paid into a bank as depositum, as it was called; but a single bill paid in without any condition was subjected to a different treatment, and might be negotiated by the banker.

MR. HENLEY said, that was an offence now; but this clause seemed to go a great deal further. If it was meant to apply to a special deposit made with a banker, that was one thing; but if it applied to the banker who, being possessed of money appropriated it to his own use, then it would apply to all money paid over the counter.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the words of the clause as it stood would not interfere with any of the ordinary transactions of trade; neither would they interfere with anything that might be wrongfully done, if it was not done with intent to defraud. It would apply to transactions that were wrongfully done by the banker, and to which the law would attach the character of being done with intent to defraud.

MR. AYRTON said, he would refer to a clause in the Bankers Act (7th and 8th of Geo. IV.) to show that the offence to which the clause related was already an offence. He thought the terms of that clause more clear and explicit than the terms of the clause in this Bill, and would suggest that they should either repeal the existing law, or make some reference to it.

He feared that the language of the clause as it stood was so comprehensive that if disputes arose in the course of mercantile transactions persons would be liable to be taken to a police court, and have all their affairs exposed there.

MR. NAPIER remarked that the case put by his right hon. Friend the Member for Oxfordshire came within the law of debtor and creditor, and the money so deposited ceased to be the property of the depositor. The transaction contemplated by the clause was one between bailor and bailee.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the clauses in the Bankers Act were limited entirely to cases where directions were given in writing and where the property was specially entrusted to a banker. In this clause the language had been most carefully selected to meet the case of a banker "who becomes possessed of the property of another person," and was much more comprehensive than the language of the clauses in the Act of George IV., in order to include a large class of offences which, under the interpretation put upon that Act, escaped punishment. In prosecutions against bankers or agents under the present law it was necessary to prove the character of banker or agent, the special entrustment of money or security for money, the direction in writing for the application of the same, and the conversion of the same in violation of good faith and contrary to the purpose specified. In point of fact, theft might be committed in a great variety of cases without falling within the existing enactment.

MR. HENLEY said, he entertained doubts whether the clause carried out what the Attorney General said was intended. Would it not be better to state distinctly that it should be no longer necessary to prove that the directions were in writing? How could it be shown that this clause would not include every case of payment of money into the hands of a banker across the counter? The words seemed to him to be too general.

MR. NAPIER explained that the clause could not include ordinary payments of money over the counter, because in such cases the property changed owners. The moment the money was handed over it became the property of the banker, and he could not be said to be "possessed of the property of another person."

Mr. Ayrton

MR. MALINS said, that the distinction between the two cases was obvious enough. A man who added £1,000 to his drawing account did so for the express purpose that the money might become the property of the banker and be appropriated to his use, the sole condition being that the whole or any portion of it should be repaid upon demand. It was different, however, with other kinds of property—Exchequer bills, for example—deposited for security merely, and the banker who should sell such property, and appropriate the proceeds to his own use, would be guilty of a misdemeanour.

MR. CAIRNS said, that the explanation which had been given of the clause had made it much worse. The Attorney General had stated that money lodged with a banker became his property, and a debt due to the customer. Now, the interpretation clause said, that the word "property" should include debt, and therefore the banker who appropriated deposits to his own use would render himself liable to the penalty imposed by the present Bill. The consequence would be that, if a banker having a number of customers should fail, he would be subject to an indictment by every one of them. The question was too serious to be left where it was, and he would suggest that the wording of the clause should be altered.

MR. GURNEY asked whether, supposing a banker fraudulently negotiated a Bill lodged with him for collection before it arrived at maturity, and appropriated the proceeds to his own use, he would render himself liable to the penalty imposed by the Bill?

MR. GRIFFITH said, that in order to meet the difficulty, he would suggest the insertion, after the word "property," of the qualifying phrase, "not being money on current account."

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD said, that in reply to the remarks of the hon. and learned Member for Belfast, he would observe, that if the money deposited with a banker became a debt due to his customer he could not understand how the banker could appropriate a debt he owed. A banker who, with intent to defraud the depositor, negotiated a bill lodged with him under the circumstances stated by the hon. Member who spoke last but one, would undoubtedly fall within the second section of the Bill. The Act 7 & 8 Geo. IV. had been constantly evaded in consequence of what the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) had called its careful and precise language. The merit of the present Bill was that it was expressed in general language, sufficiently wide to include all cases, but guarding the public against oppression by the words "with a fraudulent intent."

MR. WALPOLE said, he would suppose that a banker received from his customer £1,000 across the counter, knowing that he was to break at the end of that day. He would also suppose that he appropriated that £1,000 to his own use and stopped payment on the following day. The question he wished to ask was, whether the reception of the money and the appropriation of it to his own use would or would not be an offence within the meaning of the Bill?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL replied, that it would not. The offence of the banker in the case supposed would consist in the concealment of his insolvency, but that concealment was not described as a crime within the meaning of the Bill.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD thought, the clause being couched in such general terms was the cause of difference of opinion as to its operation. He agreed with the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) that the clause exposed bankers to extreme danger. If money was paid across the counter to a banker, he received it as such, and was liable to the operation of the clause; but if money was paid with special directions, then the clause would constitute an offence which the framers of the Bankers Act did not contemplate, as that act required the directions to be in writing. If money was paid over to a banker in a bag, it was not received as money, but was a chattel of which the banker was baillee.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

EVIDENCE UPON OATH (HOUSE OF COMMONS) BILL.

BILL WITHDRAWN.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. WARREN said, that the hour (one o'clock) was too late to warrant him in moving the second reading of this Bill, and, as he should be compelled to leave town next week, he must be content to give up the hope of seeing his Bill become law this Session. He should, however, re-introduce the Bill at the commencement of next Session.

ELECTION PETITIONS BILL.

SECOND READING DEFERRED.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL intimated that he would not agree to the second reading of the Bill at that late hour.

MR. ADDERLEY said, he was astonished to hear that the Government intended to oppose a Bill which was brought in to check the practice of wholesale fraudulent election petitions, which, under cover of the privileges of the House, contained a number of roving, loose accusations made by law attorneys and agents, who knew that the allegations did not contain one word of truth, and that they were in fact baseless slanders, brought forward for the purpose of electioneering jobbing. There was undoubtedly great difficulty in coping with the evil, but the remedy he proposed was not his own merely. The provisions of the present Bill were drawn by Mr. Rickards some years ago, under the eye and with the approval of the late Speaker. Lord Eversley, the highest possible authority, had recently revised the Bill, and had suggested some alterations which had been adopted. And yet, with such a grievance and scandal, the Attorney General was prepared to object to the second reading of the Bill. He saw who was at the bottom of this opposition; it was Mr. Coppock himself. He was the only party who could feel aggrieved by it, and that was the principle upon which the Attorney General opposed it. Otherwise he (Mr. Adderley) could not conceive the ground of the Attorney General's opposition to it. The Bill did not obstruct the right of election petitions, but would correct abuses which tended to destroy it; for wholesale petitions for corrupt practices gave practical impunity to such practices, and parties accused of them recklessly retorted them. And he thought the character of the House would be sustained by the attempt to remedy the abuse which now existed.

SIR GEORGE GREY: It is impossible to discuss the Bill at this hour of the night.

The hon. Member has not explained the principle of his Bill.

MR. ADDERLEY: The Bill was framed to give some assurance of the bona fide character of election petitions, and to afford a check both upon their presentation and withdrawal. If the Government would take the matter up he would readily drop it, but he hoped that it would not be left where it stood at present, for the present Session afforded the best chance for the passing of such a measure, as hon. Members were now smarting under the evils of the existing system.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL thought the best thing he could do for the hon. Gentleman was to move the adjournment of the debate, in order to restore him to some degree of serenity of temper. He heartily concurred in the object contemplated by the hon. Gentleman, but did not think the provisions he proposed would tend to promote it. Indeed, the silly machinery by which it was sought to carry out that object would only make the House the laughing-stock of the world. He begged to move the adjournment of the debate, with a view to defer the discussion to a more favourable opportunity.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."

MR. SPOONER said, that as the Government assented to the principle of the Bill, they ought to introduce a measure of their own on this subject. If the hon. and learned Attorney General had himself that command of temper which he recommended to others, he would hardly have spoken in the contemptuous terms he did of the provisions of this Bill, more especially as he knew the high quarter from which they emanated.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, it might be possible to amend the Bill so as to adapt it to its object, but the hour was too late for giving it the consideration which its grave nature demanded; and he thought that it would be very injudicious for the House without an opportunity for such consideration to adopt so novel and important a measure.

MR. NAPIER maintained that some such measure as this was imperatively necessary.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question, by leave, withdrawn.

Second Reading deferred till Monday next.

House adjourned at a quarter after One o'clock till Monday next.

THE MUTINY IN INDIA—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH: My Lords, the disastrous news which has just been received from India, and which far surpasses my forebodings, serious as these forebodings were, induces me to put another question to the noble Earl (Earl Granville) with respect to the measures which the Government may intend to take for the purpose of averting the great calamity which threatens us in India. It is now twenty days since I put to the noble Earl this question—whether instructions had been sent, or would forthwith be sent to India, directing the different Governments to make known at every station of the army in that country that the Government would for the future, as in the past, protect all its subjects in the undisturbed exercise of their religion. In reply to that question, the noble Earl intimated an opinion that the Government of India had acted judiciously in issuing no Proclamation of that character. Now, in the face of that opinion, I find by the news received this morning that not only the Lieutenant Governor of Agra but the Governor General in Council of India has issued a Proclamation in the strongest terms of the tenor I have described. But, my Lords, upon what day was that Proclamation issued? On the 16th of May, when the mutiny at Meerut was already known, when the occurrences and mutiny at Delhi were known, and when the Proclamation of the King of Delhi was known. Now, the issuing of that Proclamation at that moment might possibly tend to prevent the spread of the mutiny, but it could have no possible effect in preventing the outbreak. I desired to prevent the breaking out of the mutiny, and not only to keep it from spreading. My Lords, the Government had ample notice in India of the danger that was impending. As long ago as the 22nd of January, an incendiary fire broke out in cantonments at a short distance from Calcutta—a thing almost entirely unknown and unheard of. From that period, for more than three months, these indications of the dissatisfaction of the troops continued to appear at all the principal stations of the army. The cause was perfectly well known, and arose from an apprehension on the part of the troops that their religion was to be interfered with. On the 25th of February the 19th regiment mutinied. It was not till the 31st of March that this regiment was disbanded. On the 6th of March the Government sent to Rangoon for the Queen's 84th regiment, and so deluded was it as to the extent of the ill-feeling and the mutinous disposition of the Native army, and the effect of the disbandment of the 19th regiment, that in a few days after that disbandment it was considered advisable and was actually under discussion whether that regiment should not be sent back to Rangoon. They have now sent for three Queen's regiments to protect the capital of British India. These indications of a bad spirit among the troops occurred at Allahabad, Agra, Meerut, Umballah, and all the great stations. No one can doubt that there was combination, and that one general feeling animated the whole. Now, it may be a matter deeply to be regretted, but it is undoubted, that events of the highest importance, especially in India, greatly depend upon the personal character of an individual. On the 3rd of May, Sir Henry Lawrence, a distinguished and decided officer, having reason to expect that there would be an outbreak on the part of the 7th Native Oude Infantry, moved at the fall of night two Native regiments, Her Majesty's 32nd regiment, and a battery of artillery upon them. He came upon them unawares, disarmed the regiment, and at once made them prisoners. Sir Henry Lawrence took the initiative. But what was the case at Meerut? At Meerut the mutineers took the initiative. They rose at six o'clock in the evening, and, according to the accounts we have received, it was not until nightfall that Her Majesty's carabineers were able to move. If General Gillespie at Arcot had not moved his dragoons to Vellore with more promptitude, the mutiny at Vellore might have spread through the whole of the Madras territory, and produced effects as dangerous as those which we have now to deplore. And who was the officer in command in Meerut? How did it happen that with a Queen's regiment of infantry, another of cavalry, and an overwhelming force of horse and foot artillery, the mutineers yet escaped without injury to Delhi, making a march of thirty or forty miles?

His name, it is said, is Hewitt. I do not find that he has at any time served with troops at all. He is an unknown man. There may be some difficulties, and there no doubt are, in making proper appointments in the army in consequence of the system of seniority which prevails. But that system has been of late modified, and the Government have now authority to appoint the men whom they think most fitted for a particular post. They ought, I contend, to have acted upon that authority. No Government is justified in placing in a most important command a man of whom the troops know nothing, and with whose qualifications they themselves are unacquainted. We see what has been the consequence of taking a contrary course. Give me now leave to ask where was the Commander in Chief upon this occasion? Why was not he in the midst of his troops? He must have been aware of all the difficulties which were growing up. He must have known the dangers by which he was beset. He did know that those dangers existed, for upon the 9th of April he assembled the troops at Umballah, and addressed them in the most sensible terms, endeavouring to undeceive them and to bring about among them a right feeling. He, however, went to the Hills, leaving the dangers to which I refer behind him in the plain. Such is not the conduct which a man occupying the position of Commander in Chief ought to have pursued. Let us for a moment look to the position in which General Anson now stands. From all I have learnt I believe the measures which have been taken by the Government of India from the moment they heard of the occupation of Delhi have been prompt and judicious. I have no fault to find with their conduct since that period; but I do find fault with them for having been blind to that which ought to have been obvious to all, and for having taken no precautions before this dreadful calamity took place. Well, what is the position of General Anson? He had with him two European regiments of cavalry, two European regiments of infantry, an ample supply of artillery: he had, beside, two regiments of Ghorkas, which he anticipates would remain faithful; but I am afraid he cannot absolutely rely upon any of the other native troops by whom he was accompanied. If with that force, however, independent of the three other native corps, General Anson were to meet the mutineers in the field, he may beat them, though they should be of double his numbers, without much difficulty. But, there are two enemies besides the mutineers with whom he will have to contend, of whom the people of this country make no account, but which are foes infinitely more dangerous than the mutineers—I allude to the climate of India at the season at which these occurrences took place, and to the total want of carriage. When the regiments go into cantonments the carriage is dismissed, and it would therefore be almost impossible for General Anson to move the European troops. The only resource open to him consists in impressing men from the hills. He may by that means bring down 3,000 or 4,000 persons to carry burdens, but to obtain the means of conveyance for the troops for a distance of eighty or a hundred miles, I believe he would find to be impossible. Just consider for a moment what is the nature of the season. It is the most severe of the whole year. It is just the concluding period of the hot weather, during which hot winds prevail: it is a time during which no European could venture into the sun, and when no officer would think of forcing a soldier to go into the open air if he could possibly avoid doing so. The late Sir Charles Napier was compelled by imperative circumstances to go into the field at a season such as that I have described. The consequence was that forty-five Europeans were struck down by the heat in one day, Sir Charles Napier himself being one of them, and the only one who survived. Such is the danger with which we have to contend. But I will assume that General Anson has been enabled to bring his troops up to Delhi. If he has done that, he ought I think by this time to be in possession of that city, and in possession of it, not owing to any vigorous attack of artillery, but by the most simple of all means—namely, taking possession of the canal by which Delhi is supplied with water, and cutting off the water, so as to deprive the inhabitants of all supply. Towards the conclusion of the dry season there is but a very small quantity of water in that canal, and the people of Delhi, amounting to the number of 60,000 or 70,000 persons, are, as a consequence, invariably reduced to great difficulties, and are compelled to resort to the Jumna, to procure the water which they require. To obviate that inconvenience I established a large tank in front of the Palace of Delhi, containing a sufficient quantity of water to supply the inhabitants of the town for a period of three weeks. I regret, however, to be obliged to say that the Government in India, actuated by that spirit which has characterized them since I left it—a spirit which has led them to desire to obliterate all trace of my having ever existed in that country—have allowed the tank to which I allude to go to ruin, and I believe that fortunately at this moment it will not furnish the inhabitants with a supply of water for any time; so that if the canal were cut off as I have suggested, and their access to the Jumna prevented, they would be precluded from obtaining water altogether. That is my only hope in the present emergency. Observe what will happen. I left police battalions in India. They were formed for the purpose of enabling the Government, in case of necessity, to move all the troops from any cantonment. Lord Hardinge was, owing to the establishment of that military police, enabled to move three battalions of infantry during the war in the Punjab, a step which, under other circumstances, he would not have been in a position to take. Now, General Anson has no such police battalions at his disposal. They have, I understand, been abolished, and he must leave a sufficient force at the different cantonments at Meerut and Umballah, or they will be burnt down behind him. It is no easy matter to protect a line of cantonments extending over seven miles, but if that is not done the consequence, as I have said, will be that those places will be burnt down and the Europeans will have no place to afford them shelter. That is what I apprehend, and there can be no doubt that General Anson's position would then be one of the most serious character. But it is not only in Meerut and Delhi, but in the Punjab, Ferozepore, and in almost every part of Bengal that this disposition to mutiny has been evinced. I regret to say that I fear we cannot at the present moment with any degree of security rely on the fidelity of any of the regular regiments of the Bengal army. The irregular troops will, I trust, remain faithful, and I hope we also may depend on the artillery, although it is said that some have been seduced or threatened into a junction with the mutineers at Delhi. I, nevertheless, trust that we may rely on the fidelity of the artillery. I believe we may place implicit confidence in that of the Ghoorka regiments, as well as in the good faith of the Native Princes whose territories approach Delhi—in fact, we possess in the neighbourhood of that city but a very small extent of territory—it chiefly belongs to the Native Princes. Our position, then, is such as I have described. The Government have drawn all available troops to Bengal, as it seems to me, very prudently and very properly, but in doing so they have left both Madras and Bombay almost defenceless. We know not the danger to which such a state of things may give rise. In short, my Lords, we are really—and I trust Her Majesty's Ministers are alive to the fullest extent of the danger—we are really in a position in which it becomes necessary for us to use every effort which this country can make to maintain—perhaps it may be to recover—that great empire which we have acquired in the East. Well, let me ask how do we stand? We have at this moment upon our hands three wars in Asia. Those wars we are reduced to the necessity of prosecuting with a reduced peace establishment. We have sent to China that naval force which should, in my opinion, be left upon the shores of England, to give security to this country even under the auspices of the most profound peace. The whole of that naval force, however, has been despatched to the waters of China; and for what?—to carry on a contest between Sir John Bowring and Commissioner Yeh. Six battalions of troops have been sent out there for the same purpose, and I cannot help thinking that those six battalions will be found totally inadequate to effect the purpose for which they have been sent, and quite insufficient to bring under our control the numerous population of Canton. The consequence will be that we shall find ourselves under the necessity of sending out further reinforcements, which should have consisted, in my humble judgment, of Native troops. But are we, with India in danger, to fight the battle of the Government? Are we, my Lords, determined, happen what may, to persevere in that fatal policy which Her Majesty's Ministers have adopted? Are we to strain every nerve to enable Sir John Bowring to march in triumph into the residence of Commissioner Yeh? I hope not. I maintain that, if the war with China were as sound in principle as I believe it to be the contrary, common sense and the dictates of the simplest policy ought to have induced the Government to remain for a time on the defensive, and not at once to involve the country in two wars contrary to all the principles by which the proceedings of a military State ought to be directed. I might have spoken of three wars, my Lords; but my noble Friend the Secretary for Foreign Affairs will probably tell me that we have brought one of them to a close. He will say that the war with Persia has been concluded. The noble Earl, it is true, has brought about a treaty with that country—he has not as yet got a peace. The treaty is one which I cannot help regarding as unsatisfactory. No, my Lords, I cannot deem it satisfactory that we should have entered into such terms with the King of Persia as that treaty contains after the insults which he heaped upon the British Minister at his court. We have, however, entered into that treaty; but even under better auspices than the present we should experience great difficulty in carrying it into execution. Persia may withdraw her troops from Herat, but that will be of little avail unless some other government be established there. If Persia will not yield it up upon those terms the evident objects of the treaty will be almost entirely defeated, and I have not yet heard that it has been decided on what Government shall succeed the Persians at Herat. The noble Earl must be aware that the British force now remaining in Persia is totally unable to hold Bushire and Mohammerah if there should be the slightest chance of any attempt at opposition on the part of Persia, and can any one who is acquainted with the national character of Native States for a moment doubt that this great calamity in India may have a very material influence in changing the policy of the Court of Persia? That is the present state of affairs. Our position in India at the present moment is that of being compelled, not only by a sense of interest, but by our sense of honour as a nation as well as individuals, to protect our empire in that country. It is as much the duty of the Government to protect our empire in India as it would be to protect the county of Kent, if attacked; and I trust that there never will exist in this country a feeling that, under any possible circumstances, that noble empire shall be abandoned. We must, therefore, send to India a sufficiency of force; but, while doing so, we must consider in what position we leave ourselves here. I fear that, under present circumstances, the noble Earl the Secretary for Foreign Affairs would feel his hand paralyzed if the material force of this country should be despatched to the East. How, under such circumstances, would he be able to speak with ordinary firmness or dignity; or could he avoid temporizing, if he felt that England was powerless to defend herself in case any foreign Power should choose to take the opportunity of attacking her? Even before this calamity occurred, I entertained a distinct opinion that, by our reduced establishments, we were reducing this country to a state in which, if we were not paralyzed, our power was materially weakened. We have now, however, a new war upon our hands, which will require an expenditure approaching that which was necessary for the contest in the Crimea, and which will require, in addition to the force which it is now proposed to send to India, an additional force of at least ten regiments of infantry, three regiments of cavalry, with their horses, for it will not be possible to horse them in India—and at least six batteries of artillery, with their horses, because at present, in some provinces, the artillery force is very small, and no troops can possibly move without guns. When we look to the force which it is absolutely essential to send to India, how can we fail to contemplate the material increase that is necessary to the military force of this country. I would recommend Her Majesty's Government to look the danger fairly in the face—not to take any exaggerated view of the case—but, at the same time, not to attempt to deceive themselves; and I think that the course which they ought to adopt is, to place this country under arms. While we are fighting battles of such interest in the East, we must be secure at home; and I know of no mode of suddenly obtaining that security but to adopt the same means as those which were adopted during the Crimean war—namely, to embody the militia. That step should be taken at the earliest period possible, as well as that of calling together the yeomanry, which has never before, since 1814, been allowed to go for a year without exercise: and we should adopt any other measures which the Government may consider necessary for placing at their disposal the whole military force of the empire. I have read in history that Hyder Ali, the great rival of the British power in the Deccan, used to say, with regard to the British power, that he was not afraid of what he did see, but of what he did not see; and it is for us now to show to the Natives of India that which they have not yet seen. We must come forward with increased strength upon every point, and teach them that to contend successfully against us in the field is a thing impossible. I wish, therefore, to ask the noble Earl what are the measures which the Government intend to adopt for reinforcing the army in India, and at the same time for placing us at home in security, while we are occupied in such an important war?

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, the noble Earl has taken a very large view of a subject which is unquestionably of great importance—of so much importance, indeed, that I should feel myself to be almost trifling with your Lordships, were I on the present occasion to attempt to go seriatim through all the events which have been lately going on in India. I may say, however, that with regard to the disbanding of the 34th Regiment, it appears to me quite clear that a short delay was wise and judicious, when that delay gave an opportunity for concentrating such a European force as prevented what would have been a most serious disaster. In respect of what has fallen from the noble Earl in reference to the disaster at Meerut, it certainly appears, so far as we are able to judge, from the accounts that have come to hand—though it should be remembered that we have at present no official information as to the facts—that some mismanagement has occurred; but I am quite sure that it is wiser—I will not say for individuals of your Lordships' House, but it is wiser and fairer for the Government to give no opinion whatever upon the subject, until the whole of the facts of the case have been placed before them. I quite agree with the praise which the noble Earl has bestowed upon Sir Henry Lawrence, and admit the complete success which attended the movements which he made, and, without doubt, a decided and energetic course of action may often solve a difficulty of that description. The great difficulty, however, in dealing with disaffection among the Native troops is the difficulty which arises from not knowing to what extent it has reached, and where it is likely to break out; and I may inform your Lordships that I know it as a fact, that up to the last moment the most confident assurances as to the loyalty and good feeling of those troops were received by the Indian Government from the colonels of those regiments. The noble Earl has praised the steps which have been taken by Her Majesty's Government since the juncture arrived, but I regret that he thought it his duty to follow up that expression of praise by a statement which, coming from a person of his high authority, will, I fear, create unnecessary alarm. The forces which he mentioned as being gathered together by General Anson before Delhi, will be met by the English troops which have been despatched from the hills to join him; they will also be met by the troops of the Native princes, who have shown a most cordial and praiseworthy desire of co-operating with the British troops—and I think that this is a very important circumstance, not only from the material advantage of their assistance, but also as showing the opinion which prevails in India as to the result of such a contest. When these troops have assembled, it will be impossible for the mutineers long to resist. I thought also that the noble Earl somewhat exaggerated the difficulties of the case. The disaffection by no means extends, as the noble Earl seems to infer, to the whole of the Indian army. In two of the Presidencies the conduct of the Native troops is excellent; and even in Bengal, where no doubt the spirit of disaffection prevails the most, some regiments have remained faithful to their colours, and have shown their loyalty by operating against their disaffected comrades. Now, with regard to those military points with which the noble Earl thinks it will be so difficult for General Anson to deal. I do not like to place my opinion against that of the noble Earl, but I know the opinion of Lord Canning. Lord Canning knew that the General would be at Umballa on the 18th, and before Delhi on the 26th, and he looked forward with the most confident expectation of having a force at his command sufficient to enable him to deal in a satisfactory manner with those unhappy and misguided men; and I think that your Lordships will agree with me in thinking that the confident opinion thus expressed carries with it some consolation, and should teach us not to thoroughly despond with regard to the present state of affairs. The noble Earl, my Lords, has asked me two questions; and the first one, with regard to what reinforcements Her Majesty's Government intend to send out to India in this crisis, I can answer in a few words. Before the arrival of the late news 10,000 men, consisting of four regiments and of reinforcements for European regiments, whether belonging to the Queen's service or the Company's service already in India, and since the arrival of that news, after communication with the Court of Directors, four more regiments have been placed under orders to embark. With regard to the steps which have been taken in India, the noble Viscount the Governor General has thought it right to take every precaution in his power, and to adopt every means to strengthen the troops available for service. The noble Earl will be glad to hear that since the conclusion of the Persian war—which, however, he calls not the conclusion of a war, but only a treaty—the whole of the European troops engaged in the late expedition have left Bushire, and three regiments, having reached Bombay, proceeded to Calcutta, where they arrived in an incredibly short period, and from that place they can be most expeditiously moved wherever their services may be most required. With regard to the second question, I think that the noble Earl looks upon this country as being in a much worse position than it is, when he talks of putting the country under arms. It is manifest that it would ill become me at present to enter into any detailed statement of the measures which Her Majesty's Government may think it necessary to adopt, in order to strengthen the military forces at home—the noble Earl may depend upon it they will take all those precautions which they may think necessary. I agree with the noble Earl that we should consider the subject in no spirit of exaggerated alarm, but I think that if, because we happen to be at war with a portion of the Chinese empire, and that there is an insurrection in one part of India, we were to take upon us to say that our alarm is such, that we think it necessary to prepare this country in the same way as we should do if we were engaged in a struggle which might end in dire calamity and disaster, we should be lowering ourselves in the eyes of the world. The noble Earl has alluded to my private friendship towards Lord Canning: I will not allude further to that subject than to say, that I have this day received a private letter from Lord Canning, in which he goes over all the circumstances of the case with the care and gravity becoming the nature of the subject, and the tone of that letter is such as to give the Government the greatest confidence. He states that, notwithstanding the difficulties, he is able to write in very good heart, and adds—and in that I am sure the noble Earl will concur—that he cannot be sufficiently grateful for having at this moment had at critical places three men so admirably fitted to deal with these circumstances as Sir Henry and Sir John Lawrence and Mr. Colvin. I do not wish to prophesy, but I trust that your Lordships will, at all events, wait until the arrival of the next mail before you allow it to go forth to this country and to the world, that we are reduced to such a strait as that which the noble Earl has pictured.

LORD BROUGHAM: In a case of this kind, considering our distance from the scene of events, I cannot help thinking that it is of great importance to ascertain what are the feelings—not merely the opinions, but the feelings of alarm founded upon these opinions—of those who are nearer the spot. My noble Friend (Earl Granville) has already told us that the alarm, if it ever existed, has been nearly allayed at Calcutta. Will he also inform us, if he can, what are the feelings in the Presidencies of Madras and Bombay? Perhaps, also, as the money-market is a test of alarm not altogether to be overlooked, he will add whether the funds either at Calcutta or Bombay have been materially affected by these events.

EARL GRANVILLE: I am much obliged to my noble and learned Friend for putting this question. While the funds in this country fell upon the receipt of this intelligence, Government paper at Calcutta and Bombay has remained at exactly the same rate.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE said, it was gratifying to think that the occurrences in India appeared now to be of a less serious character than the public mind at first supposed them to be. The noble Earl had not, however, satisfied him in regard to the measures the Government were about to take to send prompt assistance to India. When we considered the immense distance and time that must elapse before any reinforcements could reach their destination in India, it was most important that the Government should, if possible, enlist the assistance of our great Ally the Emperor of the French, of whose friendship and alliance we had heard so much, to allow our troops to pass through his territory to Marseilles, and to aid us then in conveying them down the Mediterranean. The assistance of the Pasha of Egypt should also be enlisted to convey them across to the Red Sea as rapidly as possible. In the course of his life he did not believe that there had arisen any crisis so formidable as the present was. He considered that they had as yet done little or nothing to meet the threatened danger when he recollected that we had a force at Aldershot of from 15,000 to 20,000 men, who, by some exertion and energy, might be transported to India with the assistance of those powerful friends to whom he had alluded. He thought it was their imperative duty to take those steps he had indicated. The country would judge of the vigour and capacity of the Government by the promptitude and zeal they now showed in sending adequate reinforcements to India. He was disposed to agree with the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville) in regard to the course taken against China. He thought it would be a disgrace to us if they declined to carry on the war there with efficiency. If the militia of this country were called out and placed in a position of active service, we should have in a short time a good army for the defence of this country; and the Government would then have all the regular troops at its disposal for carrying on to a successful issue the wars in which we might be engaged.

THE EARL OF ALBEMARLE said, that one thing which had fallen from his noble Friend the Lord President ought to be satisfactory, and that was the fact of the absence of disaffection in the other two Presidencies of India. That assurance coincided with everything he had heard on the subject. He trusted that the relative condition at this moment of the Bengal and Bombay armies would lead to a reconsideration of the different rule and practice with regard to the enlistment of the two armies; for he believed that that system was the principal, if not the proximate cause of the disturbances. The rule and practice was in Bengal to enlist only high caste men, Brahmins and Rajpoots, to the exclusion of all other castes. This had a most deleterious effect on that army, every regiment of which became, as it were, a box of lucifer matches. It was said that the religious feelings of the country were not interfered with; but he believed the religion of the country had nothing to do with the question, and that the propagandism of the missionaries had nothing to do with it. The Roman Catholics had for 350 years been trying to convert the country without creating disaffection; and the Protestants had been doing the same for fifty years without creating disaffection. Our predecessors as rulers in that country, from Mahmoud of Ghuznee, who was about contemporary with William the Conqueror, down to Tippoo Saib, all made short work of the question of religion. In Bengal the authorities were used to foster and pamper the feeling of high caste by turning out of regiments all low caste men who presumed to enlist. He hoped the Government meant, instead of making caste the qualification for enlistment, to make it, as was done in Bombay and Madras—a disqualification. The Sikhs and Ghoorkas had been faithful on this occasion, and they were of no caste, but were as brave and faithful as any troops could be. On another occasion, he should bring the subject of annexation in India before the House, and call on the Government to explain why, contrary to the advice of the Duke of Wellington, Sir John Malcolm, and Mountstuart Elphinstone, they did that which was shaking our Indian empire to its centre. He would quote the opinions of two well-informed persons on this subject. Sir Henry Russell, an eminent member of the diplomatic service in India, said that "the danger most to be dreaded in India was an extensive rebellion among the native subjects and native troops, and that danger was increased by the enlargement of our territory, which led to an increase of our native subjects and troops." The noble Earl was proceeding, when—

EARL GRANVILLE interposed. A question of great interest and importance had been asked and answered, but he hoped the noble Earl would not take up the time of the House by deviating into matters which had no intimate connection with that question. It was now past six o'clock, and the other business of the House should be proceeded with.

PRIVILEGE—LORD PLUNKET AND THE "EXAMINER" NEWSPAPER.

OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE rose to call the attention of the House to what he conceived to be a gross breach of the privileges of their Lordships' House. He wished to draw their Lordships' attention to an article in the Examiner newspaper of the 27th of this month, which was headed a "Libel on a Bishop," and when their Lordships had heard it read, he thought they would be of opinion that a grosser libel could not be penned. The person against whom it was directed was a Member of their Lordships' House, who, from his functions as a Prelate of the Church in Ireland, did not attend in his place in Parliament so frequently as they would all desire. He was a nobleman who was respected by all who knew him, of unassuming manners, of kind deportment, who must have won the regard of every person who had the honour of his acquaintance. Lord Plunket—the noble Lord who was libelled in this article—was the last man to lay himself open to an attack of this kind. He was a most unassuming man, a really hardworking Bishop, beloved by his clergy and by his flock, attending diligently to the duties of his see, and taking little or no part in their Lordships' deliberations. He should be the last man to wish in any way to encroach on the privileges of the press, which he conceived to be one of the most necessary guardians of our liberties; but, considering the unprovoked, unnecessary, and offensive character of this attack, he trusted their Lordships would assist him in vindicating the privileges of their House, and in marking conduct such as this with their disapprobation. The noble Lord against whom this attack was made was the son of, perhaps, one of the greatest men whom Ireland had ever produced. The first Lord Plunket was for years one of the most distinguished ornaments of his profession, and ultimately arrived at the head of it; and, though his son, the present Lord, might not possess all his great genius and talents, yet he had certainly inherited his kindness of heart and all those qualities which had endeared him to those with whom he came in contact. This article drew an ironical comparison between the character of the noble Lord and of his father, and proceeded to attack him most unwarrantably for a vote which he had given on the question of Ministers' Money lately before the House. In giving a vote against that Bill, this libel alleged that he was an unworthy son of his father. It was not necessary for him to enter into a vindication of the noble Lord, but it did so happen that the first Lord Plunket had always held and expressed in the strongest manner the opinion that the revenues of the Established Church in Ireland ought not to be interfered with. The article was as follows:—

"LIBEL ON A BISHOP.—Among the proxies against the second reading of the Ministers' Money Bill, in the House of Lords, we observe the name of Lord Plunket, Bishop of Tuam. It is morally impossible that this can be true. In fact, we have no hesitation to denounce it as a libel upon that noble Lord and right rev. Prelate. Lord Plunket, everybody knows, is the son of the late Lord, better known to the public as Mr. Plunket, the orator, the foremost Irishman of his day, as the champion of civil and religious liberty, the Whig, the Irish Chancellor of the Whigs, the man whom of all his countrymen the Whigs most delighted to honour, on whom they showered their favour and their patronage, not satisfied with advancing himself to the highest posts of the law, with the dignity of the British peerage, but lavishing places and preferments upon every member of his family with a profusion and partiality that excited the astonishment and often even the indignation of the public. To the success of Liberal principles, to the Liberal party, and the Governments resulting from its triumphs, the present Lord is indebted for all that he possesses and enjoys; for his mitre, for his coronet, for his wealth, his rank, his luxury, for every shred of his purple and fine linen, for every glass that sparkles, and every dish that steams upon his table. But for the Whigs and for Whig principles he would never have exchanged an Ulster curacy for a Connaught bishopric, and his hot punch for his cool claret. He would never have been translated to turbot, or preferred from the mutton-chop to the haunch of venison. Therefore we do not scruple to affirm it a moral impossibility that he could have voted, either in person or by proxy, in the manner attributed to him. Whoever inserted his name in the minority that voted against the Government and the Ministers' Money Bill virtually branded him both with illiberality and ingratitude, with degeneracy from his illustrious father, with forgetfulness of the unnumbered favours that have raised his family from poverty and obscurity to riches and consequence. We owe it to truth and justice, we owe it especially to the memory of the most eminent Irishman since Mr. Grattan, to vindicate the character of his son from so cruel an aspersion."

The noble Earl concluded by moving, that George Lapham, No. 5, Wellington Street, Strand, publisher of the Examiner newspaper, be called to the Bar.

EARL GRANVILLE: I can scarcely think that my noble Friend is quite in earnest in the Motion which he has just made. I do not rise for the purpose of justifying this article nor any other article which seriously or ironically holds up any of your Lordships to censure, but it appears to me that the Motion of the noble Earl will involve us in proceedings which may be endless, and we shall find ourselves in a permanent conflict with that very amusing publication, Punch. I think my noble Friend might have contented himself with calling attention to this attack which has been made on the noble Lord in this very unceremonious manner, but I cannot think that he is serious in asking you to take the step of calling the publisher to the bar.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, although the noble Earl might consider himself justified in indulging in a tone of levity and ridicule in connection with this question, he (the Earl of Derby) should have thought that he would have taken a little more

pains in setting the House right as to the course it ought to take in reference to this gross and scandalous attack on a right rev. Prelate and a Peer of Parliament. He should be the last to interfere with the power of the public press in commenting upon the conduct of public men, and even in holding them up to ridicule. It was, however, a very different question when it came to deal with the votes given in that House, and with the motives which were supposed to influence them—imputing the most disgraceful conduct to some noble Lords in the votes which they gave in that House. What was the present case? It appeared that because the right rev. Prelate had not voted upon a particular question in a manner agreeable to the views of this writer, he proceeded to comment upon the Bishop's conduct, by saying that it was a gross libel to suppose that the noble Lord had voted in the way it was recorded he had done, because if he had voted so he would have forgotten all the obligations he had inherited from his father, and have exhibited an utter absence of those feelings of liberality and gratitude to those political friends, by whose kindness he had inherited his title and position. Let them say what they pleased, that was the literal meaning of the article. It said that by the noble Lord's merely giving the vote referred to by proxy, exercising thereby his undoubted right against the Bill, which threatened to confiscate the revenues of the Church—although the noble Lord by so voting had expressed his opinion in the least unostentatious way possible—he was nevertheless told in this article, that by giving his vote thus as a Prelate and a Peer he had shown himself utterly regardless of the circumstances of his late father; that he had degenerated from his principles, and that he was wholly insensible to every sentiment of gratitude and liberality. A more disgusting attack he (the Earl of Derby) had never read than that made upon the right rev. Prelate. The vulgarity and scandalous tone of the language used placed the writer below contempt; and only that the article imputed improper motives to a Prelate and a Peer in respect of a vote he had given in that House, he should have recommended his noble Friend not to take the slightest notice of it, but to treat it with that contempt which it deserved. At the same time, by imputing gross misconduct to a noble and right rev. Prelate, for the exercise of his right in conscientiously voting against a certain measure—by charging improper motives to a Peer and Prelate who was much respected by every one who knew him, he (the Earl of Derby) felt that this article was a gross abuse of that which was called the privilege of the press, and fully warranted the Motion for calling the writer to the bar of the House. But however desirable it might be to confer on the printer of that journal the distinction of standing at the bar of their Lordships, it was an honour which he did not see thrust upon him—but whoever might be the individual that penned it, it was quite evident that he had shown an utter absence of gentlemanlike or honourable feeling, and that he was utterly ignorant of the duties and responsibilities of public life. The writer said that the late Lord Plunket owed everything he possessed to the Liberal party. Well, now, that in itself was a libel upon the late distinguished statesman and lawyer. The late Lord Plunket owed everything he had obtained to his own distinguished merit. His services to the Liberal party were great, and undoubtedly they had not been more than adequately remunerated by the simple justice which had been done to him by that party. He (the Earl of Derby) could only say he wished that no one who received the honour of a peerage might deserve that honour less than the noble Lord whose son's conduct was now so bitterly impugned. Was it to be tolerated, because a noble Lord had been raised to the honours of a peerage for services which richly deserved them, that his posterity were to be bound by the public opinions of their ancestor, and should not dare to vote in any other way but in accordance with the sentiments of that Government who were the successors of those that, thirty years before, had obtained a peerage for the head of the family? Was the conscientious expression of opinion by his son to bring upon him accusations of gross ingratitude and of forgetfulness of all the obligations which he owed to the Liberal party? The writer of the article in question had shown an utter ignorance of what the duties of a Member of that House were, and pushed the principles of political gratitude to an absurd extent. Because a man thirty years ago had received the honour of a peerage, was his son to be the perpetual slave of the party who conferred upon his father such peerage? He would not recommend his noble Friend to press his Motion for calling the writer to the bar, but he fully participated with his noble Friend in those feelings of indignation which he expressed. He thought his noble Friend might content himself with having given expression to his opinion regarding this disgraceful and discreditable article, the writer of which had shown entire ignorance both of the duties of a Peer of Parliament and of the obligations of a gentleman and a man of honour.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE was understood to say that the language of the article might be very improper to be applied to Lord Plunket, but it was one of those hoaxing and bantering attacks to which all public men were subjected every day; and if their Lordships were to notice it in the way proposed, it would end in the necessity of having Punch permanently laid down on the table, for that publication contained similar attacks every week. The article alleged, somewhat ludicrously, that the noble Lord was very unlike his father, of whom the editor of the Examiner had a very high opinion, while he had a rather low opinion of his son. It could hardly be denied that he had a right to his opinions. He thought his noble Friend would do well to take no further notice of the article.

LORD BROUGHAM concurred with his noble Friend (the Earl of Derby) in saying that a more harmless and inoffensive individual, independent of his other merits, than the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Tuam) never sat in that House, and he believed that he was universally respected and beloved in his diocese. The libel which had been read spoke of what his father owed to the party of his noble Friends opposite; but a more unwarrantable statement he never happened to see; for what the late Lord Plunket owed to that party was as nothing compared with what the party owed to him. His services at the bar, in Parliament, and on the bench were during his whole life of the highest value to his country; and throughout he was one of the most distinguished ornaments of the great party to which he belonged. With regard to the article which had been read, it was, no doubt, strictly speaking, a breach of the privileges of their Lordships' House, but of what use would it be to contend with the press in such cases as these? He remembered that on one occasion his friend Mr. Marryatt was represented in a newspaper as having said at a public meeting in the city that he would not go in procession to that “d—d cold church,” meaning some particular church in the city of London. He felt much annoyed at the circumstance, and wrote a letter to the editor, in which he stated that his actual words were that he would not go to that “damp cold church.” The next day there appeared in the newspaper a statement to this effect:—“We have given a place in our columns to the contradiction which Mr. Marryatt has made; but at the same time, we think it right to say that we have referred the matter to our reporter, who is certain that he used the words ‘d—d cold church,’ and to add that we have the most perfect confidence in the accuracy of our reporter.” The gentleman complained to him of that treatment, and he (Lord Brougham) recommended him in future not to be too hasty in contradicting any statement that might appear in a newspaper.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE said, he did not intend to press his Motion, but regretted that the two Members of the Government who had spoken had not expressed a stronger feeling upon the subject of an insult offered to one of their Lordships.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE was understood to disclaim the smallest sympathy with the alleged disrespect shown towards Lord Plunket, for whom, on the contrary, he had the very highest respect. As the noble Lord took little part in public life he had not the pleasure of his acquaintance, but at the same time he had no hesitation in saying that the Government could not feel otherwise than deep regret that the noble Lord had met with such apparent disrespect.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY must express his entire concurrence with what fell from the noble Earl near him, (the Earl of Derby), namely, that the writer of this article was utterly unworthy of putting his foot even as near their Lordships as the bar of the House. He therefore greatly rejoiced that his noble Friend had withdrawn his Motion, but inasmuch as the freedom of debate in their Lordships’ House ought to be protected as far as circumstances would permit, he thought it was greatly to be regretted that the noble Marquess had not treated the insult offered to Lord Plunket in a more becoming tone. He was utterly astonished to hear the noble Marquess advising their Lordships to treat the matter as a joke. Doubtless the criticism in question might be intended for a joke, but if so all he had to say was that it was a great pity people were unable more easily to determine when these Whig gentleman were speaking seriously, and when in joke. As for himself, he must be allowed to observe, that he had but little appreciation of such wit.

LORD DENMAN was understood to complain generally of the manner in which their Lordships’ debates were reported. He might ask their Lordships, did they believe that their impressions were adequately conveyed to the public? The other night a noble Baron near him (Lord Wensleydale) had addressed their Lordships upon a legal subject, a matter upon which his Lordship might well be supposed competent to speak. Nevertheless all mention, or nearly so, of his speech was omitted in the public press. The fact was, the press of the country went hand in hand with the Government. Still it was true there were those amongst their Lordships, and he confessed he was of the number, who, unlike the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville), were in the habit of addressing themselves to their Lordships, and not to the press.

HARBOURS OF REFUGE—PETITIONS.

LORD RAVENSWORTH, pursuant to notice, rose to present petitions from ship-owners, &c., of Blythe, Woodhorn, and Bothal, praying that a harbour of refuge might be constructed on the north-east coast for the protection of shipping; also to move for—

“Correspondence between Mr. W. A. Brooks, of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, with the Secretary of the Admiralty, of the 26th of December 1856 and the 20th of February 1857: And also,

“Estimate for the Formation of the whole of the Works requisite for the Completion of the Harbour now in course of Construction at Dover; and that a plan of the said Harbour, with Soundings, do accompany such Return, distinguishing that Portion of the Work first contracted for and completed, and also that Portion now contracted for and in course of Construction; and that longitudinal and transverse Sections of the Piers or Works be also furnished with the Plan: And also,

“Similar Estimates for the Completion of the Harbours now forming at Jersey and Alderney, together with Plans and Sections as above described for Dover Harbour.”

The noble Lord, referring to the return of wrecks on the coast of Great Britain, recently laid before Parliament by the Board of Trade, pointed out that one-fourth of the whole had occurred within seventy miles of the rivers Tyne and Wear.

The petitioners prayed that a harbour of refuge might be constructed on the north-east coast, and he would appeal to the noble Duke near him (the Duke of Northumberland) who had been so energetic in everything that could tend to promote the welfare of the sailor, and the preservation of life from shipwreck, to confirm his statement that such a measure would obviate a large part of these casualties. He would remind their Lordships that, having on a former evening brought this subject before them, the answer which he received was by no means satisfactory. However, the Government had now taken the matter in hand, as would appear from the circumstance of the Vice President of the Board of Trade having moved for a Select Committee of the other House to investigate certain details concerning it. At the same time, when he referred to the terms of that Motion, he must say it appeared to him to be very incomplete, for it did not go into the consideration of the establishment of harbours of refuge throughout the kingdom, but simply to this—whether it was expedient to make any further grants for harbours of refuge. Now he ventured to express a hope that the Select Committee would enter into the investigation of the whole question. As for the correspondence between Mr. Brooks and the Admiralty, he must observe that although he had not the advantage of the slightest acquaintance with that gentleman, yet he understood him to be an engineer of considerable talents, and that he had brought a great deal of information to bear upon the subject of which he treated. No later than the year 1856, Mr. Brooks had submitted a plan to the Admiralty for the construction of a harbour of refuge in the Bay of Redcar, and the correspondence which was now moved for showed in detail how great might be the loss to life and property occurring on the north-east coast upon even one single occasion of shipwreck. For instance, during the heavy gales of January last, no fewer than ninety-four ships had been wrecked on the north-eastern coast, of which about twenty were seen to founder with their crews on board, and at least 200 mariners perished. After such statements, confirmed, and repeated, as they might be, by the official returns, surely the Government would see the vast importance of providing for the exigencies of trade and commerce, by constructing harbours of refuge on the north-eastern coast. The noble Lord the President of the Board of Trade had upon a former occasion alluded to the large sums of money that were being expended along the southern coast upon harbours of refuge. Now he (Lord Ravensworth) must be allowed to observe that there was a feeling almost that a spirit of favouritism had been evinced in this matter towards the southern coast; and it was on that account that he had been induced to ask for those returns with respect to the works going on at Dover Harbour, as well as at Jersey and Alderney. He had been assured that the estimates with respect to those works had been of a most fallacious description, and that they were not calculated to cover a fraction of the ultimate expenditure. As for the works at Dover, he believed that the situation for the new harbour had been a most ill-chosen one, and that the money it would cost might as well have been flung into the sea. The harbour had already cost the country £650,000, but perhaps the country was little aware that before the works could be completed they must cost £2,000,000. The Government might refuse him the information which he sought with respect to these works; but whether they did or did not, he had no doubt but that the Select Committee which was now about to meet would not separate without having all the details laid before them. He had taken the question up, because he was fully sensible of its importance, and when their Lordships recollected that the annual exports of this country came now to be cited at £120,000,000 sterling, and the imports at almost as much, to say nothing of our great coasting trade—and the trade which passed along the north-east coast, between the ports of the Humber, Scarborough, Whitby, Hartlepool, Durham, Newcastle, Berwick, Edinburgh, Dundee, and Aberdeen, was immense—he thought they would be inclined to think that he had not needlessly interfered in the matter.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, he was fully sensible of the importance of this subject. If it were the duty of the Government to expend money in building a harbour of refuge on the north-east coast, it would be impossible for him, on the part of the Government, to state what place would be selected for that purpose. The question of harbours of refuge had been referred to a Committee of the other House, and they would, no doubt, report their opinion to the House whether the public money ought to be granted for the construction of one or more harbours of refuge on the north-east coast. He had no objection to a return of the estimated expense of the works in progress at Dovor, Jersey, and Alderney; but many of the particulars were already before Parliament, and it would be impossible to give the noble Lord the details he required without a larger expenditure than it would be proper to incur. He, therefore, proposed that the return should be confined to the money expended and the amount required to complete the works in question.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

Petitions read, and ordered to lie on the table.

POSTAL COMMUNICATION WITH AUSTRALIA—QUESTION.

MR. H. BERKELEY said, he rose to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, what arrangements have been made to supply the interruption in the steam postal contract service with Australia in consequence of the accident to the mail steampacket Oneida, and whether the mail due in the next month may be expected in the proper course at Suez, or by the long sea route by Cape Horn; also whether it be true, as formally stated in the Sydney newspapers, that the same portion of the machinery of the steamer Oneida which broke down on her passage with the first mail between King George's Sound and Point de Galle had been previously damaged whilst she was employed as a Government transport, and patched up with iron plates at Glasgow before her departure upon the Australian mail service; further, whether such damage was reported to the Government by the Admiralty Surveyor?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that the Emu had been sent out take the place of the Oneida. With respect to the arrival of the next mail, he of course could give no reply to it at present. In answer to the other question of his hon. Friend relative to the machinery of the Oneida he had to state that it had been surveyed and reported upon unfavourably by the officers of the Government, and he could not understand how or why the vessel had been despatched.

On the Order of the Day being read for going into Committee of Supply,

THE MUTINY IN INDIA—QUESTION.

MR. DISRAELI :—The House will hardly feel surprised if, in the present state of public affairs, before we go into Committee of Supply, or discuss any of the Motions of which notice has been given, I make some inquiry of Her Majesty's Government respecting the present condition of our Indian empire. It is only a few years since we were involved in a war which, if not of unexampled magnitude, was of an importance seldom equalled in our history—a war in which this country made great sacrifices of blood and treasure. By that war the public debt and the taxation of the country were considerably increased, and some of the best lives of our fellow-citizens were lost in that encounter. Still the nation never for a moment murmured at those great sacrifices. The country was enthusiastic, and Parliament was unanimous in supporting Her Majesty and Her Majesty's Government in the late war with Russia. But I believe that both the people and the Parliament were greatly induced to take the high line of conduct which they pursued on that occasion because they believed that the policy of Russia had a tendency to endanger our Indian empire. Well, Sir, no sooner had peace been proclaimed, and happily proclaimed, between Russia and England, than we found ourselves involved in another war—a war with Persia. For a long time the cause of that war was unknown, and its object, to say the least of it, perplexing. Still, the country and Parliament submitted with forbearance to the want of information which then prevailed upon the subject, because there was a general impression that the relations between Persia and England were of a nature difficult and delicate; that the interests of our Indian empire were involved in a right appreciation and management of those relations; and that the independence of Persia must be maintained in order to form a barrier between our rivals and our Indian empire. Well, Sir, the last document which completed the peace between this country and Russia has only recently been signed; the ratification of the peace between this country and Persia has been only recently laid on the table; and then we found ourselves involved in a third war—a war with China. It could not be said that the Chinese could invade our Indian empire; it could not be said that it was necessary to maintain China as a barrier between our rivals and our Indian empire. But it was said to be of the utmost consequence that we should not permit for a moment the slightest indignity or supposed indignity to be endured by our flag in China, because it was of the first importance that the reputation of England in all Eastern countries should be maintained inviolate, otherwise our Indian empire would be endangered. Influenced by this policy, and by these reasons, the majority of the House, and perhaps of the country, have contentedly been involved, within the last five years, in three great Eastern wars, because, however great the sacrifice, however great the exertions necessary, however great the call upon our resources, there was a general opinion that nothing should be shunned or spared when the safety of our Indian empire was at stake. Well, Sir, after all these exertions and sacrifices, we now find the existence of our Indian empire is indeed imperilled—not by the action of any foreign powers, whose movements both as regards place and time would require a considerable interval to elapse before they could take effect upon our position, but our Indian empire is now endangered, not by the manœuvres and machinations of our declared foes, but by internal enemies, in a form that we could not possibly have expected. We learn, within the last eight-and-forty hours, that the ancient capital of Hindostan is no longer in our possession. And in whose possession is it? It is in the possession of our insurrectionary and rebellious troops. Surely this is a position of affairs which creates a necessity for this House to demand from Her Majesty's Ministers that they should throw some light upon it, give us some information as to its causes, and, above all, tell us what they propose to do at this emergency. Sir, the information that has reached us within the last twenty-four hours communicates the most important events that have occurred, certainly in my public life—and, I should think, in that of most present. Whatever may be the various views and emotions which hon. Members of this House, or the country generally, may entertain and experience at this intelligence, I am quite sure there is one predominant sentiment to which all others, however important, must be subordinated, and that is a determination to support the Sovereign and the Government in all those measures which so grave and critical an emergency may require. I am quite sure that the spirit of this country is so high, its resources are so great, that there is nothing the people are not prepared to endure, no expenditure which they are not prepared to incur, and no effort which they are not prepared to make, in order to maintain that empire which it is the boast of this country so long to have possessed, and which is one of the chief sources of our wealth, our power, and our authority. But, if I have not imperfectly expressed the general feeling of the House, I hope it is not unreasonable in me to inquire of Her Majesty's Ministers whether they are prepared to respond to these sentiments in a manner congenial—whether they are prepared, in a manner adequate to the occasion, to carry these feelings into effect. I think, Sir, we should not be doing our duty if we lost a moment before making this inquiry of the Government. I should be glad, therefore, to hear to-night that, whether as regards their power or their promptitude, those measures will be taken which are calculated to vindicate the honour and the authority of this country, and to maintain our interests in India. I think, Sir, that is the first and paramount inquiry which, under these circumstances, we are bound to make of Her Majesty's Government; and I think it is one on which we have a right to expect a full and frank communication. But, I should not be performing what I deem to be my duty as a Member of this House, if I paused here, and rested satisfied with such an inquiry alone. I think we have a right to expect from Her Majesty's Government that they should tell us to-night what, in their opinion, is the cause of these great disasters. This calamity has not been of a sudden nature; there have been, and for no inconsiderable period, dark rumours from India, which have made men anxious and thoughtful. There has been an occurrence of many perplexing incidents in that country, which, no doubt, cannot have been lost upon the attention and consideration of men charged with the responsible duty of administering the affairs of an empire. I want, therefore, to know not only what, in the opinion of the Government, has been the main cause of these calamitous events, but whether they were forewarned? I wish to know whether, in their opinion, the cause is political or religious, whether it has originated in the maladministration of our affairs, or in some burst of fanaticism which ought, perhaps, to have been foreseen, even if it could not have been prevented? I wish to know what has been the general nature of the communications received by the Government from the highest Authorities in India, military and civil, upon this subject? I wish to know whether it be true or untrue that, months ago, the highest military Authority in India warned Her Majesty's Ministers of the unsatisfactory state of our army there? I wish to know whether there have been placed before the Ministry statements and complaints that our army in India is under-officered? I wish to know whether it has been represented to Her Majesty's Government that the habit of employing our regimental officers in civil and diplomatic services, without substituting men of equal experience and rank in their places, has exercised an injurious influence upon the discipline and the spirit of the army? I wish to know whether the civil and the military Authorities of India have been in accord, as to the information they have given, and the representations they have made—whether the highest civil Authority in India is not agreed with the highest military Authority there in the policy which he recommended, and the views which he wished to enforce? I would even ask of Her Majesty's Ministers whether the Governor General of India, at this moment, has expressed his willingness to resign the high office which he held? These are questions which, I think, under the circumstances, Her Majesty's Ministers should not shrink from frankly meeting. I have refrained from entering into any controversial question. If it be necessary that the Government of India should be brought under the consideration of this House, no doubt a fitting opportunity will be offered for doing so. I have confined myself to asking questions which, I believe, anxiously occupy the public attention at this moment, which appear to me to be proper and fair inquiries to address to the Government, and to which I trust I shall receive a frank and full reply. I would presume, before I sit down, Sir, to make only one observation on the state of India. No one can, for a moment, shut his eyes to the extreme peril to which, at this moment, our authority is subject in that country; but I cannot say, little as my confidence has ever been in the Government of India, that I take those despairing or desperate views with respect to our position in that country which, in moments of danger and calamity, are too often prevalent. I would express my opinion—an opinion which I have before expressed in this House—that the tenure by which we hold India is not a frail tenure; but, when we consider that that great country is inhabited by twenty-five nations different in race, different in religion, and different in language, I think it is not easy, perhaps it is not possible, for such heterogeneous elements to fuse into combination. Everything, however, is possible; every disaster is practicable, if there be an inefficient or negligent Government. It is to prevent such evils that I think the House of Commons is performing its highest duty, if it takes the earliest opportunity after the intelligence has arrived—intelligence which has produced great alarm in the capital of Her Majesty's empire—of inviting Her Majesty's Ministers frankly to express to Parliament what, in their opinion, is the cause of the great calamity that has occurred—and, above all, what are the means which they intend to take—and at once to take—in order to encounter the peril before us, and to prevent the evil consequences which may be apprehended.

MR. VERNON SMITH: I rise, Sir, readily to respond, as far as the occasion will permit, to the call of the right hon. Gentleman, and certainly no one can feel the least surprise, considering the grave intelligence which has come from India, that a gentleman occupying so prominent a position in public affairs as the right hon. Gentleman should make some inquiries respecting the state of that country from Her Majesty's Government. In what has fallen from the right hon. Gentleman I have little to gainsay or to contradict, with the exception, perhaps, of the observation that the Russian war was conducted entirely for the security of our Indian empire. Sir, the Russian war was not conducted entirely for the security of our Indian empire. If it had been we should still be waging it; because I believe that if any persons were sorry for the conclusion of that war, they were the residents of India and the Indian Government. They would have wished that Power to have been infinitely more thwarted than it was, and to have been beaten infinitely further from the approaches to the Indian empire. The right hon. Gentleman asked the Government what advices they had received from India, and what preparations they were about to make to put an end to the evils occurring there; and the right hon. Gentleman added, in a manner befitting the occasion, and which did honour to himself, that the House of Commons would be prepared to place at the disposal of Her Majesty any means whatever that might be required for that purpose. Her Majesty's Government have been fully alive to that, and, feeling confidence in the House of Commons, they have immediately decided upon sending out reinforcements of European troops to India; but, as the right hon. Gentleman has asked the question, perhaps it would be satisfactory to the House that I should state with the utmost frankness, and with something of detail, what those reinforcements are. I am now speaking in the month of June—but by the middle of next month, I hope—the transports being provided—that there will sail from this country nearly 10,000 men. Those forces were partly in preparation before: 7,690 of them consist of reliefs and recruits to the Queen's army, and the complement of the East India Company's recruits brings up the whole number to 9,940, or, in round numbers, 10,000 men. But that is not all. The House is probably aware that under the Act of Parliament the Government has no right to provide more than a certain number of Queen's troops for India without the application of the Court of Directors. The Court of Directors immediately upon receipt of this intelligence determined to make such application; and I need scarcely say that if they had not done so, the Government would have called upon Parliament to give them fresh powers for the purpose. The Court of Directors, however, willingly came forward, and they have applied for 4,000 fresh men, so that I hope that in the course of a very short time 14,000 European troops, partly reliefs, partly recruits, and partly additional troops will be on their way from these shores to India. I hope that the House will not be carried away by any notion that we exaggerate the danger because we have determined upon sending out these troops. It is as a measure of security alone that these troops are sent out. And, Sir, with respect to the danger to be apprehended, I must quarrel with the expression made use of by the right hon. Gentleman. I cannot agree with the right hon. Gentleman when, after summing up the possible dangers that might occur, he tells us that our Indian empire is "imperilled" by the present disaster. I deny that assertion. I say that our Indian empire is not "imperilled," and I hope that in a short time the disaster, dismal as it undoubtedly is, will be effectually suppressed by the force already in that country. I need not detail to the House the transactions which have taken place, because every hon. Gentleman has read in the journals of the day a pretty faithful narrative of them; but I might say that I am proud of the manner in which the Indian service have acted. I think that no better example could be found in civil life than that which was set by Mr. Colvin in Agra and the two Lawrences in Oude and the Punjab, and the Governor General has expressed his delight and satisfaction at having to act with men of such sound and vigorous judgment. Everything that can be done is being done in India, and troops have been already marched up to surround what the right hon. Gentleman calls the ancient capital of the Moguls, the city of Delhi. Luckily the outrage has taken place there, because it is notorious that Delhi may be easily surrounded, so that if we could not reduce the place by force we could by famine. But I have no doubt that it will be reduced by force immediately that a man of the well-known vigour of action of my gallant friend General Anson, who now commands the army of the North, appears before the walls of Delhi; and, at the date of the mail leaving, we had advices that General Anson would shortly be before the town with an ample force of infantry, cavalry, and artillery. Unfortunately the mail left on the 18th ultimo, and I cannot, therefore, apprise the House that the fort of Delhi has been razed to the ground; but I hope that by the next mail we shall receive intelligence that ample retribution has by this time been inflicted on the mutineers who occupy that city. The right hon. Gentleman proceeded to inquire what were the causes of the disaffection, and he dwelt upon a good many of them which have been circulated in different quarters of society; but when he asks whether the Government has been advised of those causes and has failed to remedy them, I can only say that no application has been made from the local Governments till now for an increase of force, and I may add, that the remedy which is always suggested for every evil is an increase of the European force. The right hon. Gentleman has referred, inter alia, to the withdrawal of military men for the civil service. That has been the habitual custom of the Indian Government for a long series of years, and has never been disapproved of; but whenever a regiment is called into action on foreign or domestic service, it is the duty of all military men who are engaged in the civil service immediately to join their regiments. Another cause, and a very delicate one, is the alleged interference with the religion of the Native troops. There certainly has arisen of late an impression among the troops that there was to be a general conversion of the Natives to Christianity; and the feeling of insubordination, as the right hon. Gentleman is aware, broke out first in the 19th Regiment, with the refusal of the men to bite the new cartridges, which were supposed to be greased with an animal substance which they abhor. Those and other causes have concurred, particularly in the Bengal army, to produce results which are undoubtedly deserving of the deepest consideration, but I am not aware that they have even been brought so prominently before the Government as to justify a charge of neglect against the Government for not having applied a remedy to them. No doubt the Bengal army is the one chiefly animated by this kind of disaffection, owing partly to the higher caste of the Sepoys enlisted in it, and partly to other causes which will require and will receive the most anxious and careful investigation at the hands of the Government. The right hon. Gentleman alluded to some other matters which I had rather that he had omitted, such as an alleged difference between the Governor General and the Commander in Chief. I am quite aware that a rumour of that kind has been bruited about in private circles, but of my own knowledge I know nothing of it. In their communications with me, however, I have always heard those Gentlemen speak in the highest possible terms of each other, and I am not aware that there are such differences between them as might not be allowed between all men acting together in public life without endangering private friendship. Then the last question which the right hon. Gentleman asked was, whether the Governor General had not offered his resignation—whether, in fact, he had not actually resigned. Resign in such a crisis as this! Why, Sir, I should imagine that there is no one less likely to allow such a thought to enter his head than my noble Friend Lord Canning, and I am happy to state, that neither on this occasion, nor on any previous occasion, has my noble Friend tendered his resignation. Lord Canning has behaved in this emergency with the vigour and judgment which I should always have anticipated. His letters show no want of calmness, no lack of confidence. He says that he is certain that he shall be able to put this revolt down, and he adds, that when he has done so he shall turn his mind to ascertaining the causes which have led to it, and the best means of remedying them, as far as lies in his power. There has been no lukewarmness on his part, no backwardness, no shilly-shallying. His letter breathes that calm confidence and self-possession which best become a noble and generous mind. I have no hesitation in prophesying that my noble Friend will prove himself perfectly equal to the occasion. He may be surrounded in Calcutta by persons who entertain fears, but he has invariably reproved them; but when people talk of the panic which exists in India, the best possible test of that, probably, is that delicate barometer of the state of public feeling—the funds. They have not been disturbed, and I believe that the Company's paper remains in exactly the same state as it was before these occurrences took place. The right hon. Gentleman is aware that to enter into too much detail would not be wise on the present occasion. I could, if it were necessary, detail to the House every spot at which troops are quartered, and every arrangement which has been made thereon, for the fullest information has been sent home as regards the Punjab, Bengal, and all other parts of India. Suffice it to say, that there will be European troops in India equal to any emergency, and, as a proof of the truth of this statement, the House need only turn to the conduct of the troops during the Persian war—troops whom General Outram described to be in as fine a condition as any troops in the world. On the arrival of some of those troops at Bombay they were immediately shipped to Calcutta, thence to be conveyed in boats up the Ganges to the vicinity of Delhi, if affairs there are not brought to an earlier conclusion. I am not aware of anything else respecting which I have not offered as frank and sincere explanation as possible on the present occasion. As regards the allusion to the existence of danger in the present state of things in India, I do not believe that any danger does exist further than what must arise from any outbreak which may happen periodically in India from fanaticism or other causes, to be put down as surely as the present outbreak will be. Therefore, I anticipate no danger to our Indian empire, but I can express no surprise or objection that the right hon. Gentleman, under the existing grave circumstances in India, and considering the loss of life which has taken place, accompanied by horrors I should be sorry to detail, should have brought the subject under the notice of the House, and called for an explanation, which I hope I have tendered, however imperfectly, with all frankness.

SAVINGS-BANKS FUNDS.

QUESTION.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, that assuming that it was not the wish of the House to continue the discussion on Indian affairs, he would at once proceed to call the attention of the House to some gigantic changes in the public stocks during the last two years, and would ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer for an explanation as to the purchase of £287,600 Three per Cent Stock, and £2,470,000 Exchequer bills, and as to the sale of £2,384,030 Three per Cent Stock, and £111,000 Exchequer bills, belonging to the trustees of savings banks, in the year from the 20th day of November, 1855, to the 20th day of November, 1856. In round numbers, in 1855 and 1856 £10,036,000 Exchequer bills had been bought, and £5,415,000 stock and £4,449,500 Exchequer bills had been sold. What was the meaning of these gigantic operations in the public securities? Every statesman who was an authority on finance, had declared that this House should watch with jealousy any changes in the public stocks, and the Government making such changes was bound to explain the meaning and the object of it. Now, in the first three months of last year, namely, from January to April, 1856, £2,100,000 Exchequer bills were bought, and £2,380,030 stock were sold at the low prices of 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, in order to pay for the Exchequer bills. Stock rose in July, and £287,600 stock was purchased at the high prices of 95 to 96. This was a trust fund for the savings-banks, the principle regulating which was laid down in the 2nd section of the 9th of Geo. IV., cap. 92—namely, that except what the depositors require, the produce was to be invested so as to accumulate at compound interest, not by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but by the Commissioners for the reduction of the national debt. Now, the Act of 1818, 58th of Geo. III., chap. 66, sec. 1, declared that the Commissioners should act by a quorum of four. How, then, could the Chancellor of the Exchequer alone authorize such extensive stock-jobbing? What would be thought of a trustee of £10,000 who sold at 85, and then bought Exchequer bills, and, after a short period, reinvested at 95? One thing was clear—a few such transactions and the trust fund would vanish. They had recently heard of a great amount of savings-banks money having been lost, and it had been made a matter of speculation how that deficiency had arisen; but here, at least, we had one cause of deficiency. Sell stock at 85 to buy £2,500,000 of Exchequer bills, and reinvest at 95, and you would soon know what sort of a trustee you had got, for the fund would speedily cease to exist. The object of these transactions was to support the price of Exchequer bills; but what, in reality, was the effect of the operation upon the public dealer or bond fide holder? You sell stock and buy Exchequer bills; you raise the value artificially, until the bills are exchanged; the operations of this gigantic stock-jobbing cease, down to the Exchequer bills to a discount, and every bond fide holder is sacrificed. At this moment Exchequer bills were at a discount, having been at par and above previous to the exchange in June, and now every holder of Exchequer bills who must sell, would be a loser according to the amount of discount, which now was nearly 10s. per cent. Was this a creditable mode of using the £35,500,000 of savings-banks money? Had the Legislature ever contemplated any such stock-jobbing? Now, these transactions took place in the names of some of the most influential persons in the kingdom—namely, the Speaker of the House of Commons, the Governor and Deputy Governor of the Bank of England, the Chief Baron of the Exchequer, the Accountant General, and the Master of the Rolls, who, by the first clause in the Act of 1818, were alone invested with the power of converting savings-banks stock into other stock; whereas the transactions to which he had referred, had been carried out by the Chancellor of the Exchequer upon his single authority, acting unjustly on the market for stock, and damaging a most important class of security, the Exchequer bills, so much so, that that class of security no longer held the position it once occupied in the public estimation. This system of chopping and changing, and dealing with the public funds, was one which, in his opinion, the House should, as a matter of necessity, put an end to. The nature of the transactions he had described was as clear as A B C, and he trusted the explanation of the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be equally so, that the public might know what had really been done, and what was the object of doing it.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The hon. Baronet, in the speech he has just addressed to the House, has raised two questions for its consideration. The first is a question of general policy, and the other a question as to the discretion of the Government in an individual case, or rather a series of transactions extending over a limited time. I may remark in the first place, with regard to the question of general policy, that the Legislature when they appointed the Government central banker to the savings-banks, and placed in the custody of the Government the whole of the funds of those banks, deliberately conferred upon the Executive Government the power of varying the securities; that is to say, they gave the Government the power which is possessed by every other banker of dealing with the deposits placed in his hands in such a manner as may be most conducive to his own interests. The hon. Baronet does not and cannot pretend to say that the Government, in the cases to which he has adverted, have in any way exceeded their legal powers. [Sir Henry WILLOUGHBY: I deny that they have such powers]. Then I affirm, in the most confident manner, that legal powers exist for every act which has been done by me, and I also affirm that similar acts have been done by my predecessors from the very first period when the savings-banks money was placed in the hands of the Government. I never heard before, that there was any doubt with regard to the legal powers of the Government. I believe such power exists, and I can confidently affirm that I have not exercised any powers beyond those exercised by my predecessors, and that in one particular case I have not gone to the extent of such powers. The ground upon which these powers were conferred upon the Government was that, as it became the holder of deposits for savings banks, and in that capacity was liable, from no mismanagement of its own, to some loss in certain states of the market, so it should possess the advantages which naturally belonged to those who administered what might be considered the affairs of a bank. I believe that I have acted in conformity with the law, and in accordance with the course pursued by my predecessors, and I conceive that, as long as the present law remains unaltered, it will be the duty of any person holding the office I have now the honour of occupying to make use of the large funds placed under his administration, in such a manner as shall be most conducive to the public interests, without in any way impairing the security of the savings banks funds. If, however, Parliament should think fit to take from the Chancellor of the Exchequer the power of varying the securities—if it chooses to say to him, “You shall not sell stock and purchase Exchequer bills,—you shall not sell Exchequer bills and purchase stock,” his duty will be perfectly clear. He will merely leave the securities unchanged, and they will remain in the denomination in which the original investment was made. I have always understood that the powers to which I have referred were conferred with the express view that sales and purchases should be made for the public benefit. The hon. Baronet, however, calls the variation of the securities stock-jobbing, and says that I am a gigantic stock-jobber. It is very easy to give an ill-sounding name to an act done in what I consider to be the discharge of public duty; but if the power be vested in the Government, which I most confidently maintain is vested in them, the conversion of one security into another can only be effected by sale and purchase in the public market—the Stock Exchange. Under such circumstances, undoubtedly, the Chancellor of the Exchequer becomes a stock-jobber; but I can hardly believe that the House will think a question of this magnitude is to be decided by a mere appeal to prejudice by the use of a term of this description. I am satisfied that they will look to the policy upon which the law is founded. Having given that explanation, I will add that, so long as the law remains unaltered, I shall consider it my duty to act upon what I believe to be its correct interpretation, and I shall continue to earn the reproaches of the hon. Baronet for being a stock-jobber, if it appears to me that the public interest will be promoted by the conversion of one form of security into another. If, however, at the recommendation of the hon. Baronet, the Legislature should think fit to alter the existing law, and deprive the executive Government of the power which it at present possesses, I shall readily acquiesce in that decision. At the same time, the House must bear in mind that they will, by making such an alteration, subject the public to certain losses which are at present avoided. I have not yet answered the question put to me by the hon. Baronet, with regard to certain purchases and sales of stock last year, but I will now proceed to do so. On the 20th of November, 1855, the balance in the hands of the Savings Banks Commissioners was £217,000. This amount was not in stock or Exchequer bills, but in money, which it was incumbent upon the Commissioners to invest. In the course of the following year, it became necessary for the Government to borrow £2,000,000 upon Exchequer bills, and I had to consider what was the most advantageous mode in which that loan could be effected, having regard to the state of the market and the funds in the hands of the Savings Banks Commissioners. The course taken was this. Stock belonging to the Savings Banks Commissioners, to the amount of £1,963,199 was sold, and it produced in money £1,763,320. The difference between the last sum and the amount paid for the £2,000,000 was taken from the cash balance. [Sir H. WILLOUGHBY: At what price was the stock sold?] I cannot tell at this moment; but I suppose at the price of the day. [Mr. AYRTON was understood to say that the price was 85½.] Now, if instead of selling stock to take the Exchequer bills, we had applied the sum arising from the cash balances in the purchase of stock, and had not sold stock, the Savings Banks Commissioners would have had £2,273,000 stock, instead of £2,000,000 of Exchequer bills. The annual interest on the £2,273,000 stock is £68,000, and the annual interest on the £2,000,000 Exchequer bills is £76,000, so that the savings banks fund has gained £8,000 a year, while the Government has avoided raising the interest, which it must have done, to put out £2,000,000 of Exchequer bills. [Sir H. WILLOUGHBY: At what loss of capital?] That would depend upon the state of the market. The question here, however, is as to the annual interest; and I maintain that the Savings Banks Commissioners gained instead of losing by that operation, and the Government, by avoiding the depreciation which would have resulted from bringing into the market so large an amount of Exchequer bills, were relieved from the necessity of raising the interest. Further, we had £2,273,000 less of capital stock, but as the Exchequer bills purchased for savings banks may be funded at the rate at which the sinking fund operates during the quarter in which the purchase is made, that £2,000,000 of Exchequer bills will give us £2,332,000 of stock, instead of £2,273,000, showing a gain of capital of £59,000 for the savings banks. I may observe that, although the Savings Banks Commissioners undoubtedly possess, by law, the power of funding Exchequer bills, that power, which has frequently been exercised by my predecessors in office, has never been resorted to by me. I think I have satisfied the hon. Baronet—[Sir H. WILLOUGHBY intimated his dissent]—or, at all events, that I have satisfied the House, that regarding these operations either as questions of capital or of interest, they have been advantageous to the country. The hon. Baronet has put a question to me with regard to an amount of £110,000. That was a sum of Exchequer bills delivered to the Paymaster General to be cancelled, in order to complete the amount required to be funded. I shall be ready, on every occasion, to give the fullest explanation with regard to any of those operations to which the hon. Baronet so strongly objects. I believe I have acted in strict accordance with the letter of the law, and in furtherance of its true policy, and I shall continue to do so. If it be the pleasure of Parliament, however, to take away the power I have referred to, I shall willingly submit, for I shall then be relieved from a very serious responsibility, and I shall no longer be subject to the reproach of being a dangerous stock-jobber.

MR. GLYN said, although he did not agree in the view that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in dealing with the savings-banks moneys, had gone beyond the power invested in him by law, yet he thought, considering the character of those funds, their immense magnitude, and the frequent opportunities that arose for dealing with them, it was necessary that something should be done by that House to regulate the use of those funds by the Government of the day. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had certainly proved that the operations which he had been called on to explain had tended to the advantage of the funds of the savings banks themselves. The question of the loss of capital would be a matter that would require to be settled by the House ere long. But he (Mr. Glyn) was convinced that in this country it would not do longer to leave £35,000,000 of money belonging to the savings banks to be dealt with by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in a way which was regulated by no definite rule, even though it might be in accordance with the law. He contended it was incumbent on the House to place the savings-bank funds on a different footing, and the only satisfactory way in which that could be done would be to declare the liability of the country at once in respect of those funds. He objected, at all events, to the Government playing with those moneys, unless they annually laid before Parliament a statement showing not only the amount sold and bought from time to time, but the reasons and policy which had led to the several transactions. He did not think the House would be performing its duty to the public until it established some restrictive rule with reference to this subject. He was not one of those who thought the power of dealing with the funds in question should be taken away from the Chancellor of the Exchequer altogether, and left in the hands of operators in the city; but he submitted that that power ought to be very much restricted, and the House could only do that by limiting the amount with which the Chancellor of the Exchequer should have the power of operating, and demanding from him an annual statement, such as he (Mr. Glyn) had suggested, as to the exercise of that power.

MR. MALINS said, that no doubt the Chancellor of the Exchequer had carried on these operations in a very skilful manner as a banker, and therefore there was no reason to complain of him in that respect. But in another respect there was reason to complain of him, and he did not think the public at large were aware of the extent to which those stock-jobbing transactions, called, in common parlance, "rigging the market," were carried on. He was informed that on a late occasion it became obligatory on the Chancellor of the Exchequer to pay off £2,000,000 of Exchequer bonds. At that time—April and May last—a considerable sum in those bonds was held on behalf of the savings banks. Exchequer bills were then at a discount of 6s. 3d., and it being inconvenient for the Government to meet the payment, it became a great object to raise the price of them. The Chancellor of the Exchequer then appeared in the market, and proceeded to deal in Exchequer bills with such rapidity, that in a short time, instead of their being at a discount of 6s., they absolutely ran up to a premium of 6s. This turned out a very successful operation, for when Exchequer bills were at a discount, the holders sent them in for payment when the period for payment or exchange arrived; but when they were at a premium they sent them in for exchange only. But the question was, whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer of England was justified in going into the market and entering into those fictitious transactions in order to give an appearance of value to that which really had no such value. The transaction to which he (Mr. Malins) had referred took place in April and May last, a great number of persons had been induced to exchange their Exchequer bills because they were at a premium, and now that very morning it was announced that Exchequer bills, instead of being at a premium, were at 10s., or  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent discount. He would ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if that loss had not been brought about by those fictitious transactions on his part, and whether it was not, in fact, "rigging the market" when it was sought to give a fictitious appearance of a demand for that for which there was really no demand? He submitted, also, that it was a question worthy the serious consideration of the House whether the funds in question should be longer at the disposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer after the transaction to which he (Mr. Malins) had called attention, in which the course of proceeding adopted by the right hon.

Gentleman, however laudable on the part of a banker, was most reprehensible in one who was acting as a trustee for the public. He should conclude by asking the right hon. Gentleman what amount of savings-bank funds was laid out in the purchase of Exchequer bills in April and May last, and the maximum or minimum price at which the exchanges were made?

MR. WEGUELIN said, the investment in Exchequer bills of the savings-banks funds was one which it was quite in the power of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to make. It was, besides, the most favourable way in which the money could be invested, because it yielded the greatest amount of income, and he therefore saw no reason for accusing the right hon. Gentleman of having made a bad investment.

MR. MALINS (interposing) said, he did not accuse the Chancellor of the Exchequer of making a bad investment, but of deceiving the public.

MR. WEGUELIN resumed: As to the charge of deceiving the public, the public knew very well that when the agents of the savings banks came into the market they did so for the purpose of purchasing or selling funds for the savings banks, and therefore there could be no deception. The hon. Member (Mr. Malins) said the Chancellor of the Exchequer took part in the transaction to which the hon. Member had called the attention of the House for the purpose of enhancing the price of Exchequer bills at a particular time when such a course was most unjustifiable. But surely the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the position in which he stood, had a right to consider what would be the best course for him to take on such occasions; for either a large amount of Exchequer bills would have been sent in for liquidation at a period when it might be most inconvenient to pay them, or the Chancellor of the Exchequer would have to raise the rate of interest upon these securities, which would cause an additional demand upon the public. He (Mr. Weguelin) contended, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman was perfectly justified in investing the savings banks money in Exchequer bills at that time. With reference to the general question as to the policy of leaving the power in the hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in dealing with the funds of savings banks, he trusted that power would never be taken away from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, because it was placed with him as a security for the public. The House ought to remember that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was very much in the position of "dummy" in a game of whist. He was always obliged to show his hand, and the dealers in stock lay in wait for him. The stock-jobbers, indeed, might be said to rush into the market to meet him, and therefore it was most desirable that he should have the power of dealing with the funds in question. He hoped the power would still be reserved to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as it was desirable he should have the power of varying securities, inasmuch as he had no power to buy except he had money of the savings banks actually in his hands, or to sell excepting for savings bank purposes. He might change one security for another, but this could produce little or no effect on the money market. He was satisfied that it was for the public interest, and he did not think that any loss had been suffered thereby. It was true that there had been a large deficiency in the savings banks funds, but that was owing to the large amount of interest guaranteed some years—as much as £4 11s. per cent.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, a question had been distinctly put to him by the hon. Member for Wallingford (Mr. Malins), and as the hon. Gentleman seemed to have misunderstood what he had said, perhaps the House would allow him, considering the serious charges which the hon. Gentleman had made, to explain the nature of the operation to which he had referred. The hon. Gentleman said that the purchase of Exchequer bills recently made by the Savings Banks Commissioner was fictitious, that it was not a bonâ fide transaction, and that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had been occupied in "rigging" the market. He would explain in a few words the precise nature of the operation. The Savings Banks Commissioners were the holders of Exchequer bonds to the amount of £1,750,000: £2,000,000 of Exchequer bonds became due on the 13th of May last, and they were paid off when they became due. The consequence was that the Savings Banks Commissioners found themselves in the possession of about £1,800,000. It became necessary immediately to invest that sum. It was actual money paid into their hands. There was no question about varying the security or influencing the market by selling one species of stock to buy another. It was a simple investment of money in favour of the Savings Banks Commissioners. There were only two investments open to them—the one Consols and the other Exchequer bills. Looking at the state of the market, Exchequer bills being at a discount, and an advantageous security, it was determined to purchase Exchequer bills, and the hon. Member for Kendal (Mr. Glyn) had truly observed that any private banker, looking to his own interest, would invest in Exchequer bills rather than in Consols. The investments of the Commissioners became matters of notoriety; they were made by the Government broker, there was no concealment, they were simply advantageous investments of surplus money in their hands. These investments continued from the middle of May last until nearly the time fixed for the exchange of Exchequer bills, and incidentally there was this advantageous result, which he had distinctly contemplated, and which he was prepared to justify—that by raising the Exchequer bill market, by taking away the surplus Exchequer bills and diminishing the number sent in for exchange, so that it amounted only to £250,000, the necessity of raising the interest on the whole of the Exchequer bills was obviated. It was not possible to raise the interest on a part, and if it were raised only a halfpenny upon the whole it made a difference to the public of £150,000 a year. He maintained, in the most confident way, that the operation was advantageous to the savings banks and to the public, and perfectly justifiable on both those grounds.

MR. SPOONER said, he was sure that his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Wallingford (Mr. Malins) did not intend to charge the right hon. Gentleman with having done anything improper. All that he meant to say was that bond fide holders of Exchequer bills were prevented sending in for payments by the operation of purchases on behalf of the Savings Banks Commissioners, and that when the time was past the price of Exchequer bills immediately began to fall.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The hon. Member said that was "fictitious."

MR. SPOONER said, he was sure his hon. and learned Friend would at once withdraw that word. He (Mr. Spooner) agreed with what had fallen from the hon. Member for Kendal (Mr. Glyn), that the power of dealing with funds of this magnitude was too large a power to trust in any one hand, and he understood the right hon. the Chancellor of the Exchequer to wish to resign the discretion which the law gave him. Nothing could be more dangerous than for the public to imagine that the Chancellor of the Exchequer or the Government had the power to raise or depress the price of public securities just as they pleased, and he trusted that this discussion would lead to a consideration of the point—whether the power should not be withdrawn.

MR. MALINS explained that what he really meant to say was, that purchases of Exchequer bills were made with the object of raising the value of those securities at a particular time—an object which the right hon. Gentleman, with that candour which always characterized him, had clearly avowed.

MR. AYRTON expressed a doubt whether it was intended, when the law was made, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should have this discretionary power, except to benefit the savings banks. The nation was not altogether the banker of the savings bank, because their only claim was, upon the particular fund in the hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and anything which diminished that fund diminished their security. By operations like this the Savings Bank Fund had diminished in capital to the extent of £1,000,000. At present they might gain in income, but they lost in capital. If the funds rose, the interest of Exchequer bills would fall, and if the Commissioners had to invest in Consols they would not be able to do so at the price at which they sold out, and there would be a loss of capital.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER was understood to say, that the Savings Banks Commissioners investing in Exchequer bills might at any time fund the money in Consols at the price in the current quarter in which the investment in Exchequer bills was made.

MR. AYRTON said, whatever the course of proceeding might have been, the result was that a deficit of £1,000,000 had fallen upon the savings banks. He hoped that this question would be gone into fully on a future occasion, and that a more satisfactory arrangement would be substituted for the present system.

CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATIONS.
QUESTION.

MR. RICH said, he rose to bring under the notice of the House the Report of the Commissioners on the Superannuation Act, recommending an immediate increase of £70,000 a year to the salaries of the civil servants, with a prospective increase of £30,000 a year more.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would appeal to the hon. Gentleman to postpone his remarks till the next day, when the Motion on the same subject of which the noble Lord opposite (Lord Naas) had given notice, would come on for discussion. He would suggest to the hon. Gentleman whether any advantage could be gained by an imperfect debate that night, and whether the time of the House would not be economized if the whole question were discussed on the noble Lord's Motion to-morrow.

MR. RICH said, he should have been most happy to yield to the request of the right hon. Gentleman, and also to the general feeling of the House; but his experience had shown him how extremely difficult it was at any time for a private Member like himself to obtain an opportunity for bringing forward a Motion. Moreover, the subject of the ballot stood on the paper for to-morrow, and would have the precedence of the Motion of the noble Lord opposite. They had a Reform Bill looming before them, and this would make many hon. Members anxious to express their opinions on the ballot; therefore the Motion of the noble Lord, if it came on at all, could only come on at a very late period of the evening. Besides, the noble Lord's Motion referred only to a single part of the wider question to which he (Mr. Rich) wished to address himself. He would not, however, trespass long on the attention of the House. On a question like the present, with regard to which there had been so much misrepresentation, he wished to elicit a distinct statement from the Government. It was important that the House should know on what fragile grounds the Commissioners appointed to investigate the subject of civil service superannuations based their recommendation for increasing the burdens of the tax-paying community. With respect to that recommendation three points of importance arose—first, as to the respect which was due to the Reports of Committees of that House; secondly, as to the stability and fixity of salaries and pensions in the civil service; and thirdly, as to the large and expanding demand it made on the taxpayers of the country. If the suggestions of the Commissioners were agreed to, before many years were over the civil service would absorb an additional quarter of a million per annum of the public revenue, or, in other words, it would be the same as if the Chancellor of the Exchequer were to raise a new loan of £6,000,000 or £7,000,000. The question of superannuation pensions was scarcely considered until the beginning of the present century; but, from the year 1803 down to 1834, it formed the subject of successive inquiries before Committees of this House, and the results were to be found in various Acts of Parliament and Treasury Minutes. On every occasion, except one, that it had been dealt with, the principle of a quid pro quo, in the shape of an abatement from the salary in one form or other, was insisted upon as the condition on which these pensions should be granted. The only instance in which that condition was set aside was in 1824, or, as it was called, "Prosperity year"—a period marked quite as strongly by great national prodigality as by great national wealth. A reaction, however, soon set in, and the principle of abatements in consideration of pensions was reaffirmed by the great Finance Committee of 1827, and effectually carried out by a Treasury Minute in 1829. This Minute referred to a superannuation fund, whereby much misapprehension has arisen. But when the main principles of this Minute were embodied by the reformed Parliament in the great Superannuation Act of 1834, no regard or provision whatever was made for a superannuation fund. By its provisions, the abatements went to the Treasury, that is to the public, and the pensions to the civil servants; and so it has continued to the present day. Under this Act all persons entering the civil service were previously to receive a distinct intimation of the abatement of salary to which they would be subject, together with the scale of pension to which after duly approved service they would be entitled. There was not, therefore, a particle of misdealing or concealment in the matter. This system continued in satisfactory operation for twenty years, when a change of opinion took place in regard to it. Now, it was essential that the House should know how that change had been brought about. In the early part of this century the persons who filled the public offices were men of high respectability, talent, energy, and application; but they were drawn from what, for want of a better term, might be called the middle class of gentlemen. Under the Government of the Duke of Wellington in 1827 a considerable reduction of sinecure places was effected, and in the three first years of the Reform Government still more reductions were effected. No less than 1,265 sinecure appointments, the incomes attached to which ranged from £100 to £1,200 a year, with an average of £226 each, were abolished. Other reforms of a similar nature followed, and what had been the consequence? The class of persons filling public offices had gradually undergone a considerable change. The holders of the sinecure situations which had been abolished were generally individuals highly connected, and exercised considerable social influence. Having lost the prospect of sinecures they began to seek employment in the civil service. But the older class to which I have referred still held by their seniority the higher places and salaries—and having entered the service prior to 1829 were also exempt from paying superannuation abatements. This not unnaturally excited the envy of the newer class, which each successive year increased in numbers and influence. An agitation was accordingly set on foot against the Abatement Society, official men and the press were all continuously canvassed, and by their connection with the agitators but too favourably disposed. Still all these resources would not have served their purpose, if by means of the increased war pressure of the income tax and the high price of provisions they had not got the great body of the subordinates in the civil service to join them. But with these they now formed a kind of association, with delegates from every office, and organized a succession of meetings, circulars, leading articles, and denunciations of the so-called robbery by abatements, which, continuing unanswered, produced an effect. When the Chancellor of the Exchequer succeeded to his present office he found that a Bill had been prepared by his predecessor for the alteration of certain rates of superannuation, that Bill, somewhat modified, he submitted to the House. It was referred to a Select Committee, on which sat the right hon. Gentleman himself, two ex-Chancellors of the Exchequer, and some other eminent men in the House. The Committee, having thoroughly investigated the subject, condemned the system of abatements, but they added that if the abatements were abolished there should not be an indiscriminate squandering of the public money by an increase of the salaries of those hitherto paying abatements, but that those salaries should be revised with due regard to the amount of abatement remitted. A Bill founded on the Report of the Committee was submitted to the House by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the middle of July, and as objection was made to its being proceeded with at so late a period of the Session it was withdrawn, with a clear understanding that it was to be reintroduced the following Session. Strange to say, notwithstanding this understanding, and still more, notwithstanding the thorough investigation of the subject by the Chancellor of the Exchequer's own Committee, he himself, under some strange influence or delusion, actually nominated a Commission in September to reinvestigate the whole subject. The Commissioners found that it had been already exhausted. They called for few or no papers, and did not examine any witnesses. They made substantially four recommendations; first, that the abatements should cease; second, that the abatements should be put into the pockets of those who had paid them; third, that the retiring pensions should be increased, and also extended to certain other classes of public servants hitherto not entitled to pensions—fourth, that certain reductions of salaries should be effected on those who might hereafter enter or be promoted in the service. This fourth recommendation is a mere delusive bait to induce the public to swallow the barbed hooks of the first three. For the increased charges founded on those recommendations cannot be estimated at less than a quarter of a million, while the proposed savings by prospective reductions would necessarily be very small and of distant operation—nay of doubtful operation and continuance, for they go to create an anomalous distinction of salary, the abolition of which forms the staple of the Commissioners' Report. Their next ground was, that it appeared, from some of the evidence given before the Committee, that in revising salaries the revisors had not made a distinction between the salaries of those who contributed and those who did not contribute abatements, and that consequently an inequality of salary existed in the service. This is a sheer fallacy; for the salaries are substantially equal, the one being paid in full, that is without pension; the other being compounded of a large present payment and a small deferred payment in the form of a contingent pension. The Commissioners admit that present salaries are sufficiently high—nay, too high—for they actually recommend prospective reductions. Neither can they attach importance to the detection of anomalies, which they know must inevitably occur, and the creation of one of which, of an invidious kind, they themselves recommend. The real ground of their recommendation is to be found in their statement, that if these abatements were not given up the Government would be disappointing the expectations and damping the energies of a very important—they should have said importunate—body of public servants. Now, he contended that this was no fair ground upon which to throw away £100,000 a year of public money. The gentlemen with regard to whom this remission would take place formed a very small fraction of our public servants, and the Government should take care that while increasing their salaries they did not lay the foundations for further agitation by other members of the civil service to whom this increase of salary was not extended. Another consideration of importance was the insecurity which the public servants themselves would hereafter feel as to their salaries and pensions. Hitherto it had been the constant practice of Governments, representing all shades of opinion, to respect the actual salaries of public officers of a permanent character, and to make any changes attaching to such offices prospective only. Thus, for example, when the pay of the Secretaries to the Treasury was reduced from £2,500 to £2,000 a year, that of the Assistant Secretary was left at the former higher rate. According to the recommendation of the Commissioners, however, the salary of this official would now be virtually increased to £2,625 a year, and a proportionate increase would apply to the powerful fraction of our public servants so favoured by the Commissioners. Now this, he contended, would work very mischievously, and create a bad precedent. He reminded the House, that if this Parliament were to increase the salaries of the civil servants, it would be competent for another Parliament to reduce them. These were questions with which Parliament ought to be very chary of interference. On the whole, therefore, he suggested to the civil servants themselves, that the wisest course would be not to press the subject upon the attention of the House. In conclusion, he trusted that, unless his right hon. Friend could show some reason for setting aside the Resolutions of his own Committee, the House would do well to abide by them, and not be led away by the recommendations of a body which was not responsible to that House or the country.

LORD NAAS said, he did not rise to reply to the statements of the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down, although he believed that there was not one of them which was not capable of the most complete and ample refutation; but to complain of the hon. Member's conduct towards himself, and of the manner in which he had set at defiance all Parliamentary etiquette and usage. On the 5th of June, he (Lord Naas) gave notice that he should to-morrow bring this whole subject before the House; and four days afterwards, the hon. Gentleman gave notice that he should bring it on upon going into supply, thus forestalling the Motion which he (Lord Naas) was about to submit to the House. He certainly had always thought that, if there were one practice more rigidly adhered to in that House than another—indeed so rigidly adhered to as to have become almost a rule—it was that when one Member had taken up a subject, it was not competent for another Member to come in before him and so anticipate the discussion. If this practice were not to be observed in future, it would be impossible to discuss any question in that House with fairness. The hon. Member's speech, like his notice, had treated the question most unfairly. He had made an ex parte statement, which could not be answered, because the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the hon. Member for Southampton, who had been a Member of the Commission, had already spoken, and could not address the House again; but he (Lord Naas) hoped, that to-morrow the subject would assume a very different complexion.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he rose merely to express a hope that the House would not engage in a discussion upon the speech of his hon. Friend behind him, which afforded a strong proof of the inconvenience which the House sustained from Motion upon Motion being accumulated upon the question that the Speaker should leave the chair. The inconvenience was strikingly illustrated in the present instance, because the two hon. Members who were most entitled to be heard upon the subject had already spoken, and no reply, therefore, could be given to the observations of his hon. Friend. Besides, if they were to have a full discussion upon an important question of this nature, it would be hopeless to expect to get into Committee of Supply that evening. There might be circumstances under which it would be advisable to postpone going into Committee of Supply, but the present occasion was not one to justify such a course. The noble Lord opposite had given notice of a Motion on the subject for to-morrow, and under all the circumstances, he trusted that the House would not allow them to go into Committee.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he did not wish to enter into the question at issue between his hon. Friend near him and the noble Lord, but he was sure that if his hon. Friend had found that the noble Lord's Motion stood first upon the notice paper for to-morrow, and that it would be certain to come on, he would not have interposed with his speech that evening. Supposing, however, that the Motion on the ballot which stood first for to-morrow should last a considerable time, and that the attention of the House should be so exhausted as to render it impossible to enter into a debate upon this important question, he (Lord J. Russell) hoped that the Government would no longer delay stating their views upon the subject. Whatever difference of opinion might exist on the question, the time was come when, after the investigations which had taken place, the Government should take a line, and pronounce themselves decidedly as to what they considered the right course to be taken in the matter. It was due both to the civil servants of the Crown and to the public, that some early decision should be come to; and without pressing the Government to name a particular day, he hoped that during the present week, or the beginning of next week, the Government would take an opportunity of making an express declaration upon the matter.

Mr. Labouchere

SUPPLY—MISCELLANEOUS ESTIMATES.

House in Committee. Mr. FitzRoy in the Chair.

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £48,855, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Expenses of the General Management of the Department of Science and Art, of the Schools throughout the Kingdom in connection with the Department, and the Geological Surveys of Great Britain and Ireland, &c., to the 31st day of March 1858."

MR. W. EWART said, he wished to express his satisfaction at the separation of the Department of Science and Art from the control of the Board of Trade, which was not qualified to superintend it, and at its being placed under the Education Board. He did not see why the British Museum Estimates should not likewise be brought under the head of the Department of Science and Art, and he also thought that a statement should every year be submitted to the House, of all the acquisitions made in every branch of that excellent establishment. Among the items of expense, he observed one for the circulation of casts and examples of art to local museums. Some good, no doubt, was effected by that course of proceeding, but he thought it would be better to construct permanent galleries, in which those specimens of art might be constantly viewed by the people. He observed with satisfaction that a plan of circulating books to provincial schools of art, recommended by a Committee twenty years ago, had been adopted. There were certain books which the Government alone could publish, and it was wise to give the people the means of studying them. He trusted to see the jurisdiction of the Board of Education extended, and other departments connected with science and art brought under its control.

MR. BLACK said, he did not mean to object to the support given to scientific institutions, but to point out the small amount of the sum awarded for this purpose to Scotland, compared with the amounts appropriated to England and Ireland. The Vote for England was £52,450, for Ireland £8,627, and for Scotland £7,510. In addition to this, the education Vote for England was £541,233, and for Ireland £213,000, whilst that for Scotland had not averaged £10,000 a year for the last twenty-two years; and, yet if the Scotch Members asked for one or two thousands for any scientific purpose in Scotland, there would be an immediate outcry that it was a Scotch job. He did not think Scotland, as compared with other parts of the United Kingdom, had fair play.

MR. BLACKBURN said, that he would be willing to remedy the inequality of which the hon. Member complained, not by increasing the grant to Scotland, but by reducing that for England and Ireland. It appeared from the Estimates, that all the schools of design in the empire were so mixed up with the department at Kensington, that it was impossible to separate the items. They might be very useful, but they seemed to be very expensive, and the same remark he applied to the department at Kensington. It would seem that seventy-five schools cost £277,500, or an average of £375 each, whilst the expenditure at Kensington was £15,000. Against the item of £6,198 for the Geological Museum in Jermyn-street, he had not a word to say, for he believed the museum was advantageous to the country. The next item was £5,172 for the geological survey in Great Britain and Ireland. Now, the other night the House decided, in the case of the Ordnance survey for Scotland, that the parties wanting the survey should pay for it; and if that rule were just, it ought to be acted upon in England and Ireland as well as in Scotland. The sum proposed to be voted for the Industrial Museum and Natural History Museum in Scotland was £1,888. The Natural History Museum was visited by 90,000 persons last year, to whom it was a source of amusement and instruction. The next items referred to the Royal Dublin Society, including Botanical and Zoological Gardens, the Museum of Irish Industry, and the Irish Normal Lace School, and for them about £11,000 were demanded, though last year the number of persons visiting the museum and exhibitions of the Royal Dublin Society was only 11,000. He thought the total Vote excessively high, and he should have no objection to see it struck out of the Estimates altogether, as the tendency of all these Government grants was, that the public money was jobbed without art being promoted. It was easy to get up and make a speech in favour of encouraging science and art, but he should like to know how far these schools had been successful in so doing, for he was not aware that any great engineer or painter had ever been created by Government grants of money.

MR. COWPER said, he should be happy to give an explanation of the Vote to the Committee which would, he trusted, convince them that it was a desirable one to be continued. The hon. Member who last spoke said that the Votes for the schools of science and art were mixed up with that for the establishment at South Kensington. The reason was, that the establishment at South Kensington had in purpose and in action a close connection with local schools. He would state shortly the exact manner in which this Vote of money, amounting, in the whole, to £73,855, would be expended. There were in the United Kingdom of England, Scotland, and Ireland, sixty-five schools of art. In 1856 those schools were attended by 12,337 students. At South Kensington there was a normal training school in which persons received instruction for the purpose of enabling them to become masters in schools of art, or to teach drawing in the elementary and parochial schools. In that establishment 106 teachers and 405 students had been trained, and of those students twenty-one had received appointments as masters. It was required that each local school of art should have in connection with it at least five parochial or other elementary schools in which drawing should be taught. At present elementary instruction of this description was received by 22,746 children of the working classes, and the benefits of this expenditure were therefore very widely diffused. The schools were, for the most part, self-supporting; they were established locally, and not by the Government, in towns where the inhabitants were desirous that art instruction should be afforded to the labouring classes; they were managed by local committees, and aid was only given in proportion to their efficiency and the success of their pupils in obtaining prizes by public competition. An hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Blackburn) had asked of what use these schools of art were, and had observed that no expenditure of public money had ever produced an artist. In reply to that observation he (Mr. Cowper) begged to say that this grant was not applied to education in the higher branches of art, but to elementary instruction in ornamental art. It was to lead the working classes to appreciate symmetry of form and harmony of colour, and to acquire some facility of drawing and modelling. It was to impart to workmen skill and good taste, and a knowledge of science and art in their application to productive industry. The hon. Gentleman was very probably aware that this Vote was mainly a consequence of the experience the country had gained during the Exhibition of 1851. Previously to that period, as was well known to those who had inquired into the matter, the workmen of Great Britain, whatever might be their skill, their industry, and their powers of labour, were greatly deficient in point of taste as compared with the artisans of other countries. The Exhibition of 1851 brought out so clearly and palpably the fact of the inferiority of British productions in beauty of design, harmony of colour, and grace of outline, as to lead to the trial of a remedy. Another fact which the Exhibition of 1851 tended to bring directly under public notice was that the country which furnished the most elegant and tasteful designs was that in which there had been the greatest interference on the part of the State with regard to art instruction. It was seen that in France the various measures which had been taken by the Government to promote art education had been attended with signal success. It was not in vain that the great Colbert, in the reign of Louis XIV., established the Royal manufactory of Gobelin tapestry, or that the Royal carpet factory at Tournay, and the national porcelain manufactory at Sevres had been fostered. The result of the care taken by successive Monarchs and Ministers for the cultivation and improvement of working people was, that France had become the supreme arbiter in artistic manufacture, and had set an example which all other nations endeavoured to follow. There was no innate inferiority on the part of the English workmen as compared with the French, but their inferiority was attributable to the want of art training, and of opportunities of studying good models. It was in order to remedy this defect that soon after the Exhibition of 1851 the Department of Science and Art was founded, and if he were asked for proof of its having been of use, he would point to the Exhibition at Paris in 1855, where the progress that had been made in English productions during the previous four years was most strikingly apparent. The Parisians excelled the artisans of perhaps all other towns in the manufacture of ornamental furniture, but some of the productions from London in that department of manufacture might even vie with those of Paris, and it was admitted that the cabinets sent by Messrs. Jackson and Graham were in execution and design equal to that of the French. It was also evident that considerable progress had been made in Sheffield ware, but the greatest triumph, perhaps, had been achieved in the manufacture of porcelain and earthenware. It was curious to contrast the present condition of that manufacture with the statements made respecting it in the evidence given before the Committee of 1836, over which the hon. Member for Dumfries (Mr. Ewart) presided. Complaints were then made that the art of painting on porcelain was at the lowest state, in consequence of a want of knowledge of drawing among the working people; and the neglect of design was such that at Worcester young men were employed in copying models so out of drawing that the more faithfully they adhered to the originals the worse it would be for the manufacturers, and the less would be the chance of finding a market for their productions. At this moment, however, the English porcelain manufacture was preeminent in Europe, and he had had the opportunity of asking one of the most eminent manufacturers, Mr. Minton, whether any benefit had resulted to that branch of industry from the establishment of schools of art. Mr. Minton stated that all his best workmen, both modellers and painters, had been educated in schools of art, and that some of those who had originally been educated in France had been improved by the opportunities they had had of attending the schools of art established in the potteries. He (Mr. Cowper) believed it would be found on inquiry that similar advantages had been derived in all the chief branches of manufacture to which any considerable amount of art could be applied. He had no doubt it would be found that the best modellers employed in the iron trade at Sheffield, and the best designs of carpets at Kidderminster and Paisley, had acquired in the schools of art the skill and taste which they displayed. These institutions were now fairly launched, and he hoped the workmen of this country would no longer be behind those of other nations in the expression of taste. He knew that very eminent persons in France, who occupied positions which enabled them to form an accurate judgment on the subject, had declared that the extraordinary improvements in the manufacture of silk in this country gave them great alarm as to the effect of the competition of the English silk trade with that of France. With regard to the Museum at Kensington, which the hon. Gentleman seemed to think was too costly, it must be remembered that that institution not only contained within its walls numerous objects of art which were to remain there permanently, but that it was also the receptacle for objects of art which were intended to be circulated throughout the country, and exhibited for a time in the various towns in which local museums might be established. Specimens of porcelain and earthenware would be sent to towns where those branches of manufacture existed; specimens of metal work would be sent to Sheffield and Birmingham; and objects of ancient and modern art, from which the working classes were likely to derive instruction and advantage, and which were calculated to stimulate inventive genius, would be sent in turn to various places throughout the country. A general interest in the arts of colouring and design would be thus created, and he believed the revival of the manufacture of majolica was mainly owing to the fact, that Mr. Minton was asked to make some specimens of coloured pottery in order that the students in the central school of science and art might copy them in painting. For this purpose Mr. Minton made experiments which led to the manufacture of those beautiful objects which had done him so much credit and added so considerably to his reputation. One advance led to another, and to foresee the results which might follow from the extension of a taste for science and art. The library which was to form part of the Museum would contain all the best works upon art which were likely to be useful to designers and manufacturers, and those books would be lent to the local schools and museums. A certain number of books would also be given as prizes to the local schools. He thought that so far from the Estimates being excessive, there was rather reason for surprise that such extensive advantages were obtained for the country at so small an outlay. Some complaint had been made of the amount required for the Museum in Scotland. In Scotland there was only one industrial museum, which included a museum of natural history, which was included in the present estimate; but it had been determined to purchase a piece of land for the purpose of erecting upon it a national museum, and a supplementary estimate would be laid before Parliament for that purpose, so that he did not think the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Black), had any cause for complaint. Ireland had been more fortunate, because she had more of those industrial establishments. Of those institutions there were two not included in the present Vote—the Irish Academy, and the Hibernian Academy of Painting, Sculpture, and Architecture—and they had not been included because they were not considered to be directly connected with industrial art, and they had therefore been placed in distinct Votes. With regard to the institutions included in the Vote, they were the Royal Dublin Society, which included the Botanic Gardens and Zoological Gardens, the Normal Lace School, and the Museum of Irish Industry, and the sum proposed to be voted for those establishments in Ireland amounted to about £13,000, so that Ireland could not complain. He had, he believed, now gone through most of the items of the Vote, and he would not trespass further upon the attention of the Committee.

LORD ELCHO said, that he heartily concurred in every word which had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman, for he felt confident that these schools of art had been of great advantage in promoting good designing. Any person who had turned his attention to the subject, even in so small a matter as furnishing a house, must have noticed a great improvement of late years in the patterns of carpets, wall paper, curtains, and all those common articles which were used for that purpose, and when such a man as Mr. Minton said that he got his best designs from these schools, that, no doubt, was an exceedingly gratifying fact. That improvement had been concurrent with the progress of the institution at Marlborough House, which had been founded on the Report of a Commission presided over by the hon. Member for Dumfries, and there was no reason to doubt that it had not only been concurrent with it, but had proceeded from it. Although, however, he concurred in the observations of the right hon. Gentleman, there were one or two remarks which he wished to offer to the Committee. If the right hon. Gentleman would look over the heads of Vote 4, he would find an item of £300 a year for a paleontologist, and also an item for an assistant paleontologist at the British Museum. Now, neither Ireland nor Scotland had a paleontologist, and if one was good for England, why should not Ireland and Scotland have one too? With regard to the school of science and the Geological Museum in Jermyn Street, that institution was founded for the purposes of showing various mineral productions of the earth which might be used for manufactures, and there was likewise to be attached a laboratory for the purpose of analysis, so that if any gentleman found a mineral upon his estate which he did not understand, he might send it to be analyzed. It was clear that there ought to be a laboratory for analysis, and against that he had nothing to say. But he had that day paid a visit to that establishment, and he had found in it not only more minerals, but all sorts of mediæval curiosities, specimens of pottery and of works in glass, a bust of the Queen, a portrait in mosaic of the Emperor of Russia, and, in short, nearly all kinds of articles which human ingenuity formed out of the raw products of the earth. He certainly did not think that those articles were in what could be regarded as a fitting repository at the Geological Museum. At the British Museum there was also a large geological and mineral collection, so that there were two institutions concurrently spending the public money upon the same object, and perhaps endeavouring to out-rival each other. Then, again, there were three institutions which had museums of china, ancient and modern, and mediæval, of glass, of earthenware, and articles of that description—the one in Jermyn Street, the one at Kensington, and the British Museum; all buying against each other. It was the old story of the suit of armour which had been sold at an enormous price, on account of two Government departments bidding against each other for its possession. Now, would it not be desirable to alter such an arrangement, and to combine things of a like nature in the same institution? To do so would save expense, and would, for purposes of instruction, be much more advantageous; while at the same time a museum would be formed worthy of the nation. He thought the most practical way to go to work would be to remove to Jermyn Street all the mineralogical and geological specimens now in the British Museum, and to collect at Kensington all objects of mediæval art now at Jermyn Street and the British Museum. There was one other point to which he wished to refer, and that was the Sheepshanks' collection, now housed at what were called the Brompton Boilers. He thought that, whatever advantages that particular locality might possess, the Government had at least been premature in making that erection, pending the discussion of the Royal Commissioners upon the site for the National Gallery. Mr. Sheepshanks, who had formed one of the most beautiful collection of pictures, perhaps, ever collected by a private person, had—a thing which he believed was unprecedented—presented them to the nation in his lifetime. [Mr. BERESFORD HOPE said, Mr. Vernon did the same.] But he had done so upon a condition that they should be kept at Brompton, for fear that they might suffer from the smoke of London. Now, he thought that the Government might have waited for the decision of the Commission before erecting that building. The Commission might have reported, as in fact they had done, that pictures were not spoiled by the smoke, or that there were men who could provide practical remedies against such a contingency, and Mr. Sheepshanks might have been induced to alter the condition which he had attached to the gift, and to consent to the pictures being placed with the other pictures in the National Gallery. If he had done so, all the national pictures would be collected in one place, instead of being divided amongst Brompton, Marlborough House, and Trafalgar Square. He doubted whether it was always desirable to accept gifts on such conditions, because one gentleman might give a collection with a desire that it should be placed in Battersea Park, another in Victoria Park, and a third in Finsbury Park, and the result of building galleries in each of these places would be greatly to multiply expenses without the production of so good an effect as would result from the combination of all the collections in one building.

Mr. DILLWYN said, he quite agreed with the noble Lord as to the desirability of uniting all similar collections in one museum. From possessing some slight knowledge of geology, he was ready to defend the connection of paleontologists—persons who were conversant with fossil remains—with the geological museum, and he wished to express his regret that there were no similar officers attached to the museums of Ireland and Scotland. Without this science, it was impossible to identify stratification, to find out where lodes lay, and so forth. [A laugh.] Hon. Members might laugh, but he knew of nothing ridiculous in the science except its long name. With regard to the Estimate for the Kensington Gore Museum, he thought that some scrutiny was needed. In 1855, the House was asked to vote £15,000 for the erection of a corrugated iron building, which it was said could easily be removed without loss of value, and which it was always said was to be only a temporary erection. This year the whole amount of the Estimate was £46,251 14s., which might be thus divided—salaries, wages, &c. £12,601 14s.; aids to schools, £22,500; the Sheepshanks gallery, £4,700; miscellaneous items, £6,450. Some of the salaries appeared very extravagant. The chief paleontologist, who must of course be a man of considerable education, had, indeed, only £300. On the other hand, the assistant secretary had £675, and the inspector for science and art, £450. Comparatively, the principal officers of the British Museum were paid lower salaries than those of the Museum at Kensington. Mr. Panizzi, the principal librarian of the British Museum, had £1,000 a year; Mr. Hawkins, the chief medallist, who was acknowledged by every one to be a very superior man, had £600 a year; Professor Owen, one of the most distinguished men of the present day in his own line, had £800 a year, and was obliged to deliver lectures. At Kensington, the secretary for general management had £1,000 a year, and the inspector general, Dr. Lyon Playfair, the same amount. The subordinate officers seemed to be very highly paid, the assistant secretary getting £675 a year, and the accountant £250, while there were various clerks who were paid much smaller salaries. He believed that the subordinate curators of the British Museum—men of great learning and acquirements—received on the average about £300 a year. At Kensington, the art superintendent, Mr. Redgrave, a man of acknowledged ability, got £500. He also wished to know what were the duties of the inspector of science and art, and whether a gentleman competent to form a judgment upon matters of art was equally competent to give an opinion upon matters of science. Yet for that office they paid £450, and it was held by a gentleman of whom, whatever might be his attainments—and no doubt they were great—he confessed that he had never heard. He thought these situations should be given to persons of known ability, and who had made themselves a name, otherwise the nation had no guarantee that the duties would be properly discharged, and that bad art would not sometimes be foisted on the country. Some things which had come out of this school—the hearse of the Duke of Wellington, for instance—were, in his opinion, specimens of very bad art. He had always heard the Kensington Gore Museum spoken of as a sort of loadstone to draw the National Gallery there, but he rejoiced that that scheme had failed, and that a collection which ought to be the glory of the nation was to be retained in a central position. He could not, however, but look upon our annual expenditure under this head as very extravagant; and with respect to Gore House, the charges were extremely high as compared with the British Museum. While the sum of £926 only was charged for general attendance at the latter place, no less than £3,100 was charged under the same head at Kensington Gore. As it had been understood that the Vote of last year was to be a temporary one, and as it appeared uncertain what was to be done, he thought it would be best to keep down the expense to the amount at which it stood last year, with the exception of the increase on account of the Sheepshanks' Gallery, which must be incurred in order to keep up faith with Mr. Sheepshanks. The increase in the Vote under consideration being £8,468, he proposed to reduce the Vote by £3,768.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £45,087, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Expenses of the General Management of the Department of Science and Art, of the Schools throughout the Kingdom in connection with the Department, and of the Geological Surveys of Great Britain and Ireland, &c., to the 31st day of March 1858."

MR. SPOONER said, he should vote for the reduction proposed by the hon. Member (Mr. Dillwyn), but at the same time he was prepared to carry the reduction still further, and to move that the whole Vote be reduced to the sum voted last year. He would remind the Committee how this Vote for the department of science and art had gone on increasing during the last ten years. In 1847–8, it was £6,219; in the next year, £7,558; in the next year, £13,600, or nearly double what it was in the previous one; in the next, £11,000; the next, £16,200; the next, £15,000; the next, £20,000 odd; and in the year 1855-6, it had increased to the enormous sum of £73,516. In other words, it had risen from £6,219, in 1847-8, to £73,516 in 1855-6; last year the sum voted was £59,000; and now they were going to vote for the present year no less than £73,855. He asked the Committee seriously whether they were going to vote that large sum of money without any check whatever being imposed on its expenditure? It was in vain that they found fault with jobs—and there was jobbing going on everywhere; the only practical good to arise from these debates was to say that the money should not go. It had been properly asked who was benefited by the geological department. It was for the owners of estates to defray the expense of surveys, and not the general public. They had three rival museums, and they were all bidding against each other for the same object. They had got, for instance, the Geological Museum, in Gernyn Street, and there they found portraits of the Emperor of Russia, bad busts, old crockery, and broken china. Now, science and art were very useful; he did not disparage some things within their category; but the Government must recollect that the bulk of the money required for this large Vote was paid by a class of the community whose prospect of receiving any advantage from it was very remote, and that there was a strong feeling abroad that the money voted in that House was much more for the amusement of its Members, for the instruction of persons who ought to instruct themselves, than of the class who really needed instruction in that way, and especially that it went to promote certain fancies which—he hoped it was not unconstitutional to say it—had their origin in high quarters, and which he believed the Government themselves would be glad to see receive a check. Be that as it might, the time had arrived when the enormous and still increasing expenditure under these heads should be put a stop to; and he should therefore move that the whole Estimate be reduced to such an extent as to bring it within the amount voted last year, which was £59,000. [Cries of “No, no, £64,000!”] He held in his hand the document issued by the Treasury in accordance with his Motion for a Return, and by that document he found that the exact sum for last year was £58,526, giving, however, the Government the benefit of the odd pounds. He should move that the present Vote be reduced to £34,000, which with the £25,000 voted on account would make up the whole sum of £59,000.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE :—Sir, I cannot refrain from expressing the deep regret I felt at hearing the Motion of the hon. Member near me (Mr. Dillwyn), and if possible, the still deeper regret with which I heard the Motion of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Spooner). I regret it because, if, at this early stage of the proceedings of the Committee this evening, and with so thin an attendance of Members on both sides, it should so happen, not only unfortunately for the credit of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire himself, but still more unfortunately for the credit of this House, that his Amendment should be carried, the result would be that it would go forth to the public of these kingdoms, to the public of the whole of Europe, and, in fact, to the whole of the civilized world, that this nation, which has taken credit to itself for higher pretensions than almost any other, to be regarded as the special patron of art and civilization, had, by its approval of this Amendment, displayed a niggardly and blind determination to check that growing desire of the people for the further development of taste for works of the refined and the beautiful, which the great Creator of the Universe had, for his own wise and beneficent purpose, implanted in the breasts of his creatures. Let me also ask the two hon. Members who have proposed those Amendments, if they have taken into consideration the particular moment at which they have brought them forward? What is the occasion they have taken advantage for the purpose? Why, the very night on which our most gracious Sovereign would be on Her way to honour with a visit the second city of Her Empire—the great centre of our vast manufacturing industry—to inaugurate and grace by Her presence the most magnificent, valuable, and novel collection of the treasures of the arts, civilization, refinement, and philanthropy of every age and nation that the world ever witnessed, brought together by the unsurpassed energy of the intelligent and wealthy merchants and inhabitants of that great commercial and manufacturing city, and exhibited in a building which is in itself a work of art—a collection which will reflect everlasting credit and honour on the people of that town, and be a practical proof that, as in the days of the past greatness of Venice and Genoa, arts, trade, and commerce went hand in hand. I say then that I am utterly at a loss to understand why it is that my hon., and if he will allow me to add, my paleontological, Friend has chosen a night so inopportune as this for his Amendment, and I certainly cannot bring myself to believe that he will either press his Motion to a division, or that this Committee will mark it with the sanction of their approval. At the same time I wish it to be distinctly understood that while I feel bound to oppose the Amendment, it is not to be inferred that I endorse the whole of the arrangements which call for this Vote as deserving to be characterized as remarkable for absolute wisdom. Such has not been always exhibited by the manner in which the large sums of money have been expended that have been voted under this particular head—particularly with regard to the arrangements made at Kensington. And here I may take the opportunity of observing that I quite concur in the observations of my noble Friend (Lord Elcho), who, I think, has very happily laid his finger on the real and great blot of these proceedings in his allusion to the almost useless multiplication of collections or museums which has of late characterized what may be designated as the Young Art Movement in this country. I am also quite certain, with regard to the societies which have sent their collections to Kensington Gore, that their feelings were far from favourable to the change that has taken place. I have the honour of being one of the trustees of the Architectural Museum which a few months ago was established in Cannon Row, Westminster. The premises it occupied there were homely and inconvenient, but the situation was central and desirable. They were, however, destined soon to be carried away by the great demolition of property which is to take place in that part of the town to make way for the public offices, and so the Architectural Museum was offered room in the building at Kensington Gore. But since it has gone there, the step has only been a source of regret and mortification, the public are furious and the committee can say nothing. With the best intentions they have taken a most unpopular step. The whole history of this Kensington Museum shows how very foolish it is to act first and think afterwards. Some time ago there was a large surplus from the Exhibition of 1851. Lady Blessington was gone. Gore House for sale, Brompton Park in the market, and nursery grounds to be bought; what then could be so fine as to buy a large site and establish close to Rotten Row a permanent museum for all art and science? Accordingly a first instalment arose in the shape of that edifice, whose irreverent name I will not repeat. Then the National Gallery was to go to Brompton; but it has not gone there, and is not going, and the Educational Museum is now left alone in its glory. As a commencement collections were brought together; and what is the spectacle which that Museum presents? In one department are to be seen magnificent carvings and costly chasings, and in the next there is a collection of salts, alkalis, &c. in neat glass bottles, stoppered and labelled. In one place they were in the Hotel de Cluny; a few yards distant, they were in an apothecary's shop. It is, no doubt, highly desirable to see organic substances, such as nature has made them, and likewise those organic substances manipulated by the taste and ingenuity of man. But exceeding refinement defeats itself by its own artificialness. Art occupies a place for itself in the mind of man, and attempts to combine collections of art and science must always fail. In the British Museum there is an incipient collection of renaissance and mediæval art—two branches which were formerly much neglected, almost unknown—but which are now rising every day in price and estimation. When the Government had money in their hands common sense should have led them to expend it in increasing that existing collection instead of forming a new museum. We had had, however, the old story in England, two small and imperfect collections instead of one large one. The Bernal Collection came into the market and proved that those branches of art which the fastidious ignorance of a former generation had put aside as worthless and barbarous, had grown in estimation; and it would have been only an act of common sense if the Government had devoted the art money in its hands to the augmentation of the British Museum. But, on the contrary, the Educational department of the Privy Council, with the best intentions, went into the field, outbid the Museum, and swept away the best specimens, which are now in honourable exile down at Brompton. The Government might have had one fine collection, but the result has been, that there are now two, and neither of them can be said to be complete or perfect. With regard to the use of the Kensington Museum as a school of design, let us have schools of design by all means, but originals are not required for that purpose; plaster casts and coloured models will suffice, and can be obtained at a small expense, while the matchless originals might be collected in one National Museum, which should be known as the British Museum. I do not particularly mean the building near Russell Square, but one where these magnificent specimens of Ninevite, Egyptian, Grecian, and mediæval art might be brought together, exceeding in magnificence the boasted possession of the Palace of the Louvre. Then as to the School of Design, that was at present at Brompton; well, let it be left there if you please, but I must be allowed to say, that there is want of common sense in putting it there, for the students are, for the most part, poor, and so the sixpence which many of them have to pay in going to and fro in an omnibus is a serious matter to them. This may be remedied by removing the school to the garden at Burlington House; as I took occasion, on a former discussion, to point out. That garden is at present useless, and the museum may be removed there at no greater expense than cutting down the elm trees, and shifting the iron shed, which bore the euphonious name of "South Kensington." One word more with regard to the British Museum. That institution is still too much governed upon old-fashioned principles, and hampered by the ceremony, and the conditions of the last century, when a school of design was utterly unknown and unthought of. Let that, however, be reformed on liberal principles, let art students be admitted on the closed days, and let them have the Bernal Collection, as well as the objects of art now in the museum, and thus will the object of this Vote be carried out far more effectually than it could be by any system of half measures and patching. The House may rely upon it that the time will come when the library of the British Museum will require the whole of the building, and then what can be done for the Museum will prove a difficulty not easy to solve; but instead of various miscellaneous collections, I wish to see those of art and those of each class all brought together into one place! And I am sure that this country is so rich in art treasures, that when seen together in one collection it will tell its own story. Now, with regard to the pictures, there is the Turner Collection at Marlboro' House, and the Sheepshanks at Kensington, whither Mr. Sheepshanks desired to have it moved, and there to be kept in a fire-proof room. However, as that gentleman is still, I am happy to say, alive, I will only say, that the man who had the heart to give the nation such a collection would, I am convinced, have the head to perceive the enhanced value which would be given to our art treasures if they were all collected in one suitable building. With regard to the Turner bequest, Turner only stated in his will, that his pictures should be kept separate, which might be done if there were a National Gallery of proper dimensions; but until there is such a gallery, the House may rest assured that collectors will say, "We will not leave our pictures to undergo the indignity to which at first Mr. Vernon's were submitted, of being placed in a cellar." For my own part, I am still in favour of that plan of a gallery which I recommended in my evidence before the Commission, to be built in the inner circle of the Regent's Park. However, it was not adopted, no doubt for sufficient reasons, and so we must fall back on the site at Trafalgar Square. But, then again, I am almost afraid that even if we include the barracks and the work-house within the sweep of the building, still the space afforded in such a populous neighbourhood as that of Trafalgar Square would prove insufficient. The proposal I laid before the Commission with regard to a gallery in the Regent's Park was, that it should stand within the inner circle, a space which has a diameter of 1,000 feet, and that it should be of a circular form, with radiating galleries opening on the grand central Hall, which should be crowned by a dome, which might rival those of St. Peters and Florence—the whole surrounded with water, trees, and gardens. That proposal was not accepted, and we must fall back upon the site of the present National Gallery. But the costliness of the locality must not be made an excuse for some miserable, petty, contemptible structure, as unworthy of the reign of Queen Victoria, as the present was unworthy of the reign of William IV. We must do something more. We must treat science and art as a great department of the State, and in order to do that effectually and creditably to ourselves as a great nation, we must build wisely, nobly, and liberally. But, above all things, I say, let us have no more additional museums or schools of art, but amalgamate them, and have a national collection of all departments of art in a building worthy of the contents and of the capital, and let us in that building leave space for additional contributions; and let us also have that building in a central place, so as to be easily accessible to every class of society from the highest to the very humblest members of the community. Up to the present time, we have not done anything of that sort. Well, let us do it now. A great deal has been said about the appointment of a minister of education; but we must leave him to attend to the poor children in the lanes and alleys of our great cities, and to the training them in the first principles of morality, honesty, and the love of God and man. Having done that, let us have at the head of the science and art department a Minister of State, who shall be responsible as well for the public buildings as for their contents; responsible for the National Gallery, the British Museum, the Royal Academy, the Public Collections, and, in fact, for everything that has relation to the advancement of the fine arts and of science. But until such an appointment shall have been made, the Government of the country must be responsible for public buildings—they must be responsible for Sir C. Barry's designs—they must be responsible for the bills of the future architects of the public offices—for the National Gallery, both building and pictures—for the British Museum—for the collections at Brompton—for the Royal Academy, and for the Royal Society. Let us act so that it can no longer be said that the management of those great institutions should be remarkable for jobbing and extravagance, and by their hurried debates in a thin house in the hot days of June.

MR. NAPIER said, the hon. Gentleman opposite had made a very eloquent address, telling them what in his view should be done, but he had not said anything with regard to particular items. Though he Mr. Napier was not so romantic as the hon. Gentleman, still he was in favour of affording the working classes all possible opportunities of taking advantage of institutions of art and science. He knew that in Ireland the establishment of schools of design, and the fostering care which Lord Clarendon had extended to the Arts, had been productive of the greatest benefit. Looking at the Vote as a whole, he thought it a very fair Vote, considering the prosperous state in which the country was at the present moment, and he should certainly give it his cordial support.

MR. JOHN LOCKE said, he was afraid that the closing observations of the hon. Member for Maidstone (Mr. B. Hope) were rather in favour of the view of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Spooner) although he had commenced by expressing his hope that the House of Commons would not, especially on this night, when Her Majesty was on Her way to the Art Treasures Exhibition, agree to a Vote which would be disgraceful to it and to the nation at large. His object in rising was, however, not so much to speak to the Vote before the Committee, as to say a word on behalf of the people out of whose pockets these Votes would be defrayed, and for whose benefit, ostensibly, they were intended. Representing as he did a large metropolitan constituency, he felt it his duty upon this the first opportunity to state his views upon the subject to which he was about to refer. The people of this metropolis, the working class, had this complaint to make—that whatever sum of money the House chose to vote they derived no benefit from it; that they had no opportunity of viewing those collections to which they by the taxes they paid contributed. He had had opportunities of seeing them engaged in their labours, most arduous labours, from morning to night, during every day of the week, and thus whilst large sums of money were voted for the National Gallery and the British Museum, they had no opportunity of setting foot within those buildings. He was going to say that which would be extremely disagreeable to many who were his constituents, but he believed it to be just. He would say, that if the working classes had not an opportunity of visiting those places on a week day, they ought to have the opportunity of visiting them on the Sunday. There could be no objection whatever, on the contrary, it would indeed be a great benefit to the community at large if such an opportunity of visiting these two places were extended to them. As matters stood they had no means of recreation on the Sunday except by going out of town—an amusement to persons in their situation too costly to be frequently enjoyed. And in the winter even that was impracticable. Surely they might go to church or to chapel, and he for one was most anxious that a visit to a place of worship should occupy a portion of a working man's Sunday. But they could not be at church the whole of Sunday—it was more than mortal man could endure, for, however strong religious feeling might be, relaxation was required in respect to church and chapel, as in everything else. In point of fact their Sundays were to a great extent chiefly spent in the public-house, to the detriment of their pockets, their health, their morals, and their domestic happiness. By throwing open the institutions to which he had referred a wholesome means of recreation would be afforded, and this might be done at such hours as would not interfere with attendance at a place of worship. Certainly it was but a manifest act of justice that means should be given for enabling those who paid for such places to visit them.

Mr. CONINGHAM said, he was far from wishing to oppose a Vote of money for purposes of art or for the purpose of instructing the working classes in the principles of design; but he maintained that the large sums which were about to be voted for maintaining museums of insignificant and heterogeneous objects were a mere waste of money. The Vote for the Kensington Museum began by £15,000, and it would go on to hundreds of thousands, and perhaps millions, unless a stop was put to this system of expenditure. The noble Lord who spoke early in the debate pointed out a most objectionable scheme which had crept into this system, that of establishing three distinct national galleries. This, of course, entailed three different systems of expenditure. The National Gallery which was at the top of Trafalgar Square, which he maintained was the proper site for a National Gallery, was amply sufficient for the purposes for which it was built, if the whole of it were given up to the nation. The Royal Academy had been allowed to occupy half the building, and not many years ago a distinct pledge was given by the noble Lord the Member for London that the Royal Academy should find a site for itself. That pledge had never been carried out, and it now seemed as if the Royal Academy was endeavouring not only to occupy that part of the building which it already possessed, but by a system of underhand intrigue to oust the nation from the other half. The Government ought to give the Royal Academy notice to quit. If there was to be any removal to Kensington, it ought to be the

Royal Academy which should be removed, for the people who frequented those exhibitions were quite able to pay the cost of getting there; whereas the removal of those model works, which were the true models for people to study, and not the works of modern artists, as was now assumed, would be an injury to those who really desired to study the fine arts. It was by studying the great sculptures that had come down to us from antiquity, or, where these could not be found, by substituting casts, as at the Crystal Palace, and not by the establishment of rubbishy museums containing an omnium gatherum of the auction rooms of London and the trash of the old picture dealers, that they could hope to obtain a true knowledge of art. The history of these establishments remained to be written, but it was high time that the Teutonic element should no longer exist in our galleries of art. Whence came the system of "restoration," as it was called, the redeaubing of the masterpieces of the great artists of the past? It came from Berlin, and was brought here by Dr. Gustavus Waagen, who was honoured with the patronage of a distinguished person. He hoped the Minister for Education would not think he was making an attack on him. He listened the other evening with great pleasure to the observations which he addressed to the House, and he believed he was actuated by a desire to promote the study of the fine arts, but he (Mr. Coningham) begged to caution him against a system of which we were now only on the threshold, and to enter his protest against a further pursuance of that system. He did not think the present was an opportune moment for entering into a discussion of the management of the National Gallery, but he would say that so long as that system of management was continued, so long as the Royal Academy hung as an incubus on the energies of the artists of this country, so long would the arts be in a decadent state among us. It was a mistake to imagine that it was by State or Royal patronage that true artists had ever been produced in the world. The great artists who had appeared in past times rose when the nations from whence they sprang enjoyed liberty and freedom, and when literature and science also reached the highest pitch of excellence; and he was convinced that any attempt to foster an inferior kind of art, such as our present system was calculated to encourage, would only terminate in failure.

MR. COWPER said, he wished to remind the House that the present Vote had no connection with the subject of the National Gallery. Some confusion of ideas seemed also to prevail with reference to the Museum at South Kensington, as if it was entirely devoted to the fine arts, but it was more intended for instruction in the arts and sciences that applied to productive industry. Its object was to exhibit articles for the improvement of the taste of the artificers and the purchasers. The hon. and learned Member for Southwark (Mr. John Locke) said working men could not attend the national collections, but one of the rules of the Museum to which he now referred was that it should be open two evenings in the week from seven to ten, so that working men might attend it after their day's work. Already no fewer than 13,000 visitors had taken advantage of the opportunity thus offered them, and he had no doubt that, especially in the winter time, it would become the resort of great numbers of the working classes. Kensington Gore was at least as central as Regent's Park, though certainly it was not so near as Charing Cross. Every effort had been made to display valuable collections hitherto concealed. As an instance of the necessity for some such exhibition he might mention that lately a search was made for valuable and curious machines in the possession of the Ordnance Department. These machines had been left in a lumber-room, and through negligence had been broken up. Now, however, no such loss could take place, for curiosities like these could be secured in the Museum. The salaries referred to by the hon. Member (Mr. Dillwyn) were not so high as the corresponding salaries in the British Museum. In reality, they were remarkably low; but the hon. Gentleman not only found fault with their salaries, but, thought to add mockery to insult, by saying that the department designed the funeral car of the Duke of Wellington. He did not know whether the designing or the framing of the car could be attributed to them. [An hon. MEMBER: They designed it.] Well, all he would say was that the design adopted was better than the others that were proposed. The noble Lord (Lord Elcho) objected to the appointment of a paleontologist for the geographical survey of Great Britain; but he must say, that from the time when Mr. Smith wrote his book on strata down to the present moment, he had never heard of any one who was capable of expressing an opinion on the subject who did not admit the value of paleontology as a test and indication of strata. In the United States, where they were not very ready in spending their money on doubtful matters, the science of paleontology was paid by more than one State. In New York several quarto volumes had been published on this science at the public expense, because it promoted mineral knowledge. That an hon. Member for Warwickshire, who might be expected to desire the fullest development of the mineral resources of the country, should oppose a Vote for mineral surveys was what no one could ever have expected. Owners of land which might be rich in minerals could not be expected to bear the expense of a doubtful search, and, as it was a matter of national importance, the assistance of the State was given. The noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire had suggested that, although Mr. Sheepshanks' offer ought not to have been altogether declined, yet the conditions he imposed should have been refused.

LORD ELCHO explained that what he had said was, that he thought it a pity the Government had not waited until the Commissioners of the National Gallery had reported, and if they had reported that pictures would not be injured by smoke, probably Mr. Sheepshanks might not have objected to allow his pictures to be exhibited in town.

MR. COWPER said, his noble Friend appeared to think Mr. Sheepshanks was a man who could easily be persuaded into anything, but he (Mr. Cowper) thought that a gentleman who of his own accord gave a collection of pictures worth £60,000 deliberately and while in the full possession of his faculties was not a man to be so easily changed. The real answer to the noble Lord was to be found in Mr. Sheepshanks' own deed of offer, wherein he stated his opinion that a dry and airy situation was required for the pictures, and one remote from the bustle and dirt of a crowded thoroughfare for the study and enjoyment of them. To refuse such a gift merely because a condition was attached that it should be taken to Kensington would have been absurd, and would have rendered the Minister who so acted liable to censure. He thought the House could not assent blindly to the proposed reduction in the Vote.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he only rose to bear testimony to the good results which had flowed from schools of design, which had in fact so raised the standard of taste in this country, that designs were now produced which competent judges had declared equal to those of the French. He wished, however, to remind the hon. Gentleman that these schools of design were, however, nearly self-supporting, but a small aid coming from the Government.

Mr. SLANEY said, he should warmly support the original Vote as tending to the improvement of skilled artisans, and could not but condemn the proposed reduction as inimical to the interests of the great mass of the people.

Mr. SPOONER said, he wished to correct what was no doubt an unintentional misrepresentation on the part of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cowper). He had never objected to the Vote for schools of design, which he considered to be most valuable institutions, and which were only assisted by the State. The reduction which he proposed to make in the Vote would not affect schools of design in the least degree. What he objected to was the payment out of the public purse of more than £5,000 a year spent in surveying estates to prove to the owners that they possessed mineral treasures. Another objection that he had raised was that there were three museums, which went into the market competing with each other, and of course greatly increasing the cost of purchase.

COLONEL SYKES said, the hon. Member was wrong in supposing that the geological survey was useful merely as illustrating the estates of private individuals. Geology enabled us to become acquainted with the structure of the earth, increased our knowledge of minerals and other natural productions, and so might be the means of adding to our national wealth. He trusted, therefore, that the hon. Gentleman would not press his Amendment to a division.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER observed, that he was aware that the hon. Member for North Warwickshire had a great objection to the most precious of all metals—gold. He believed the hon. Gentleman thought that the country could do better without it than with it, and, perhaps, he was afraid that any researches we might make were likely to lead to further discoveries of that metal; but he would remind the hon. Gentleman that there were other natural productions besides gold, the possession of which would be a boon to this country, and it was with a view to promote the discovery of these that the school of geology had mainly been established. Most of the continental States had schools of mines, and in France and Germany it was a recognized point of public policy that there should be a portion of the national revenue devoted to that object. In England we had never had any school of mines, but we had now a geological survey placed under the superintendence of Sir Roderick Murchison, a scientific and practical geologist, and he did not think that any reasonable objection could be made to a Vote for such a purpose. It was, strictly speaking, a national survey intended to enrich, not individual proprietors, but the country at large, and he trusted therefore that the hon. Member would not succeed in reducing the Vote.

Mr. PLATT said, he felt deeply interested in their Vote on this ground; he believed that art had been too long neglected in this country, and that many important branches of manufacture had suffered thereby. He was quite satisfied that by agreeing to the original Resolution the House would initiate a policy full of advantage to the country. We possessed many mechanical contrivances which were not enjoyed by other countries; but, nevertheless, our neighbours across the Channel, owing to their superior taste and greater cultivation of art, beat us in the production of numerous articles of general use, and this he thought was a sufficient proof that we should no longer neglect the encouragement of art.

Motion made, and Question put, "That a sum, not exceeding £34,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Expenses of the General Management of the Department of Science and Art, of the Schools throughout the Kingdom in connection with the Department, and of the Geological Surveys of Great Britain and Ireland, &c., to the 31st day of March 1858."

Mr. DILLWYN regretted that he must trouble the Committee to divide, because his proposition involved a different principle from that on which they had just divided. He wished to reduce the Vote by striking off the items connected with the Kensington Museum, which he had already shown to be extravagant. The sum charged for salaries was excessive; the amounts paid to the assistant-secretary and the sub-inspector—namely, £675 and £450 respectively—being merely samples of the general scale. The sum of £2,000 for the purchase of specimens for an educational museum was ridiculously large, many of the articles bought at extravagant prices being apparently mere old curiosities. For instance, there was the sum of £103 for seventeen pieces of Staffordshire ware, supplied by Mr. Minton, and another item of £10, for a pair of wrought iron fire-dogs. He therefore proposed that the Vote should be reduced by the sum of £3,768.

Question put, "That a sum, not exceeding £45,087, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Expenses of the General Management of the Department of Science and Art, of the Schools throughout the Kingdom in connection with the Department, and of the Geological Surveys of Great Britain and Ireland, &c., to the 31st day of March 1858."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 36; Noes 162: Majority 126.

MR. JOSEPH LOCKE said, the Government had not acted fairly towards the House in increasing the expenditure at Kensington-gore, notwithstanding the strong objections which had been made against that site by many hon. Members on previous occasions, and although the Commission with respect to the National Gallery had not made its Report. On the present occasion, however, he should not do more than protest against the expenditure, which he believed would end in disappointment, not only to the House but to the country.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

MR. BLACK said, he must complain that this department had become not only its own publisher, but also a great book-selling establishment. The accounts showed a loss of £10,000 on the sale of books, and this was complained of by the trade as a great grievance. His own objection, however, was less a personal one than a feeling that the principle which dictated the adoption of this practice was an unsound one. The Government had baking establishments; why, then, did they not also sell cheap biscuits? The interference of the Government was most prejudicial to literature; for what publisher would think of bringing out a new educational work when he knew that he should have to competo with a work brought out with the aid of Government funds? The Government seemed to be aware that the course they had adopted was wrong, but like other repentant sinners they put off the day of reform. But he was satisfied that there was no way of obtaining cheap educational literature so good as leaving it to the skill and enterprize of those whose business it was to produce such works.

MR. BLACKBURN said, he wished to call attention to the expenditure under the heads of "Albert Agricultural Training Establishment and Model Farm, Glasnevin," "Agricultural Schools," and "District Model Agricultural Schools," amounting altogether to £17,900. There had been a long debate on the subject last year, and it was promised that they should be gradually discontinued. Nevertheless he found there was actually an increase of £900 in the estimate of this year. In a blue-book published upon this subject, he also found a number of testimonials in favour of these institutions, which reminded him very much of the testimonials on the subject of Holloway's pills. Among them was one from the present Member for Dartmouth (Mr. Caird), but, as there was no date to these documents, perhaps the hon. Gentleman would inform the Committee whether or no, since then, he had changed his opinion. Another testimonial was written by the well-known correspondent of The Times, "S. G. O.," and, no doubt, considering what they had cost the country, these institutions would look neat and tidy, but he thought the work of educating stewards, land bailiffs, and agents, for the benefit of the landed gentry of Ireland, was scarcely an object for which the public money ought to be voted. Last year the blue-book contained a description of all the wonderful turnips produced, but the compiler had apparently received a hint to omit such matter as this, which accordingly did not figure in the present publication. One of the inspectors, however, naively remarked of one of these establishments, thus maintained by public grants, that it formed a focus of improvement for the tenantry on Lord Monteagle's estates. The result of the whole, then, was that these institutions served as models for the improvement of the estates of the great landlords of Ireland. This, he did think, was rather too bad, and believing that the only mode of dealing with the subject was by striking out the proposed expenditure altogether, he begged to move, by way of Amendment, that the Vote be reduced by the sum of £17,880.

MR. CAIRD said, he certainly thought the sum of £17,900 a very large one to be spent upon an object of this sort. He should be disposed to defer very much to the opinions of Irish gentlemen on such a point, but there seemed to be some difference of opinion among them, and he noticed that, of the testimonials referred to, only seven or eight were from Irish gentlemen, twenty-two being written by persons wholly unconnected with Ireland. It did not appear, therefore, that any very strong feeling existed among Irish gentlemen themselves in favour of these establishments. For his own part he confessed that, though perhaps the state of Ireland some years ago might have rendered this grant excusable, he thought the present condition of agriculture in that country quite as good as in any part of Great Britain, and that there was, therefore, no reason for treating Irish agriculture in an exceptional way. The grant was positively more than the whole revenues of the Royal Agricultural Society of England, the Irish Agricultural Society, and the Agricultural Society of Scotland; yet, could any one, for a moment, compare the results attained? But he objected to this grant as a matter of principle. It was impossible to admit that, in this country, one trade possessed a greater claim than another for public support. They might as well talk of teaching tradesmen and professional men their business, as of employing the money of the State in teaching people to be farmers. Even if the business of life could be learnt at school, (and he was not of that opinion) this system could not be carried out. In Scotland, something of the same system was tried in the parish schools, but it was abandoned. Scotland was often pointed to as a model of agricultural improvement, but farmers there were educated for their business as other men were, and agriculture received no State encouragement. The true mode of improving agriculture was, by having examples of profitable farming, quite independent of any public countenance and support, established in every part of the country, and prosecuted as a matter of business. Now, he had observed in Ireland the greatest development of agricultural enterprise, and he had no hesitation in saying that, probably in every county there, almost in every district in each county, excellent examples of profitable farming were now to be found. With regard to Glasnevin, especially, he objected to it as a practical failure. It had been nine years in operation, and one of the inspectors stated, in the blue-book, that between 500 and 600 young men had been sent out from this school, and were dispersed throughout Ireland, for the promotion of agricultural improvement. This statement was, however, a very loose one, for he found the fact to be, that 237 was the whole number which, during the nine years, had been educated at Glasnevin, and, of that number, not more than two-thirds had been employed in carrying out agricultural improvements in Ireland; the remainder had either emigrated, were unknown, or had abandoned farming altogether. It appeared that the number educated in this establishment was 159 in nine years, which gave no more than eighteen per annum sent out from this great centre of agricultural instruction. What effect would these eighteen pupils exercise among the 500,000 occupying tenants in Ireland? From what he had himself seen, he was inclined to think that the experimental system of farming at Glasnevin was not suitable for general introduction in Ireland. The land was farmed in the highest possible manner; the farmer drew his capital from the State, and he was not bound to look to profit and loss. The system was, therefore, an exceptional one, and was by no means certain to be useful to young men in remote districts. The cost of each pupil was £32 per annum. There was less objection to such agricultural schools as those of Lord Monteagle, which were self-supporting. He would draw a distinction between the country schools and the establishment at Glasnevin, because it was possible that the introduction of industrial training into these country schools might be useful. If there were a demand for such training as was given at Glasnevin, the establishment would pay as a private enterprise, and that was the true footing upon which such institutions should stand. He could not but agree that the expenditure on these model schools was most lavish. It amounted to nearly as much as the cost of the Lord Lieutenancy, and was as much as the Votes on behalf of the London University, of the Scotch Universities, and of the Queen's Colleges in Ireland put together. And the cost of maintaining a young Irishman, as a pupil in one of these schools, was more than was paid to the professor of moral philosophy in the University of Edinburgh. At the same time, there might be some practical difficulty in abolishing this establishment immediately, and he would recommend his hon. Friend to withdraw his Motion, and leave the Government to reconsider the matter. They could then modify or withdraw the present system upon their own responsibility, as the circumstances of the country might enable them to decide.

MR. BAGWELL maintained that the model schools were very beneficial to Ireland; for a class of men were trained at them who would become independent and well-educated yeomen. It was a part of that general scheme of national education established by the Earl of Derby, in 1833, and from which the improvement of that country really dated. The total cost of the agricultural schools and farms under the exclusive management of the Board, after deducting receipts, was only £4,880. The total cost of agricultural education in 1855 was £6,895; and was it worth while to break up these establishments for the sake of this sum? He would entreat the House, instead of reducing this Vote, to ask the Government to give larger grants for the promotion of agricultural education in Ireland. Wherever model schools had been established, the greatest benefit to the district had resulted. He might cite numerous instances in support of this statement, but a reference to the school of Kilkenny would suffice for an illustration. That school had been instituted in opposition to all classes. It opened with fourteen boys, four girls, and four infants; but, so much had it progressed in popular favour, that by the end of the first year, it had 310 pupils. It had the support of all parties; it was attended and supported by the clergy of all denominations, and had admittedly solved the problem of imparting a sound education without interfering with the religion of the people, and he trusted that the Government, instead of diminishing, would increase the grants for them.

MR. WILSON explained, with reference to the publication of the school books, that the present system had been established in 1852, under a contract which would last till 1858. Every one admitted the value of the books, and that, so far as quality was concerned, they could not be improved. Although the Commissioners produced the books, every five years the supply of books was thrown open to competition by the trade, and the Government were pledged to reconsider the whole subject in detail when the present contract should expire. In point of principle, he could not gainsay the observations of his hon. Friend the Member for Dartmouth (Mr. Caird), but he wished to remind the Committee that they had, only a short time since, by a majority of five to one, determined that departments of science and art should be maintained in this country, for encouraging those branches of manufacturing industry by which our population obtained a livelihood. Now, what manufactures were to the people of England, agriculture was to the people of Ireland. Although these establishments were not founded on truly economical principles, the exceptional condition of Ireland at the time they were established ought not to be overlooked; and if we had to congratulate ourselves on the improved condition of Ireland, we ought to guard against striking a blow at one of the influences which had contributed to her welfare. The House had not scrupled to vote hundreds of thousands to relieve Ireland from her wants. And to what were those wants owing? To the debased condition of the country with regard to agriculture, and the position of its peasantry. Having raised that country to a better and more prosperous condition, he asked the House not to withdraw that assistance which had been productive of so much good, and was likely to be still more beneficial. At the same time, he quite agreed with his hon. Friend, that it was the duty of the Government to look at the improved condition of Ireland now, as compared with what it was some years since, and he would promise that the attention of the Government should be given to the subject, to see whether there were any unnecessary expenses which might be curtailed, and whether greater practical results might be obtained from the schools. The Amendment was to reduce the Vote by £17,900, but of that sum only £8,300 was required for the maintenance of the schools, £9,600 being for the completion of buildings which had already been commenced.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he should support the Vote, on the ground that the schools in question benefited, not alone the rich owners of estates, as the hon. Member for Stirlingshire (Mr. Blackburn) had asserted, but that they were of the greatest advantage to the humble, and hitherto uninstructed farmers of the district. He thought that the Committee could not well refuse this grant of a little over £17,000, when they would be shortly called upon to vote a nearly equal sum for the purchase of two pictures to gratify the curiosity and taste of the public of England—£3,153 for one picture, that of St. Sebastian, which had not yet arrived in this country, and £13,000 for the other, representing the family of Darius before Alexander. He did not know whether the hon. Gentleman intended to divide the Committee on the sum proposed to be voted for these pictures, but he (Mr. Maguire) would not be so illiberal. The hon. Gentleman then quoted passages from the Reports of the Rev. Mr. Brady, Chaplain to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, of Mr. A. Hill, and other gentlemen, to show that the state of agriculture in Ireland had undergone considerable improvement; that the cultivation of turnips, the fencing of farms, and the mode of cultivating the soil generally, had greatly progressed since the establishment of the model schools, while agrarian outrages had become almost unknown, drunkenness had decreased, and the rents were not in arrear, as used to be the case. He himself knew something of an agricultural school in Cork, attached to the workhouse, and could bear testimony to the fact that great benefit was derived from it, in consequence of its enabling boys who might otherwise grow up mischievous members of society to form habits of industry, and to become fitted for the discharge of the duties of farm servants. He was, he thought, making no extravagant demand upon hon. Members, when he asked them to agree to a Vote by which such a system was carried out. They must bear in mind that, in Ireland, agriculture was in its infancy, and that it required every effort which the Government could use to place it upon a good footing.

MR. MACARTHY said, that he should contend that the money which had been expended in the establishment of agricultural schools in Ireland had been well laid out, and was prepared to state that in a district with which he was acquainted the improvement in the art of farming which had of late sprung up was such as would do credit even to Scotland. It had been observed that the present system was one which produced men fit only to be stewards to the landlords of Ireland. It was perfectly true that it might have enabled the Irish landlords to dispense with the assistance of Scotchmen in that capacity, and he did not wonder, therefore, that it did not meet at the hands of Scotch Members with that degree of appreciation to which it was entitled. It had also been remarked that it was impolitic to make grants of public money for the purpose of fostering a particular branch of industry; but that was a course which was very generally taken, as was the case, for instance, in the establishment of schools of design and in the promotion of manufacturing industry in England. It would be rather hard, under those circumstances, to refuse to Ireland a trifling sum to foster the only industrial school she possessed. That its expenditure was productive of great benefit was borne out by the fact that there were within his own knowledge several independent farmers in that country who owe their present position to the training which they had received in the schools in question.

MR. BLACKBURN expressed it to be his determination to press his Motion to a division, unless the Government were prepared to make some reduction in the amount of the Vote as an earnest of their intention on some future occasion to abolish it altogether.

Motion made, and Question put, "That a sum, not exceeding £125,150, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the charge for Public Education in Ireland, under the charge of the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland, to the 31st day of March 1858."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 34; Noes 209: Majority 175.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

The following Votes were then agreed to:—

- (3.) £405, Education in Ireland.
- (4.) £3,602, University of London.
- (5.) £5,010, Scottish Universities.
- (6.) £1,625, Queen's University in Ireland.

MR. GROGAN observed, that the pupils attending the Queen's Colleges, and who received degrees from the Queen's University, which was established to compete with Trinity College, were unable to pay the fees requisite to maintain the institution, and that the House was called upon to supply the deficiency. He thought the subject deserved the serious consideration of Parliament. A Commission of inquiry had already been appointed, and he wished to know when their Report was likely to be presented.

MR. GREGORY said, that he found, from an observation appended to the Vote, that at the examination of 1856, at the Queen's University, there were twenty-one examiners and forty-eight pupils examined. That seemed an inordinate amount of sack to a pennyworth of bread. It appeared, also, from the next Vote, that the amount of prizes distributed to the pupils was utterly disproportioned to their numbers. For out of the forty-eight pupils examined twelve obtained gold medals, and £240 was distributed among them in money exhibitions. Such a system must destroy all feelings of emulation, so essential in an examination. The expenses of the examiners were also quite disproportionate, for as there could be no difficulty in obtaining the prizes they constituted no test of superior qualifications.

MR. WILSON said, he was willing to admit that the number of pupils examined at the University was very disproportionate to the number of examiners, but the amount received by the examiners was rather in the shape of fees than of salaries. It must, however, be borne in mind that this University was comparatively a young institution. He believed that the Report of the Commission which had been appointed last year to inquire into the subject of the Queen's Colleges might be expected in the course of August.

MR. W. WILLIAMS expressed his intention to divide against the Vote, unless a more satisfactory explanation was given.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER could only repeat the statement of his hon. Friend (Mr. Wilson). The Government had done all they could by issuing a Commission of Inquiry, and their Report would shortly be presented. These colleges were established, under a scheme of which Sir Robert Peel was the author, for the improvement of education in Ireland. It had been expected that they would confer great benefits upon Ireland, but unluckily it had been found that the demand for this species of education was less than had been anticipated. Measures were in progress for a revision of the scheme, and he hoped upon that understanding the Committee would pass the Vote.

MR. MOWBRAY said, he understood the right hon. Gentleman to admit that the scheme of Sir Robert Peel had proved a total failure, and he thought that so far from continuing this Vote the Committee ought to strengthen the hands of the Government in resisting such grants. He trusted the hon. Member opposite would divide on this Vote.

MR. VANCE observed that twelve months ago the same objection was made to this Vote, and he thought that as a minute and searching inquiry on the subject of these colleges might be completed in a very short time, it was not treating the House properly to call upon them to assent to these Votes before the Report of the Commissioners was before them. If the hon. Member would divide the Committee he should certainly support him.

MR. KIRK said, he did not rise to defend the grant, but to state that the effect of the national system of education introduced into Ireland by Lord Derby in 1833 had been to supplant the intermediate schools which used to exist in nearly every town in that country, and which afforded a good scientific and literary education, classical as well as mathematical. The consequence was that few schools now existed in which an education could be obtained to fit pupils for entering the Queen's Colleges, and the endowed schools were altogether feeders for Trinity College, Dublin.

MR. GREGORY observed, that he had no indisposition to vote a grant for the Queen's University, but he had thought it right to call attention to the fact that £240 was distributed in money, which would afford twelve exhibitions of £20 each, besides twelve gold medals. If twenty-four of the forty-eight pupils obtained these prizes, what test could the system afford of industry or acquirements? As, however, the right hon. Gentleman had given an assurance that the subject should receive attention, he (Mr. Gregory) would not vote against the grant.

MR. TATTON EGERTON said, the hon. Member for Galway county, having stated facts to induce the Committee not to assent to the Vote, now retired gracefully from opposition, and so he did not object to the grant, but only to the system. When they saw the small number of candidates who came forward to receive the benefits of an education at this university it was evident that the experiment of Sir Robert Peel had failed. He did not think, therefore, that the Committee ought to be satisfied with an assurance that an inquiry would be instituted, but that it ought to say aye or no on the present occasion.

MR. GREGORY said, that the hon. Gentleman who had addressed the House so smartly, could not have attended to what the Chancellor of the Exchequer had said. That right hon. Gentleman had said that a Commission had been issued, and it was for that reason that, although he objected to the present state of things, he did not wish to divide the Committee.

MR. BLACKBURN remarked, that he considered that the expenditure had been excessive. In six years only one engineer's diploma had been granted, and the expense for professorships, &c., had been £560 in that period.

MR. WILSON begged the Committee to bear in mind that these establishments had been settled by Act of Parliament after careful consideration, and could not be abolished except by another Act. The Committee, therefore, would not be acting wisely, upon an incidental question of expense, to reverse the decision which had then been come to, and to take a course which would produce considerable religious differences in Ireland, as any one who heard the discussion when these colleges were established would readily understand.

MR. VANCE said, that what he objected to was the principle that there should be two universities each conferring degrees, and yet that the degrees conferred by one should be considered inferior to those conferred by the other. He wished to know whether the Commission was to inquire into the Queen's Colleges, or into the University as well.

MR. MOWBRAY observed that he could not see how a question of theology could be involved. There were no professors of theology in the colleges, unless, indeed, the hon. Gentleman considered the professor of Sanscrit to be a theological professor.

MR. W. VANSITTART said, that the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Gregory) had spoken three times—the first time against the grant, and each succeeding time he had modified the views he had first expressed. For his own part, he thought that first impressions were the best, and he should vote against the grant.

MR. KINNAIRD said, that it appeared to be a general opinion that there was no necessity for those colleges, and therefore the first step towards abolishing them would be to vote against the present grant, and that would of necessity be followed by an Act of Parliament.

MR. BARROW said, he could scarcely call this system anything but jobbery. He felt called upon to raise his voice against this waste of the public money.

MR. HORSMAN said, that these colleges had been established upon grounds of national policy, and that question ought not to be decided by the Committee upon a Vote relating merely to a question of expense. Questions had been raised as to various matters connected with these colleges; and as it appeared to be a somewhat prevalent opinion that they had been a failure, the Government had issued a Commission to obtain information as to the state of these colleges, and also into the condition of the Queen's University. The Report of that Commission would shortly be before the House, and he thought that it would be a very unbusiness-like proceeding, before seeing that Report, to come suddenly to the conclusion that these colleges ought no longer to be continued.

VISCOUNT GALWAY said, that if he had entertained any doubt as to the vote which he ought to give the right hon. Gentleman had removed that doubt; for surely if the Report of the Commission was about to be produced in a few weeks the Vote ought to be postponed.

MR. NAPIER said, he thought that there was a great deal to be inquired into, not only as regarded this Vote, but also with regard to the application of all the moneys voted for educational purposes in Ireland. At the same time as this grant had been continued from year to year, it would be unjust to cut it off at present, and he should therefore support the Vote, on the understanding that the whole matter would be inquired into.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he could not agree with his right hon. Friend. The fact that the Commission was now deliberating on its Report was a reason for at least postponing this Vote.

Motion made, and Question put, "That a sum, not exceeding £1,625, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Expenses of the Queen's University in Ireland, to the 31st day of March 1858."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 169; Noes 55: Majority 114.

Vote agreed to.

(7.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £3,200, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray certain Expenses of the Queen's Colleges in Ireland, to the 31st day of March 1858."

Whereupon Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report progress, and ask leave to sit again."

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

ELECTIONS PETITION BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR ADDERLEY said, he rose to move the second reading of this Bill, the object of which was to prevent collusive presentations and withdrawals of election petitions. It had five clauses, the first and fifth of which contained one provision, and the second, third, and fourth another. The first provision was, that an affidavit should be taken by every petitioner or his agent, both on presenting and withdrawing a petition that in their belief there were good grounds for so doing. The second provision was, that no election petition should be withdrawn without the leave of the House. In exceptional cases the House might refer the petition to the examiners of recognizances to make inquiry as to the grounds of withdrawal, and on his Report might refer all the petitions which he thought should not be withdrawn to one Select Committee. Such were the main provisions of the Bill; they were simple, and he believed they would prove efficacious in remedying an evil which was alike degrading to the House and detrimental to the public interest. It was objected that the Bill would lead to an unnecessary multiplication of oaths, but the affidavit proposed to be taken was the same that was already taken in courts of law—namely, an affidavit of merits. Even if it did make a new oath, however, that ought to be no objection if the oath was necessary. He thought the House, instead of the present loose system, should adopt a course of proceeding more in accordance with that which was followed in courts of law. With regard to the second part of the Bill, it was objected that the House ought not to delegate its functions to any officer; but, in point of fact, that functionary had only to report, the House being at liberty to take what course it pleased in the matter. The Bill was approved of by a very high Parliamentary authority, and he called upon the House to give it a second reading with a view of going into Committee and there improving its details should any alteration for that purpose be thought necessary.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would admit that this Bill dealt with a real evil, but he did not think the House would be justified in going into Committee on the Bill unless there was some prospect of moulding it into an unobjectionable shape, of which he saw little prospect. The security afforded by the affidavit of an interested party would be worth nothing; for these oaths would come to be taken just as a matter of course. The Bill would, in short, be laying a snare for persons inclined to petition. It would cause false swearing, and would give no protection. The next part of the Bill seemed to be still more objectionable. At present a petitioner was allowed to withdraw his petition, which on the whole was favourable to the hon. Member petitioned against; but the third clause proposed that he should not be allowed to withdraw it without the consent of the House. The policy of the House was to send these petitions to a Committee, so that the matters in dispute were withdrawn from the consideration of the House; but the Bill proposed that the House collectively should be called on to consider whether a petition ought to be withdrawn or not, but how could that be determined without going into the merits of the various cases. The Bill then proposed that in cases where persons who had presented petitions desired to withdraw them they should not be permitted to so do without the permission of the House; and that if the House refused the permission then the petitioner should be compelled to prosecute the petition at his own expense. What success could be expected from a petition prosecuted by a reluctant petitioner at his own expense and against his will? The effect of the Bill would be to leave the practice just as it was at present, and therefore he could not assent to the second reading. He should, therefore, move that the Bill be read a second time that day three months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. MALINS said, he wished to ask whether, it being admitted that election petitions were grossly abused, such a state of things ought to be allowed to continue unchecked. He thought, where a man made charges against an hon. Member of that House he ought to be prepared to swear to their truth. But at present petitions were presented without reason and without responsibility, for the most unfounded charges might be made against any hon. Member without the party preferring them being liable in any way. Now, were the honour, character, and station of hon. Members to be trifled with in that way? For fourteen days after the opening of a new Parliament hon. Members were liable to have the most unfounded petitions presented against them; in many instances such petitions had been presented, and after the hon. Member had been put to the utmost amount of trouble, annoyance, and expense to contest it, the petition was withdrawn, and there was no opportunity afforded him of proving its entire untruth. Was that system to continue? It was not a new principle to require parties to swear to their belief in the charges they made, as in the Court of Chancery there were some bills which could not be filed without such affidavit. The right hon. Gentleman had said there would be great inconvenience to the House in requiring its sanction to the withdrawal of petitions, but there was no necessity that such sanction should be given by the whole House. There might be a standing Committee for that purpose. He believed the Bill would be eminently useful in preserving the dignity of the House, in suppressing unjust charges, and in preventing the gross jobbery of Parliamentary agents.

SIR J. SHELLEY said, he would move the adjournment of the debate. It was then half-past one, and many hon. Members had been closely attending to their duties for more than thirteen hours.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."

The House divided:—Ayes 55; Noes 77: Majority 22.

Question again proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. AYRTON said, he thought that the fact that so many hon. Members were smarting under threats, was a reason for not going on with the Bill. He would characterize it as a most impracticable measure. If the Bill were confined to making the unsuccessful party pay costs, then perhaps no one would object to it; but that was the smallest portion of the Bill.

MR. CHILD said, he should support the Bill, and would refer the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the Report of the Committee on the city of Durham election, of which the late Sir R. F. Lewis was Chairman, calling the attention of the House to the abuse of the right of petitioning against the return of Members.

MR. RIDLEY moved the adjournment of the House.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it would be inconvenient, on account of the other orders, to adjourn the House, but he hoped that the debate, in which several hon. Gentlemen wished to take part, would be postponed till a more fitting occasion.

MR. HORSMAN said, the general understanding was that opposed Bills should not be taken after midnight; it was now nearly 2 o'clock, and Mr. Speaker would have to take the chair at 12 o'clock for the morning sitting.

VISCOUNT GALWAY said, that the hon. Member for Staffordshire had stated early in the evening that he would proceed with the second reading that night, early or late; and no objection had been taken to that arrangement. It seemed as though the Government were afraid of being put in a minority; and hence this very unfair attempt again to adjourn the debate.

MR. NEWDEGATE pointed out that private Members had no other time except these late hours to bring forward their Bills.

MR. ALCOCK said, he wished, as an earnest of his strenuous support of the Bill, to announce his intention of moving in Committee that a sum of £200 should in every case be deposited by agents as a pledge for good faith.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON said, that the Bill did not emanate from one side of the House only. Its real author was the senior Member for Finsbury (Mr. Duncombe).

Motion made, and Question "That this House do now adjourn" put, and negatived.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he desired to state his objections to the Bill, and to deny that there was any analogy between the provisions of this measure and ordinary legal proceedings. There was no instance at equity in which a legal proceeding merely requiring an answer was required to be verified by affidavit. It was only when some judicial step was to be taken that such a process occurred.

MR. NAPIER said, a petition against a return was in the nature of an indictment, and the petitioner ought therefore to be compelled to verify his statement on oath.

MR. WYLD observed, that he had reason to complain of the loose state of the law on this subject. A person presented a petition against his return, but shortly afterwards withdrew it, having first had the confidence to state that his only object was to use the Parliamentary petition machinery as a means of advertising himself as a boot and shoe-maker.

Question, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read 2<sup>o</sup>, and committed for Friday.

House adjourned at a quarter after Two o'clock.

ALLEGED REVIVAL OF THE SLAVE TRADE—QUESTION.

LORD BROUGHAM said, he rose to ask a question of his noble Friend, the Secretary for Foreign Affairs relative to a subject which had excited much alarm among those who, like himself, were friends of the African race, and who hoped they had seen the end of that great scourge, the slave trade. It was understood that a body of West India planters had approached the noble Viscount at the head of the Government, and had urged him to facilitate the importation into our colonies of free negroes from the coast of Africa. It was also understood that measures of the same sort were contemplated by the colonial interests of France and Spain, and it was even stated that the Emperor Napoleon had given permission to a house at Marseilles to fit out an expedition for importing 20,000 free negroes, as they were called, into the French colonies. One vessel, it was alleged, had already sailed to Quidah, on the coast of Africa, well known as a slave-trading port—the very port, indeed, from which the King of Dahomey formerly carried on that infernal traffic. No wonder, then, that alarm had been excited at the prospect of such an expedition to the port of Quidah, with the professed object of inducing negroes to take ship and be conveyed over to the French colonies. It was well known that one of the most remarkable acts of the life of the first Napoleon, the only act of his in favour of human rights, was his decree for putting down the French slave trade—our ancient allies, the Bourbons, having altogether omitted to take such a course. He felt assured that the present Emperor of the French would not, by pursuing an opposite course, tarnish the glory of a policy which reflected so much honour upon his predecessor. It was also said that a similar movement was taking place in Spain, that the importation of free negroes into Cuba was to be encouraged by the Spanish Government. Now, there was, no doubt, a great difference between any measure having for its object the importation of free negroes into Cuba upon the one hand, and a measure, the object of which was their importation into the French or the English colonies, upon the other. In the latter case, of the French colonies, slavery had been abolished, so that free negroes could not be enslaved after their importation. But the free negroes who were imported into Cuba, might in reality be compelled to undergo a state of endless bondage; and he hoped his noble Friend the Secretary for Foreign Affairs would be able to give him some assurance that the new Governor of the Havannah was treading in the footsteps of those among its predecessors who had shown a disposition to put down the slave trade, and was not following the example of those by whom a contrary course had been pursued. That a disposition existed in Brazil to put an end to the traffic in slaves he entertained no doubt, and the course which the Government of that country had taken in reference to the subject was such as, in his opinion, redounded greatly to its credit. When persons emigrated from this country to the colonies care was taken that they should be provided with sufficient accommodation on board the vessels in which they were conveyed. Medical attendance was afforded them, and a vigilant superintendence was exercised at the various custom-houses in their regard, security being taken that they should be landed at the port to which they intended to emigrate. In the case of those free negroes, however, who were to be shipped on the coast of Africa no such precautions could be taken, and the consequence would be that the greatest abuses must arise. Such a state of things should not, he contended, be allowed on any account. Security should be taken that those negroes should be landed at the port for which they were bound, and that whenever they became dissatisfied with their new position they should be enabled to return to their own country. As this, however, was manifestly impossible, the whole scheme should be discountenanced. Since the abolition of the slave trade, what he might term the innocent commerce of Africa had increased to a considerable extent. In the year 1855 upwards of £1,500,000 worth of goods had been exported from this country to those ports in Africa which were not in our own possession or under the dominion of France, while goods to the value of £250,000 had been exported to Sierra Leone and other English settlements on the African coast. Now, nothing could have a greater tendency to check that growing commerce than the encouragement of the traffic in slaves, and he hoped, therefore, to receive from the Government some assurance both as to the intentions of the Spanish and Portuguese Governments, and as to the project which had been brought under the notice of his noble Friend at the head of the Government.

THE EARL OF CLARENDON, who was very indistinctly heard, was understood to say that he entirely concurred in the opinion which had been expressed by his noble and learned Friend, and was sorry he was unable to give a detailed answer to the various inquiries which had been made; because, although his noble and learned Friend had given him notice of his intention to put a question with regard to the slave trade, he had not given any intimation as to the precise nature of that question. A deputation had certainly waited upon his noble Friend at the head of the Government to propose some measure having for its object the importation of free negroes from Africa to the colonies, but he was not aware of the precise nature of the proposal, or of the answer returned by his noble Friend. He was quite certain, however, from all the antecedents of his noble Friend—from the fact that all his energies had been directed to the suppression of that detestable traffic—that no encouragement, either directly or indirectly, would be given by him to anything that could in the remotest manner lead to a renewal of that traffic. Portugal had set its face entirely against any attempt, whether by mercantile associations or otherwise, to import free labour from the African coast. As to the rumour that a licence had been given to a French commercial company at Marseilles, and that a ship had sailed from that port for Quidah, Her Majesty's Government had received no official information on the subject, and he thought it would have been impossible for such an expedition to have sailed without the attention of the Government having been officially drawn to it. His noble and learned Friend had not at all understated the progress of commercial enterprise in Africa, and it was to be hoped that industry had taken such a spring in that country as would lead to the most happy and beneficial results.

OXFORD UNIVERSITY BILL.

SECOND READING.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON presented a petition from the visitors of the Foundation of John Michel, Esq., in the Queen's College, Oxford, praying to be heard by counsel against the Bill. The noble Earl made some observations which were inaudible.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY presented several petitions in favour of the Bill, from the Provost and Fellows of Queen's College, and certain Fellows on the Michel Foundation. The noble Earl said, that one of the objects of the Bill was, to consolidate the fellowships on the Michel Foundation with the old Foundation of Queen's College, and the only parties who objected to the new state of things were these trustees. Every one was now agreed that nothing was so inconvenient as that in one college there should be two sets of Fellows established on a different footing. The question raised by his noble Friend was whether, irrespective of the merits of the Fellows, the state of things should continue. Parliament had given power to the Commissioners to deal with that question, and it was in the hands of the Commissioners, and they had thought it right to deprive the persons whom they had dealt with of the undue advantages which they possessed. It was, however, provided by the Oxford University Act, that when the Commissioners should give notice to the parties concerned of their intention to make any alteration in the statutes, and when the ordinances were passed, an opportunity was given to the parties interested, by an interval of forty days, to ascertain whether they were approved by them, and their case, if any, was heard by the Commissioners. There was no reason given why fellowships in one foundation should be on a different footing; and he trusted their Lordships would agree to the second clause of the Bill, which provided for the consolidation of Michel's Foundation in Queen's College with the old foundation of the college. The first clause of the Bill asked for a prolongation of the powers of the Commission. In the last Session of Parliament he had asked for and obtained a prolongation for one year of the powers of the Commission; but it was found that the slow progress which had been made rendered it requisite to ask for a further prolongation this year. By means of such a prolongation all the duties of the Commission would be discharged. Already out of twenty colleges of which Oxford consisted statutes had been framed for fourteen, and of the remaining six there was a difficulty with only one, which he trusted would soon disappear, and that within the present year the whole business of the Commission would be settled. But as a certain time must elapse before an ordinance of the Commission could become law, namely, forty days after it was promulgated, it was not desirable that the Commission should expire before parties interested should have opportunities of objecting to any ordinance that might be passed. The Bill, therefore, asked for the prolongation of the Commission till July 1, 1858.

Then the Order of the Day for the Second Reading of the Bill read.

Moved, 'That the Bill be now read 2<sup>a</sup>.'

THE EARL OF DERBY said, his noble Friend had fallen into an error in supposing that he was obliged to make an application to Parliament last year to prolong the Commission, for in the original Bill a provision was inserted to the effect that the Commission should last for a certain period, and power was given to the Crown to extend that period a year longer if it should be deemed necessary. Therefore, in point of fact, this was the first application to the House for a further prolongation, the Crown having availed itself of the power granted by the original Act. He did not rise to offer any opposition to the present Bill; but he hoped that this would be the only prolongation which would be asked for, as nothing could be more inconvenient than an indefinite prolongation of the powers exercised by the Commissioners. He wished to take this opportunity of calling the attention of his noble Friend to the provisions of one of the ordinances which had been laid upon the table by the University Commissioners. That ordinance had reference to Oriel College, and the complaint which he had to make with regard to it was, that it was at variance with the original intentions of the founder, and excluded all consideration of the pecuniary circumstances of applicants for fellowships. One of the provisions of the Oxford University Act was that the Commissioners should frame the ordinances of the several colleges according to the obvious design of the founder, but allowed them a certain latitude in abolishing or amending the existing statutes to suit the requirements of the present day. He did not deny that the Commissioners had a right by law to do away with all those preferences as to place of birth and founder's kin, and some of the capricious distinctions which had existed in favour of particular parties. He confessed he thought that Parliament had gone a step further than was necessary in that respect, because, provided the original intentions of the founders were not in themselves unreasonable, nor contra bonos mores, nor impracticable at the present time, he did not see that there was any reason for departing from them. Parliament had undoubtedly authorized the Commission to depart from the intentions of the founders, but he apprehended that that was only in cases where the preferences were founded on grounds which could not fairly be substantiated in the present day. That to which he desired to call their Lordships' attention was a provision of the founder of Oriel College, to which those objections were not quite applicable to a particular period, being one which was good for all time, and was at the very foundation of the objects of university education. According to the ancient statutes of Oriel College, three circumstances were required by the founder to be kept in view in the selection of candidates—first, the moral character of the applicant; secondly, the pecuniary circumstances; and thirdly, the aptitude of the party for study and his desire for instruction. The original statute ran thus :—

Of course the Commissioners did not intend to set aside the primary consideration of moral character. So far, however, as these ordinances of Oriel College went, the sole condition seemed to be the test of scholarship as afforded by the University examination. That ordinance not only ignored the pecuniary circumstances of an applicant, but expressly stated that they should not be taken into consideration. There could be no words more strong than those he had quoted to indicate that it was the intention of the founder that those who were to have the benefit of the foundation should be persons of small pecuniary means. He knew that there was a difficulty as to the construction of the word indigentes, which occurred in the statutes of Oriel; but he did not think that difficulty could be urged by the Commissioners, as they had themselves undertaken to explain it. In this very ordinance they had, in his opinion, rightly interpreted the word as intending to denote deserving persons being in need of support at the University. The founder had undoubtedly intended to give eleemosynary assistance to promising youths desirous of education but unable by their own means to bear the expenses of the University. In his judgment that was not only a proper and judicious, but a laudable and beneficial provision. From the foundation of those statutes down to the present time nothing had tended so much to encourage liberal education amongst the middle and humbler classes of society as this eleemosynary system of education, which by the present ordinance it was proposed to do away with. Hundreds and hundreds of persons now living gratefully acknowledge the benefits they derived from that system, without the aid of which they would not have been able to cultivate their talents in the way they had done. The statutes of the founder provided for the exclusive education of persons of good character, though in indigent circumstances. The college did not go so far as that, but only wished that in taking into consideration the claims of the different parties to fellowships, they should be allowed to have regard, as one element, to the pecuniary circumstances of the candidate. Nothing could be more moderate than such a wish, and it is rather remarkable that the Commissioners themselves should appear to entertain the same view. The ordinance of the Commissioners provides that no person should be ineligible on the ground of indigence. They admitted that; but refused to recognise the preference which the ancient statute awarded to indigence. But why, he knew not; but it was said that in consequence of the private communication from the members composing the minority of the college, the Commissioners subsequently altered the ordinance which the college had already accepted, and went so far as absolutely to prohibit the college from taking into consideration the pecuniary circumstances of the candidate, which the founder meant to form the great claim for eleemosynary assistance. The clause, as revised, ran thus :—

“In elections to fellowships within the college no person shall be entitled to preference or be declared ineligible by reason of his place of birth, or by reason of any statute or rule limiting the number of fellowships tenable at any one time by nature of the same town, city, county, diocese, or other place, or by reason of his pecuniary circumstances.”

They absolutely prohibited that which the founder declared to be one of the main conditions on which parties should be admitted to participate in his bounty, by declaring that their circumstances should not be taken into consideration as a ground for preference. That clause, on being sent back to the college, was rejected on a division; but, nevertheless, it being persevered in by the Commissioners, it was ultimately accepted by the college. Now, that seemed to be, in the first place, a strange departure from the clearly-expressed and benevolent intentions of the founder; but it was also a strange mode of conducting business, to send down a statute, have it accepted, and then, when urged by a minority to make an alteration in it, and force it down the throats of the majority of the college, notwithstanding their opposition to it. Therefore, he said, they were injuriously affecting the character of the college and of the University by striking out the provision giving preference to the claims of poverty. What was the most prevalent complaint they had heard with regard to the University at the present day? The complaint was that the entrance was so expensive, that it was necessarily confined to a small portion of the community. The wish of the founder of this college was, however, to diminish the expense, and to enable persons of small means to meet it. And with this complaint staring them in the face they diminished still further the narrow facilities afforded to persons of the humbler classes who were desirous of a University education; so that in effect it would appear, according to their notions, that property and not poverty should be the qualification for the possession of those intellectual attainments. Unfortunately the powers of the Commissioners were so ample, and the means of resistance on the part of the colleges so small, that whatever the Commissioners declare shall be the law must necessarily be the law. The colleges in this case voted against the acceptance of this provision; but they could not at the same time say that the provision would prove injurious to the college as a place of learning, because it was possible that persons more intelligent, more learned, and more brilliant than before might be educated under the new rule. Their main objection to it was that they considered it would interfere with the beneficial arrangements of the founder, and consequently there would be an abuse of the original intention of the founder in adopting it. It was true that the Commissioners recognised to a certain extent the rights of poverty, for there was a provision by which one-fifth of the fellowships might be suspended for a certain period of time, in order to provide emoluments for a small number of scholars of £60 each; but the provision made by the founder for this class amounted to no less than £4,500 a year. All that money was now taken away, and applied to the establishment of the professors of the University, and to the payment of the grants to fellowships. While for the humbler classes, the miserable pittance of £240 was distributed amongst four scholars, at the rate of £60 a year each; and that only when five fellowships had been abated. The ordinance had been laid on the table of the House, not for the purpose of being amended, for that could not well be done: the only power their Lordships had in respect to it was to address the Crown that the ordinance might not be sanctioned by the Crown. He, for one, had no wish to take that course. He had no wish, on the whole, that this ordinance should not be sanctioned; but it appeared to him to be framed in contradiction to the main designs of the founder. It was also at variance with the original intentions of the Commissioners, and with that which the college had at first accepted. He did not propose to make any Motion on the matter, but perhaps the noble Earl opposite would explain under what circumstances that extraordinary change had taken place, and upon what grounds the Commissioners had decided that the comparative merits of the claimants to scholarships and fellowships should be decided altogether apart from their pecuniary circumstances, in complete defiance of the wish of the founder.

THE BISHOP OF DURHAM said, that it was necessary for the Commission to take the general circumstances of the matter into their consideration. The words humiles alumni occurred in many statutes, especially in those of Merton College, and there was no more reason for retaining them in Oriel than in any other college. They knew that young men, in the days when the foundation was made, were elected fellows at thirteen or fourteen, for the purpose of gratuitous education. They were then educated by Professors, but now they were educated by tutors. Oriel College had deviated as well as other colleges from the express words of its founder, but it was only in order to make their foundation more conformable to the spirit of the age. Suppose there were several candidates, and the poor man was, intellectually, the worst qualified, and was to be elected Fellow, the consequences would be very inconvenient; and surely if of several candidates the most eligible in point of intellectual and other qualifications happened to possess larger pecuniary means than the others, that circumstance ought not to be held as a disqualification. The old rules as to indigentes et humiles virtually had become obsolete. They had not put the poor man in any worse condition than he was in before. They had increased the number both of exhibitions and scholarships, placing the poor young student much in the same position as he was in 1250, or the century when the foundation was made. The words of the ordinance gave a wide scope to the admission of every qualification, and the words were studied for that purpose especially, to introduce young men of high moral qualification. The pecuniary qualification for fellowships had been expressly abandoned on account of the difficulty and abuse to which it was subject, and that abandonment had been officially approved.

The Commissioners themselves explained that they had not precluded the college in other cases from admitting pecuniary considerations.

THE BISHOP OF ST. ASAPH as one who, under God, owed all the advantages he had gained in life to an eleemosynary foundation, was desirous of stating generally the description of the foundations which, in his opinion, should exist in the University. He thought the noble Earl opposite would see there were reasons why pecuniary considerations should be entirely excluded from the selection of Fellows. University foundations were divided into fellowships, scholarships, and exhibitions. In the latter case he could not help believing there would be great advantage in making poverty an element of consideration in conferring them, and exhibitions might wisely be given to the sons of poor clergymen, to enable them to prosecute their studies at the University. This was an advantage which he had experienced in his own person. With respect to fellowships, however, the case was different; the Fellows were the governing body, and should be selected from the most capable men, without regard to their pecuniary means. In the intermediate step of scholarships he thought poverty ought not to be taken into consideration.

LORD REDESDALE thought it was extremely desirable that foundations should be maintained for the encouragement of persons of small means to reside at the Universities, and complained that poverty was specially excluded in the words of the ordinance.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON considered that they were greatly indebted to the Parliamentary Commissioners for having done that which was found fault with by the noble Earl. If these colleges could carry out that which was required, and in every examination were to admit candidates on equal terms, and then at a future period to consider how much Greek was to stand against how much poverty, he thought the examination would be greatly injured. He did not mean to say that poverty should be altogether excluded from consideration, but what he contended was, that they ought to endeavour practically to carry out the intentions of the founders, and not by slavishly following the mere letter lose the whole spirit of the injunctions. The object of the founders was, no doubt, that poor young men should be enabled to study in their early youth, and the Parliamentary Commissioners having those intentions in view, founded some exhibitions in which poverty would be assisted. The colleges, it should be remembered, had grown up to a position never contemplated by their founders; they had become the governing body of the University, furnishing the teachers and instructors; the Commissioners, therefore, were wise, as it appeared to him, in deciding that they would not permit teachers to be selected on the ground of property but only on the ground of merit.

After some remarks from the Earl of HARROWBY and the Earl of DERBY, Motion agreed to; Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly; and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

REMOVAL OF IRISH PAUPERS.

OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE rose to call the attention of their Lordships to the laws in force for the removal of Irish-born poor from parishes in England and Wales; and to ask whether it was the intention of the Government to propose any Amendment in those laws. In 1854 the Government now in office proposed a measure for the abolition of the law of settlement in English parishes. It was admitted by them that if Parliament were to enact that the power of removal of English paupers should cease, it would be highly unjust to continue to remove Irish paupers from English parishes, and that therefore such an extension of the principle must take place. The measure, however, was not persevered with, and the reason assigned for abandoning it was the decided disinclination on the part of English parishes to extend the provisions of the Bill to the Irish poor. Subsequently a Committee, composed of Members of the other House of Parliament, sat for two Sessions upon the subject to which it related. That Committee took a large amount of evidence, and agreed to a report in which, although they did not go to the extent which the evidence would have justified, they recommended that some relaxation should be made in the law of removal as it now stood. They had, in the first place, recommended that the warrant of removal should be made out in open court; secondly, that the depositions of the witnesses on whose testimony the warrant was granted, should be taken down in writing; that a copy of the warrant and depositions should be sent to the board of guardians of the parish in Ireland to which the pauper happened to belong; and that power should be given to the union authorities in Ireland to appeal against the order, and to make use of the rates of the union in the prosecution of that appeal. They had also advised the adoption of other relaxations, and among them the reduction of the period entitling a pauper to the privilege of irremovability in this country from five to three years. Such was the report of the Committee; but without advertg to it further, he might inform their Lordships that the Irish poor law, in connection with the question of settlement, differed materially from that which prevailed in this country. In Ireland, indeed, there was no law of settlement at all. The Irish poor law enacted, that wherever a person became destitute there he should be relieved, no matter from what quarter of the world he might have come. The matter of chargeability had to be arranged afterwards between the union and the electoral division in which the pauper became destitute. But to revert to the system in this country, he should wish to point out to their Lordships the practical results of the mode in which it worked. Irish paupers came over here in large numbers, and were employed for harvest purposes and in the more severe forms of labour—indeed, their services in that capacity had now become necessary to England. What was the consequence? Young men and young women came over; they resided here for a period of fifteen, twenty, or twenty-five years; they married and had families in this country; yet after having spent the best part of their lives in contributing to the increase of English capital and to the production of English wealth, they were, the moment that sickness or accident might have reduced them to poverty, liable to be told by the poor law authorities that in England they were not entitled to relief. Well, what was their position when they were sent back to Ireland after the lapse of the period of twenty or twenty-five years as he had just suggested? The great probability was, that when they returned to their native place they found that their parents were dead, that the other members of their family had emigrated—and he might state, of his own knowledge, that he knew instances in which paupers sent back to Ireland had been unable, in the neighbourhood in which they had been born, to discover a single relative or friend. But that was not the only mode in which the present system of removal operated as a hardship. Sickness and misery of every kind were endured by those unfortunate persons on board the steamers and sailing vessels into which they were huddled. The way in which they were transported across the Channel was such as had that evening called for their Lordships' sympathy in the case of the African slaves, and when they arrived upon the Irish coast they were landed upon the crowded quays of Dublin, Belfast, or Waterford, frequently amid all the inclemency of a winter morning, and at a distance, perhaps, of 100 miles from the parish to which they originally belonged. Now, that was a state of things which, in his opinion, loudly called for the interference of the Legislature. He was perfectly aware of the difficulties standing in the way of Government dealing with this question; for he felt that if they meant to deal in a liberal spirit towards Ireland they must be prepared to oppose themselves to the narrow selfishness of the parochial authorities of this country. Owing to the great number of Irish paupers who had, during the famine of 1847, come over to the western coast of England, the poor-law authorities of Liverpool, Bristol, and other places similarly circumstanced, might object to any proposal by which they would be saddled with a population of that description. But 1847 was an exceptional period. The social condition of Ireland had since then been greatly changed, and, even though a famine should again occur in that country, it was by no means probable that that state of things would be brought about, of which the poor law authorities of Liverpool complained before the Committee. He trusted, therefore, that the Government would take the subject into their serious consideration. In the Session of 1856 they had proposed a measure with respect to it, in which he regretted that they had not persevered. That measure had, it was true, met with opposition from some Members of the other House of Parliament connected with Ireland, who did not think it went far enough. He was, however, of opinion that a different course should have been adopted upon that occasion, and that those Gentlemen should have accepted the Bill as an instalment of those improvements in the present law which they were entitled to expect. He should, in conclusion, ask his noble Friend the President of the Council whether the Government had any measure under their consideration by means of which the grievances to which he had called their Lordships' attention might be removed, and the recommendations of the Committee of 1855 carried into effect.

THE EARL OF DESART tendered his thanks to his noble Friend who had just spoken for the manner in which he had brought the subject under the notice of the House, and expressed a hope that the Government would introduce some measure to amend the present law of removal.

EARL GRANVILLE concurred with the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Donoughmore), in thinking that great injustice was sometimes inflicted upon Irish paupers under the operation of the existing system. The Bill of 1856, however, to which the noble Earl had alluded, which had been introduced upon the recommendation of the Committee of 1855, and which had for its object the removal of that injustice, had been most violently opposed, not only by English and Scotch Members, but also by the representatives of Ireland. It had in consequence become quite impossible to pass it through the other House of Parliament, and he did not therefore think it would be wise upon the part of the Government, when many important measures were pending, to bring forward a Bill which would not be likely to obtain the support even of those whose assistance it was most natural to expect.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE bore testimony to the fact that great inconvenience resulted from the present state of the law. In reply to the observation of the noble Earl (the Earl of Donoughmore), that there was no law of settlement in Ireland, he remarked that such was not exactly a correct statement of the case, inasmuch as the chargeability of a pauper upon an electoral division operated to some extent as a law of settlement. What was required in Ireland, he contended, was not alone an alteration of the law of removal in the case of paupers sent over to that country from England, but in the working of the law within the limits of Ireland itself. As things now stood a pauper landed in Ireland became at once chargeable on the rates of the port at which he happened to disembark, notwithstanding that Mayo or some other county might be the place to which he originally belonged.

THE EARL OF CLANCARTY complained that while the English unions had power to ship off Irish paupers who had become chargeable, the Irish unions were in that respect quite helpless. The subject was one of great importance, and would, he hoped, be taken up by the Government.

LORD STUART DE DECIES hoped that, as a member of a board of guardians in which the inconvenience arising from the present state of the law was heavily felt, he might be allowed to state two cases of great hardship. The cases to which he referred had occurred in the borough of Dungarvan within the last year. The first was that of a man who, having obtained an English settlement by residing eighteen years in one place, removed to another in search of temporary employment. Failing that, his right of settlement in his first place of residence was denied, he was shipped off to Ireland, and was now chargeable to the Dungarvan Union. The second case was that of an Englishwoman with a family of five children, who having been deserted by her husband applied to the union. The guardians were obliged to admit her, and were now maintaining her without the slightest power of sending her back to her own country. More than that, it so happened that she and her family constituted nearly the whole of the Protestant inmates of the workhouse, and application had been made by the Protestant chaplain, whose present salary was £10 a year, for an additional £10, in order that he might be the more able to administer to her spiritual consolation. But he believed that such cases were not uncommon, and therefore he concurred with the noble Lords who had spoken in pressing upon Government the necessity of taking the subject into their serious consideration.

LORD MONTEAGLE said, that it would have been impossible to delay legislation so long on the subject, but for the wonderful improvement in the condition of the Irish people. The complaint was not now of the excess of Irish labourers in England, but of their scarcity, the improved scale of wages in their own country abating the temptation to emigration. But this afforded the strongest reason for taking the matter in hand, as a time of difficulty and distress would be the worst possible moment for legislation on such a subject.

LORD REDESDALE said, that the reciprocity argued for by the noble Lords connected with Ireland was a genuine Irish reciprocity, being all on one side. He would engage to prove that a vast deal more money was spent in the English unions on Irish paupers than ever was spent in the Irish upon poor from England. As to the case of the Irish labourer who had lost his settlement, the same would have happened to an English labourer in similar circumstances, as it was an incident of the law of settlement. In the case of English paupers in Irish unions, he did not think there would be any objection to a power of removal; but with respect to the sea-ports, it should be remembered that burden was much more heavy in Liverpool and Bristol than it could be in Cork or Belfast. The question was one of great difficulty, but they might depend upon it the advantages arising from the present state of the law were all on the side of Ireland.

THE MARQUESS OF WESTMEATH, alluding to the noble Lord's charge that the reciprocity in connection with the law of poor relief was a one-sided reciprocity, begged to remind him that if there was an influx of Irish paupers on our shores the cause was to be found in English legislation, which had deprived Irish landlords of the means of improving the condition of the Irish peasantry.

House adjourned at a Quarter to Eight o'clock, to Thursday next, Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, June 30, 1857.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1<sup>o</sup> Superannuation; Conveyance of Mails by Railways.

BODMIN ELECTION.

WITHDRAWAL OF PETITION.

MR. SPEAKER acquainted the House, that he had this day received a Letter from Messrs. Baxter, Rose, and Norton, as Agents for Henry Dann and Richard Marks, informing him that it is not their intention to proceed with their Petition complaining of an undue Election and Return for the Borough of Bodmin:—Letter read, as follows:—

“3, Park Street, Westminster,
June 29th, 1857.

“SIR,—As Agents for Henry Dann and Richard Marks, in the matter of their Petition delivered in on the 20th day of May last, complaining of an undue Election and Return for the Borough of Bodmin, we hereby beg to inform you that it is not intended to proceed with the said Petition.

“We have the honour to be, Sir,

“Your very obedient Servants,

“BAXTER, ROSE, and NORTON.

“To the Right Honourable The Speaker of the House of Commons.”

MR. WYLD said, that the petition was withdrawn altogether contrary to his wishes. It was a gross libel against his conduct and integrity, and against that of his constituents, which the forms of the House prevented him from punishing. He should, however, at the evening sitting, call the attention of the House to the matter, and ask Mr. Speaker to place the documents connected with it in the hands of witnesses that he might proceed against the parties in the courts of law.

SOUTH-EASTERN RAILWAY (GREENWICH JUNCTION TO DARTFORD, &c.) BILL.

THIRD READING.

Bill as amended, considered.

LORD ALFRED PAGET said, he rose to move that this Bill be ordered to be read a third time. It was not until the previous evening he had ascertained that there was any intention to oppose the measure. A Committee had, for fourteen or fifteen days, sat upon it, and unanimously recommended it to the House. The opposition took them completely by surprise, else the Members of the Committee would be present to defend their decision. Under these circumstances he thought it would be a monstrous thing for the House to set their decision aside by rejecting the Bill.

Motion made and Question proposed, “That the Bill be read the third time.”

SIR EDWARD DERING said, he would move as an Amendment that the Bill be considered that day three months. As a general rule the House ought, he admitted, to abide by the decisions of its Select Committees, unless when those decisions were founded upon erroneous principles, as he thought he could show was the case in this instance. In 1853 the House of Commons sanctioned the formation of a line from Stroud to Dover, thereby connecting the arsenal of Chatham with the most important of the Cinque Ports; and so important did they consider the project, that they dispensed with the Standing Orders in favour of the measure authorizing it, and released £50,000 to enable the East

Kent Company to make the extension from Canterbury to Dover, exacting a pledge from the South-Eastern Company not to interfere in the matter. In consequence of the East Kent Company being so encouraged, the works were undertaken, the tubular bridge put across the Medway at Rochester, and a large portion of the line proceeded with. In 1857 it was discovered that the traffic upon the North Kent line was crowded, of which they had a proof in the lamentable accident which had happened the other day; and hence the application for the present Bill, contrary to the pledge that the South-Eastern Company would not interfere with the East Kent Company in the construction of an independent line, with a terminus in the west end of London. The Bill had no clause authorising the construction of such a terminus; but the Committee in deciding in favour of the South-Eastern Company, had required a pledge that it would come before Parliament next Session for power to construct one. As that was the case, he did not see how it would act as a hardship upon them if the Bill before the House were postponed to next Session, especially as the Committee had decided in its favour, because they considered the construction of the East Kent Company's line would be prejudicial to the South-Eastern Company. In that they had clearly outstepped their province, as he contended that that was a question with which the Committee had nothing to do. It was not for them to say whether there should or should not be competition between the South-Eastern and the East Kent in the face of the principle asserted by Parliament, which had already declared that there should be competing lines between London and Dover totally independent of the South-Eastern Railway. The question which they had had to try was the respective merits of the Bills submitted to their consideration, and they had passed the present Bill though they admitted it to be a bad Bill; for the Chairman himself said, and these were his own words, "that they had come to a decision, he must say rather reluctantly, that they would grant the green (the South-Eastern) line; at the same time he must say that it did not satisfy them in all respects as to what ought to be done for the accommodation of the public." Considering, then, that, by the adoption of this Bill, the whole of the continental through traffic, as well as the whole county of Kent, would be handed over to the South-Eastern Company, that the policy of establishing an independent line would be reversed, he begged to move as an Amendment, that the further consideration of the Bill be postponed to that day three months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the words "That the" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "further Consideration of the Bill, as amended, be adjourned till this day three months," instead thereof.

COLONEL FREESTUN, as the only Member of the Committee, said that they had considered the rival schemes for fifteen days, and after hearing all the evidence had decided in favour of the present Bill. He therefore considered that it would be a flagrant wrong to set aside their decision.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE said, he wished the hon. and gallant Member for Weymouth (Colonel Freestun) had given the House some of the reasons which induced the Committee to come to their decision. He had no doubt all the Members of the Committee were actuated by the best intentions, but they had, he thought, proceeded upon false and mistaken grounds. Indeed, it would appear that the South-Eastern Company were themselves the committee, so completely were their interests attended to. As to the flagrancy of setting aside the decision, what, he asked, would be the use of the House of Commons at all if it were not to control whatever might be done by five or seven Gentlemen above stairs sitting in Committee? The House was told that the Committee had sat for fifteen days, and he verily believed that during that time the Members of it had become completely obfuscated, as they put the public convenience altogether out of the question, and recommended the present Bill in one of the most extraordinary Reports ever presented to the House, the public having been entirely thrust out of sight, whilst the South-Eastern Company was put forward in everything. The Chairman, speaking for the Company, stated that it was with reluctance that they decided as they had done; so that their unanimity was, after all, a reluctant one, and he added that they were not satisfied that it would be for the accommodation of the public, but because they thought the East Kent project would be prejudicial to the interests of the South-Eastern Company they determined to recommend the present Bill to the House. If the House were now upon such a Report to confirm the decision they had arrived at, it would shake the public confidence in Select Committees altogether. He hoped, however, none of the railway directors, one of whom he saw behind him, would vote on the question. As to what they might say upon it, he did not care two straws.

MR. RICH said, he was one of the directors of the South-Eastern Railway, and might be looked upon as having a personal interest. Still he was of opinion that when companies petitioned for powers to carry out any great undertaking, the House had serious and important duties to perform; and one of those duties was, to see that the public weal was first considered. But the public weal could never be properly considered if a total disregard was shown to the interests of the companies which were conducting works that would tend to the promotion of the public weal. ["Oh, oh!"] The hon. Member might cry out "Oh!" at that; but the principle was as clear as the sun at noon-day to every hon. Gentleman who had fairly weighed the rights and privileges of these great companies. The decision to which the Committee had arrived was founded upon the relative merits of the two lines. His hon. Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty had asked the House if they were prepared to hand over the whole county of Kent to the South-Eastern Company in preference to having an independent line. His hon. Friend had shown his bias in favour of his constituents, for it was from Dover that this opposition proceeded; but he would ask his hon. Friend whether he believed that the East Kent Company would give them an independent line? Did he not know as well as that he was then sitting in that House, that the question was one of barter—that the East Kent Company had for years—aye, from the time of its creation, been endeavouring to negotiate the sale of its line to the South-Eastern Company—that, in short, the question had come to this, how much they could screw out of that company? [Sir E. DERING: No!] His hon. Friend did not know. He (Mr. Rich) could show him documents to prove it. If, then, they had obtained the additional line, they would only have had a heavier screw, and been able to insist on a better bargain. [Sir E. DERING: No!] His hon. Friend said "No." He repeated he was ready to show him the papers to prove it. The East Kent Company had been got up by its late deputy chairman, the late Mr. J.

Sadleir, of dishonourable notoriety, and its contractor had failed. Legitimate competition was to be encouraged, but not that got up by interested attorneys, stock-jobbers, and contractors. He, therefore, called upon the House, then, to pause before it determined to throw out a Bill which had received the unanimous approval of its own Committee.

SIR BROOK BRIDGES contended that the East Kent Company had been called into existence by the demand of the nation for a direct line of railway to Dover with a west-end terminus. The public convenience was undoubtedly the first thing to be considered; and it was rather a peculiarity in the present case, that they were engaged in discussion at a moment when, through the wants of the public not being met and satisfied by the South-Eastern Company, one of the most terrible accidents on record had taken place. Ten or twelve lives had been lost within a few hours of the time he was then speaking; and upon what line? Why, upon the very line which the East Kent Company was endeavouring to relieve of some of its over-crowded traffic. Even if the South-Eastern Company carried out their proposed line, the traffic would remain quite as great at the point where that accident had occurred as it was now. The necessity for the East Kent line was also made manifest during the time of the last war, as for military purposes the South-Eastern line was too much exposed to an attack from an enemy. He did not ask the House to give a preference, at this moment, to one line over the other; all he contended for was that the line which did not give the public the security which it had a right to demand should, at all events, be deferred for another year.

SIR BENJAMIN HALL said, that there were times when the House should feel no hesitation in setting aside the decisions of a Committee. He had been twenty-five years a Member of that House, and had never seen such a Report as the one upon the table. If it meant anything it meant that the Committee had been undecided as to the course which they ought to pursue. He was of opinion, therefore, that the Bill should be allowed to stand over for another year, in order that the matter might be reconsidered by the competing companies, and some line presented to Parliament which would satisfy the public at large. He spoke solely on behalf of the public, as it was his duty to do in his official capacity, and in connection with the great improvements which were now going on in the metropolis. According to the Bill the terminus of the line was to be at London Bridge, and everybody knew how over-crowded that was already; whereas the competing line, instead of making a turn to that point, proposed to go to the west-end, and have another terminus on the other side of the water, which would draw away some of the immense traffic which was now concentrated at London Bridge. It was, therefore, better that the Bill should stand over until the next Session, and that Parliament should not allow itself to be dictated to by the great railway companies.

MR. BENTINCK observed, that he agreed with the right hon. Baronet that the House should not sanction the principle that the decisions of the Select Committees were not to be subject to the review of the House. After reading the Report and listening with the utmost attention to the various remarks which had been made, he must say that there appeared to be the strongest possible ground for the postponement of the Bill. Indeed he thought the House would be neglecting its duty if, after the lamentable accident which had just arisen from the over-crowded state of the North Kent line, it did not refrain from sanctioning any other scheme until it had time to consider whether the recurrence of such a catastrophe might not be prevented by the construction of a railway arriving at a different terminus.

MR. GILPIN said, that as a director of the South-Eastern Railway Company, he wished to say a few words in defence of the Report of the Committee, and to assert that if the line now sanctioned by them had been carried out no such accident as they were then deploring would have occurred. It was not necessary for an hon. Member to sit on a Committee in order to have his wits "obfuscated." The language of some of those who had opposed the Bill that day created a presumption that their own minds were in that unfortunate condition.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, competition might be allowed in Kent if it were a large manufacturing district. He had never held a share in the South-Eastern Company, nor did he ever intend to do so, but he lived in a district which that Company amply accommodated, and, therefore, he did not wish to see its powers of providing for the public accommodation crippled, as the setting up of a rival shop would do by drawing away their profits, and preventing them keeping up the number of pointsmen, guards, and other servants whom they at present employed to take care of the public safety. He must also protest against the late accident being used as an argument ad invidiam against the Bill. All the opposition offered to the measure by the people of Dover arose from their eagerness to get to London an hour or two sooner. He did not blame them for that, but this was a poor reason for sanctioning a competition that would ruin both of the rival companies, and disable them from providing for the safety and comfort of the travelling public.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he thought that the interference of the right hon. Baronet the Chief Commissioner of the Board of Works, in his official character, was quite uncalled-for in this matter, and, although he would admit that the House had full power to overrule the decisions of its Committees, yet no single argument had been adduced of sufficient weight in the present instance to induce him to disregard the Report of the Committee, which appeared to have been arrived at after considerable care and investigation. He should, therefore, vote in favour of the original Motion.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, that looking to the public interest he also concurred in the propriety of postponing the Bill until next year.

MR. WATKIN hoped the House would pause before it enunciated the doctrine, that having once given to a particular railway company the privilege of making a line from one point to another, it was prepared to encourage speculators to come forward and depreciate the property of those to whom the country alone looked for the necessary accommodation. It was not the Chief Commissioner of Works or the Secretary of the Admiralty that they must ask for the authoritative opinion of the Government upon a question like the one before the House. If they wanted advice as to railway policy they must turn to the Board of Trade. And where was that Board to-day? Surely if it had considered that there was anything in the Bill that was inimical to the public interests, the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Board of Trade would have been there to tell them what were the bond fide opinions of the Government about the matter. But, so far from that being the case, that Board was not represented in the House on the occasion. A good deal of stress had been laid by the hon. Member for Dover (Mr. B. Osborne) upon certain words which he had read from a paper before him, and which he gave the House to understand was the decision of the Committee—he meant the statement that the Committee had arrived at their decision “rather reluctantly.” Why, there were no such words as these in the whole of their Report. The House had nothing before it of the kind; and it could not be called upon to act on what might have fallen from the Chairman of the Committee, and which had been printed since by hon. Gentlemen opposed to the Bill. He would express his hope that the Resolution of the Committee would be affirmed, as the line which they had recommended was necessary to the convenience as well as the safety of the South-Eastern Company’s traffic. The system of canvassing hon. Members to vote, whether for or against private Bills, which had been resorted to in this instance, was disgraceful.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE remarked, that he thought that there appeared to be some very extraordinary concert and canvassing among the representatives of the Government present, and some misstatements had been made, that the Committee had in their Report stated that they had come to their decision with extreme “reluctance.” Now, the Board of Works might do many great things, but they could not find such a word as “reluctance” in the Report of the Committee. He had never been connected in any way with the railway interest, and having heard no sufficient reason for repudiating the report of the Committee, he should give his vote against the Amendment.

MR. COBBETT said, that the course proposed, of throwing overboard the Report of the Committee without any evidence, was one in accordance with neither law nor justice, and was, he could hardly help thinking, somewhat insulting to the Committee. At all events the House ought not to overrule the decision of the Committee until the hon. Members of the Committee were present to take part in the discussion. He referred more especially to the hon. Chairman who was at present absent at Quarter Sessions.

MR. FITZROY said, that although the question had been discussed for a considerable time, not a single fact or feature had been brought forward to show that the Report of the Committee ought to be rejected. If the present Bill were passed, there was nothing whatever to prevent the East Kent line from bringing forward its own Bill in another Session. That Company had not even thought it necessary for its own protection to petition against this Bill. The East Kent line was to go by St. Mary’s Cray and Bromley, coming into the western part of the Metropolis. The scheme now proposed was to make a branch from Dartford to a point on the Greenwich line, in order to avoid Woolwich and Greenwich, and thereby relieve that portion of the South-Eastern Company’s line on which the late accident had taken place, by avoiding the crowded site of that deplorable occurrence. He would grant that the Committee had stepped out of the usual course in presenting such a Report; but the House must have something more practical—must have proof that upon the merits of the question the line ought to be rejected—before it resolved on adopting the Amendment of the hon. Baronet the Member for Kent.

THE EARL OF MARCH remarked, that he also must complain of the conduct of the hon. Member the Secretary of the Admiralty, in imputing motives to the Committee.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE denied that he had imputed motives. He only said that they might have been “obfuscated” by the heat of the weather.

THE EARL OF MARCH proceeded: as he had not heard any grounds for rejecting the Report, he should vote against the Amendment.

FINSBURY PARK (No. 2) BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate upon Amendment proposed to be made to Question [23rd June], “That the Bill be now read a second time;” and which Amendment was, to leave out the word “now,” and at the end of the Question to add the words “upon this day six months.”

MR. COX said, the Metropolitan Board of Works had accepted the Vote of the House, on the last occasion this Bill was discussed, as a refusal to grant the £50,000 towards the construction of the park; but that the Board had, nevertheless, determined to proceed with the Bill, and to tax the whole of the metropolis for the expenses. He hoped, therefore, that as the present Bill had nothing in it respecting the grant of the £50,000, the hon. Member for Lambeth (Mr. Williams) would withdraw his opposition.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that the feeling of the House appeared to be decidedly against the grant of public money for Finsbury Park. Under present circumstances, however, he would ask leave to withdraw his Amendment.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, he was glad the matter had been so arranged, but he would take the liberty of suggesting that in the case of these improvement Bills a graduated scale of taxation might be adopted, so that those parts of the metropolis which received the greatest benefit should bear the larger amount of the burden.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY (IRELAND) BILL—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

Clause 153.

MR. BLAND suggested that a clause should be introduced to the effect that where an insolvent Joint-stock Company was to be wound up, if proceedings were first taken in the Court of Chancery, other proceedings which might be taken in the Court of Bankruptcy should cease after the appointment of assignees until the proceedings in the Court of Chancery were concluded; and, on the other hand, if proceedings were first taken in the Court of Bankruptcy, proceedings in the Court of Chancery should not be taken until those in the Court of Bankruptcy were concluded.

MR. VANCE agreed that insolvent companies should be wound up by one tribunal, and he thought the best was the Bankruptcy Court.

Clause agreed to; as were clauses up to Clause 160, inclusive.

Clause 161.

MR. BLAND proposed to strike out certain words, and to insert the following:—

Mr. Cox

“No action, suit, or other proceeding, shall be taken by any creditor of a company without leave first had and obtained.”

An act of bankruptcy committed by a Joint-stock Company ought to have the same effect as a bankruptcy of partners, and the right of the creditors to sue individual shareholders should be limited. The ruinous consequences of the opposite principle had been painfully exemplified in the case of the Royal British Bank.

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD said, he preferred striking out the clause altogether, and introducing another clause on the Report restricting the right of a creditor, in a case of bankruptcy, to sue any member of a Joint-stock Company without leave of the Court, but at the same time giving the Court certain powers to prevent a shareholder from either removing his person out of its jurisdiction pending an inquiry in bankruptcy or parting with his property. He hoped, therefore, his hon. Friend would not press his Amendment, but allow the clause to be struck out.

MR. BLAND withdrew his Amendment.

Clause struck out.

Clauses 162 to 346 agreed to.

MR. VANCE said, he proposed to strike out the “arrangement” clauses, extending from Clause 347 to 357, both inclusive. He much preferred the “arrangement by deed” clauses, which were contained in the English Act. The clauses to which he objected, though always extant in the Irish Bankruptcy Act, had never been brought into operation, owing to the great dislike entertained of them by the mercantile community, and the privacy with which the whole matter would be conducted under them. He had placed on the paper an Amendment to expunge them; but in the present state of the benches—(there were seven hon. Members in the House, of whom three were English and the rest Irish)—he would not press the Amendment.

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD said, it was perfectly true that the arrangement clauses in the Irish Act had not worked, only six petitions altogether having been presented under them. The reason was that there were so many difficulties and technicalities in the way that it was found impracticable to work them; and the clauses as they stood in the Bill would simplify the proceedings, at the same time that they would preserve the safeguards which prevented fraud.

Amendment withdrawn.

Remaining clauses agreed to.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered on Monday next.

REGISTRATION OF TITLES.

QUESTION.

MR. GREER said, he would beg to ask the Attorney General, whether he proposes to introduce a Bill during the present or the next Session of Parliament, for the Registration of Titles to Property in Land; and whether any such Bill will be in accordance with the Report of the Commissioners appointed to consider that subject, which has lately been submitted to Parliament; and also, whether provision will be made for continuing the benefit of a Parliamentary Title to purchasers from the Incumbered Estates Court in Ireland, and for adopting the maps of the Ordnance Survey, now completed in that country, as an index to the register of titles in Ireland?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that the Report of the Commissioners appointed to consider the subject of the Registration of Titles to Property in Land was not presented to Her Majesty until, he believed, four or five weeks ago. It was thought desirable that that Report should be circulated, and that the criticisms of the profession thereon should be obtained, before any steps were taken to embody the recommendations of the Commissioners in a Bill. If he had seen the probability of passing a measure of such great importance during the present Session, he should have been more eager to bring the subject before the House. He trusted, however, that there would still be time to bring in a Bill before Parliament was prorogued, not with any belief that it could be adequately discussed during the remainder of the Session, but merely that it should lie on the table for consideration until next year, when it would be formally presented to this House. The measure would be in accordance with the Report of the Commissioners.

MUTINY IN INDIA—QUESTION.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he would beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty, whether it is true that previous to the intelligence of the late disaster in India reaching this country, the East India Company had applied to the Admiralty for transports to take out troops, and that that application had been refused?

He also wished to know, whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to send out reinforcements in sailing vessels, or in steam vessels belonging to the navy, which at present were lying idle.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, it was not true that any application had been made by the East India Company for transports, and consequently it was not true that any such application had been refused. It was not the intention of Her Majesty's Government to send out Queen's vessels with the reinforcements, as hired vessels were more speedily prepared for the conveyance of large bodies of troops.

BODMIN ELECTION.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. WYLD stated that, inasmuch as the House did not seem disposed to give proper protection to the character of its Members, it would be his duty, at another time and in another place, to avail himself of the ordinary forms of law in order to clear his own character, and that of his constituents, from the stains which had been cast upon them by a certain election petition.

THE BALLOT—LEAVE.

MR. H. BERKELEY said, he rose to ask leave to introduce a Bill to cause the votes of the Parliamentary electors of Great Britain and Ireland to be taken by way of ballot. He knew not how this Motion might be met to-night; he knew that the noble Lord at the head of Her Majesty's Government was absent; but he knew, likewise, that that noble Lord had said to many hon. Members, some of whom desired to bring forward measures of electoral reform, "Wait, for I have a Reform Bill. Lo, it looms in the distance! Behold, it is a great Reform Bill; and it shall, like Aaron's rod, which devoured up all the other rods, devour all your smaller measures of Reform." Hon. Members, accordingly, had waited for that event. Now, those who advocated the ballot had not the least objection to wait, but they had an objection to do so without knowing what they were to wait for. They objected to seeing Her Majesty's faithful Commons treated somewhat after a nursery fashion—to be told that "they must open their mouths and shut their eyes, and see what the noble Lord would send them." He repeated that they were willing to wait;

but in order that they might know what they were waiting for he begged to propose a question to the occupants of the Treasury Bench. He saw two hon. Members opposite who were probably the noble Lord's locum tenentes this evening, so he begged to ask them this specific question, "Is it the intention of Her Majesty's Government to adopt the ballot as part of the Reform Bill next Session?" That was a very plain and straightforward question, and he trusted that he might have a plain and a straightforward answer, without any of those little flowers of diplomacy which were generally sprinkled upon Ministerial replies. If this question were answered in the affirmative he had nothing to do but to sit down, and he thought the cheer with which such an announcement would be received in that House would be echoed from every part of England. If, however, on the contrary, the answer was in the negative, then he had simply to lay his case in the best form he could before the House. He now paused for a reply—

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, If my hon. Friend is really serious in asking—but then resumed his seat.

MR. H. BERKELEY presumed, after the little preliminary flourish of the right hon. Gentleman that the answer he had to give could not be plain "Yes," or "No." He supposed, then, that in default of such an answer from the right hon. Gentleman, he must take it for granted that silence meant dissent. It was not, he presumed, the intention of the Government to adopt the ballot in their Reform Bill of next year. He thought, then, that he was perfectly justified in bringing this important question before the House to-night, and he trusted that he should not be met with the objection of, "Why did you not wait? Why did you not do as other hon. Members have done and postpone your Motion?" He should not upon this occasion urge any additional arguments in support of his Motion, but he should content himself with taking the objections which had been last put upon record by hon. Members and he should endeavour to give some reply to them. Nothing could be more beautiful in theory than our electoral system, and nothing could be more hideous in practice. It was perverted, it was disorganized, and all that the promoters of the ballot sought to do was to re-establish it upon a proper basis. The advocates of the ballot were not now put on the proof of the failure of our electoral system, for that was plain, palpable, and indisputable. An elector was appointed to do a simple duty—to vote as he pleased, freely and indifferently; but he could not do that by voting in public, and "Therefore," said the supporters of this Motion, "let him vote in secret." That would seem to be a very simple proposition, yet it was met with the most strenuous opposition, and the governing body refused to protect people at the polling-booth from those malign influences which beset them and which gave so many seats to a favoured class in that House: they would go any length, and would assent to any measure of reform rather than that. One of the best writers on the ballot had justly said that—

"The aristocracy or governing classes of this country would rather yield universal suffrage, and retain the control which open voting gives them at elections, than the most moderate extension of the franchise with the ballot."

He (Mr. Berkeley) believed that to be the case, and he warned the country to beware of that spurious liberality which would extend the suffrage but refuse the ballot, because he believed that the alleged desire for an extension of the suffrage was frequently only a pretence to get rid of the ballot. He had always maintained that the ballot was the alpha of all Parliamentary reform, and he asserted that if they would only give the elector protection at the polling booth, they would soon be able to run through the entire alphabet of reform down to its omega. It was said that there was a very general agreement in favour of the extension of the suffrage. Now, he would endeavour to grapple with and to show the fallacy of the speeches of some hon. Gentlemen on the hustings who had attacked the ballot and had at the same time given in their adhesion to that extension. He had before him an extract from The Times of April last, which contained the report of a speech made by Mr. Disraeli at Aylesbury. The great talent of the right hon. Gentleman, his eloquence, his powers of reasoning, and the high position which he held in that House must render every word that he said upon that subject as important as it was interesting. Well, Mr. Disraeli started with this proposition,—“That everybody must agree that the ballot, without an extension of the suffrage, was an impossibility.” Now, he (Mr. Berkeley) was an humble individual in comparison with the right hon. Gentleman, but he most peremptorily denied that proposition, and he asserted that he was backed and supported in his denial by some of the first authorities, both of the past and of the present day. Such, for example, had not been the opinion of Lord Durham, who was in favour of a very great extension of the suffrage; such had not been the opinion of Mr. Charles Buller, who was also in favour of a great extension of the suffrage; and such had not been, and was not now, the opinion of Mr. George Grote, who also supported an extended franchise. He (Mr. Berkeley) went as far as Lord Durham did touching the extension of the franchise. He believed a very great extension to be necessary, but he was of opinion that the elector, whatever his franchise might be, had a right to demand of the Legislature which enjoined upon him the performance of a certain duty that he should have adequate and full protection afforded him in the discharge of that duty; and he contended that they had no right to impose any duty upon an individual by law without effectually guarding that individual in the performance of such duty. He next came to an equally bold, and, as he thought, equally incorrect assertion by the right hon. Gentleman, "that the vote by ballot would be an intolerable tyranny over the non-electors." In attempting to refute these fallacies, which were, of course, admirably put forward by the right hon. Gentleman, all their weak parts being carefully concealed by most excellent words, it was necessary that they should look to first principles. Now, the laws carrying out the intention of what was called the representative constitution of this country had defined the qualification of an elector; and his duty was also defined with equal clearness—it was to select and to vote for such candidate as he might think proper without fear of punishment, without hope of reward. Nobody, therefore, had a right to question his vote, or to visit him with after consequences. He (Mr. Berkeley) was strongly of opinion that they could not contravene that self-evident proposition, but if he wished to strengthen himself in the eyes of the House, he would call into court the late Sir Robert Peel, who said upon this subject:—

"To whom is the constituent body responsible? Is there any responsibility of any conceivable kind, except the responsibility to God, to their own consciences, and to an enlightened deliberate public opinion?"

That was the opinion of the late Sir Robert Peel, and upon it he (Mr. Berkeley) was prepared to take his stand. Since, then, the elector had the undoubted privilege of voting as he might think proper, for what purpose was open voting required? For what purpose did they want a record to be kept against every man of how he voted? What were they to gain by it according to the electoral principles of our constitution? Was there any conceivable thing which they could gain by open voting which was fair, honest, and above-board? Did open voting afford any test of an elector's having sold his vote or of his having been intimidated? Did it afford any means of punishing a corrupt elector which secret voting did not equally confer? He said that it did not, for he would undertake to prove that a conviction for bribery would be as attainable, if it took place, under secret voting as under open voting. Indeed, he should be very sorry to bring in a Bill for the adoption of the ballot into that House if he thought it would screen bribery. He would define open voting as the ratification of a treaty between dishonest men; while secret voting was the prevention of the ratification of that treaty, because it compelled one scoundrel to depend upon the word of another. In open voting the poll-book was the record by which the intimidator convicted and crushed his victims. The knowledge that that record was kept against the electors induced thousands of men fully competent to be electors to refuse to be placed on the register. The knowledge of the existence of that record compelled thousands of men who were electors to refuse to go to the poll; and the knowledge of the existence of that record also compelled tens of thousands of our countrymen to go to the poll, there to falsify their consciences and to tell a lie, to the great detriment of their country, and in the face of their God; or, to use perhaps the better phraseology of that brilliantly-written paper—The Examiner—it compelled the electors to go to the poll, there to tell a lie and to send the incarnation of that lie to Parliament. Mr. Disraeli told the Buckinghamshire farmers that to allow the electors to vote in secret—and that he (Mr. Berkeley) contended was to vote without intimidation as enjoined by law—would be intolerable tyranny upon the non-electors. Now, this was assuming covertly that which no hon. Member, however audacious, dared to assume openly in that House—namely, that there was a body of men in this country under whose control the electors ought to be. It meant that or nothing. When it was said that electors would turn tyrants over the non-electors if this secret voting was given them, that might be an argument for universal suffrage, but it was no argument whatever against the ballot. It was an argument for universal suffrage, because if the non-electors were to have the power to control the electors, why make tyrants of them—why not rather give them the franchise? He did not think that that could be got out of. Mr. Disraeli, of the manor of Hughenden, in the county of Buckingham, could vote for whom he pleased—he was perfectly independent of everybody; but John Brown, of High Wycombe, was not independent enough to go against his tyrant. John Brown, therefore, naturally turned to Mr. Disraeli and said, “You are a man of great importance in the House of Commons—an ex-Minister and a Privy Councillor; assist an humble man like me, and free me from my tyrant.” “Go away, John Brown, go away,” the right hon. Gentleman would say; “you would become a tyrant and bully, and tyrannize over the tyrant you have, if you were allowed the only remedy against the grievance of which you complain.” John Brown naturally said, “Good Heavens! what a position to place me in! You recollect, Sir, the time when you stood for High Wycombe and told us that we were suffering under unparalleled tyranny, and were subject to little knots of tyrants, and now when I bring the facts before you you say, ‘John Brown, I shall no longer assist you.’” The right hon. Gentleman, or any other hon. Gentleman, had a right to change his opinion, but he could not change facts, and could not help being a witness as to the terrorism which prevailed, and as to petty tyrants who existed, and whom he desired to put down. Consequently, however much the right hon. Gentleman might choose to change his mind, the right hon. Gentleman was a witness still on the side of those who advocated the ballot, and he thought there was no possibility of the right hon. Gentleman showing how the non-electors became tyrants by the simple fulfilment of that which the law enjoined. Now, he found that during the last Middlesex election a noble Friend of his indulged in what he considered an unconstitutional maxim. He found that Lord Robert Grosvenor said that the electors ought to be responsible for the discharge of their duty. To whom, he asked, were the electors to be responsible but to God, their own consciences, and to an intelligent deliberate public opinion? [Lord Robert Grosvenor: Hear, hear!] He was glad to hear his noble Friend cheer him, but his noble Friend seemed to have fallen into the delusion which the noble Lord the Member for London indulged in. It appeared that the noble Lord thought that an intelligent, deliberate public opinion could only exist under open voting. There he joined issue with the noble Lord. He maintained that it could not exist under open voting, but only under secret voting. As his noble Friend had treated him with that good-natured ironical cheer, let him ask his noble Friend to consider what effect public opinion had on the mind of a man under secret voting, and what effect it had under open voting. With the ballot the elector could carefully weigh the opinions of public men, the merits of great public measures, and the arguments in the public press, and then, after getting the best information he could, and deliberating upon it, he went to the poll and gave a conscientious vote in secret. Now, take the case of open voting. Under that system of what use was public opinion to the 500 dependents of my Lord This or That? The press might write by the yard, public men might talk by the hour; all that could make no practical impression on their minds, for when they went to the poll our great national engine, the screw, was at work, and they could not vote but as their landlords commanded! It was the same all through the country wherever men were placed in the power of others. Take the case of any set of men—the workmen at the mills, for instance. Of what use was public opinion to them? They were not called on to form their opinions by public opinion, but by the wills of their masters, and nothing could be easier than to give an illustration of this by referring to any great question of reform. Let them take the abolition of the corn laws, for instance. How long was that abolition postponed because the electors dared not carry out public opinion at the polling-booths? How long was public opinion set in for the abolition of the corn laws before it was accorded? How long did public opinion notoriously wage war against the corn laws in vain?—until at length something very like a great and powerful conspiracy was called into existence to overcome the duress put on the electors; and that it was which was the cause of the abolition of the corn laws. Two very eminent men, acknowledged to be authorities on the question of the corn laws, Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright, had often declared that if the electors had had the ballot they would have stood by public opinion, which was with the non-electors, and the corn laws would have been abolished fully thirty years before they were. He had now attempted to answer some of the latest arguments against the ballot. The usual mode of attack had been by guesses and surmises. When Gentlemen had nothing practical to offer in defence of open voting they had recourse to guesses and surmises, prophesying that such and such things would happen if protective voting were adopted. But if the House turned to examples it would see that where the ballot existed the best results had followed. Hon. Members might take Hansard, and look through it from one end to the other, and they would find no instances in the speeches against the ballot of the failure of the ballot wherever it had been established. In England the ballot was perfectly successful. Whoever heard of the ballot failing in England? Whoever heard of it failing at the clubs? It procured safety for those who voted under it, and preserved the peace, and the election made by secret ballot was correct and true. He found the same was the case in all other countries. It was so in Holland. There the ballot acted peculiarly well; and so it did in Belgium. It might be said, perhaps, that the priests in Belgium exercised an influence over the electors. That was an evil which could not be coped with. If a body of men submitted their consciences to another body of men that could not be helped, but so long as men were enabled to vote according to their will, that was all that could be attained. In Sardinia the ballot was regarded as the keystone of liberty. Many hon. Members—and probably the noble Lord the Member for the City of London (Lord J. Russell)—might be acquainted with Signor Valerio, one of the senators of the Sardinian Chamber of Deputies, who had expressed his opinion that “without the ballot the Legislature (of Sardinia) would be returned by the aristocracy, the bishops, and the priests.” This country had received a somewhat useful lesson with regard to the conduct and equipment of an army in the field from little Sardinia, and he thought that with respect to civil government it might also learn a lesson from the absence of intimidation on the part of the priests and aristocracy at the Sardinian elections. He (Mr. Berkeley) would ask the House to compare the absence of intimidation in Sardinia with the intimidation exercised by the priests and aristocracy in this country. In America the ballot was perfectly successful in all States where due attention had been paid to the secrecy of the voting. In all those States where intimidation or corruption had crept in, it was found to be the result of a loose mode of balloting, but wherever the strict secrecy of the ballot had been maintained, it had been attended with the best effects. He had on former occasions brought the case of America before the House at such length that he would not now have said anything more on the subject but for a paragraph in The Times which was very likely to be quoted, as anything which was supposed to tell against the ballot was eagerly snatched at. That paragraph appeared under the pompous heading—“An Election Contrast.” Now, a residence of many years in America, and a knowledge of the national character of the people of that country, led him to doubt whether this paragraph had been written by an American. The paragraph commenced by assuring its readers that the London Times was the proper authority with regard to the English representative system, and the writer then proceeded to draw a comparison between the mode of election in England and the mode of election in America, declaring his preference for the English system. He (Mr. Berkeley) certainly thought, with regard to America, that, considering the system of centralization which prevailed there, the secret committees, the absence of the candidates from the electors, the wheels within wheels which existed, and the general complexity of the system, the ballot worked infinitely better in other countries than in the United States. He might instance Sardinia, and the Canadian and Australian colonies of Great Britain. But when he found a writer in an American paper thus asserting the superiority of the English system over the American system of ballot, he would not believe the author was an American, for he would evidently prefer a legitimate and anointed King to an elected President, and there were not ten men from Maine to Alabama who would frank such an opinion. One fact was worth any amount of speculation on a subject of this nature, and he might therefore inform the House that no State in America which had originally commenced with the ballot had ever changed it for open voting, while those States in which open voting was originally established had gone over one by one to the system of ballot, with the exception of two slave States, and one of those States (Virginia) had at the last election rendered itself infamous, for the voters who went to record their votes openly for Colonel Fremont were attacked, hunted, and obliged to fly for their lives. It happened that an American gentleman of great respectability, an advocate of New York, Mr. Compton Williams, had lately visited this country, and had very kindly given his opinions touching the American system of election to a society with which he (Mr. Berkeley) was connected, the Ballot Society. At the request of that society Mr. Williams attended a public meeting at Haverfordwest, his ancestors having been Welshmen, where he expressed opinions some of which he (Mr. Berkeley) begged permission to quote. That gentleman said that in his own country he had never heard any expression of hostility to the ballot, or of a desire to resort to such a viva voce system of voting as existed in England. In his own State, New York, the only mode of voting was by ballot. All the electors were furnished with slips of paper stating the number of representatives to be elected, and these slips, which were called "the ballots," were either printed or written. It was unnecessary for a voter to make a candidate an enemy by telling him he would vote against him, for the ballot afforded protection to the elector. He (Mr. Williams) expressed his surprise to find that unsuccessful attempts had been made in England for twenty-five years to obtain the ballot. The object sought to be secured in America was, that the elector should vote for himself, and not somebody else for him, and that object was effectually secured by the ballot. He regretted to be obliged to admit, however, that intimidation and bribery were not totally unknown to America. There were in that country great political combinations; there were political captains of tens, and fifties, and hundreds, who boasted that they could compel their followers to vote as they pleased; but those were mere words, for they had no power to control the votes of the electors. The votes were secret, and although electors might give promises, it could not be known whether those promises were fulfilled or not. It was, therefore, perfectly useless to extort such promises. He had heard it said that men might watch the box, and see how their tenants and employés voted; but he defied them to do so successfully. It was, for example, exceedingly important to know how the State of Maine voted, for that gave the cue to the elections generally; and last "fall," the Democrats were determined to expend their whole strength on that State, with the view to insure the return of their party. They had also made arrangements to have the news of the election in the State of Maine sent by telegraph to New York, and, on the receipt of it, 50,000 men were ready to form a procession in that city in honour of the victory; but when the telegraphic message arrived in New York, it stated that the Republicans had gained the election in the State of Maine by nearly two to one against the Democrats, and that result (Mr. Williams said) was entirely due to the ballot! He (Mr. Berkeley) would now call the most serious attention of the House to Her Majesty's Australian dominions. There the ballot was adopted as the law of the colony of Victoria. It had been tested there, and, as a necessary consequence, the result had been, that all the evils which sprang up under the system of open voting—intimidation, violence, and corruption—had received their death blow. He would crave the permission of the House just to draw a comparison. Let him lay before them a sketch of some of the proceedings at our late general election in England under open voting, and then a brief sketch of the elections in Australia with the ballot. Having done that, he would then simply ask the House to "look on this picture, and on that." The general election in 1852 was a regular old Whig and Tory fight; but the election of 1857, though less of a party struggle, presented the same appalling features of the malversation of the franchise through open voting. And first, he would speak of intimidation, which he had always said was the great malady of our electoral system. Look to the counties. There political freedom was a perfect farce. To make this plain, he would refer the House to the mode of registration. They all knew that, in the counties, their registration agents simply divided the great mass of the electors into classes, according to the political views of the landlords. On the one side the agent put A. B. on the register under the class of "yellow," because he was a tenant of Lord So-and-So, or Squire This-or-That; and, on the other he took C. D. off the register because he was a tenant of Lord T'other-thing. The feelings of the elector were never for a moment regarded. He was simply treated in the matter as the tenant of So-and-So; and it was well known that, in counties, it was thought a want of etiquette for one landlord to canvass the tenantry of another. That, in fact, had led to duels on more than one occasion in the old times: but now, when people were a little more peaceably disposed, it ended in a "cut;" and yet out came the county gentlemen at an election with a flowing placard addressed to "the free and independent electors." "Free" to do what? Not to vote as they pleased; but "free" to go to the poll, and "free" to be turned out of their farms if they did not vote at the bidding of their landlord. When Sir Henry Ward brought forward this question, he cited the case of an estate which had changed hands three times in a very few years. It first belonged to a Tory, then to a Whig, and then to a Tory again; and, at every election during that time, the tenantry upon it invariably voted in accordance with the politics of the landlord for the time being. Again, in Lanarkshire, during the life of the late Duke of Hamilton, who was a Whig, his tenantry there always voted for a Whig; but when the present Duke, who was a Tory, succeeded to the title, they turned round, and voted for the Tory candidate at every election. In Sussex, too, it was well known that the Cowderay property always returned the Member for Midhurst. He (Mr. Berkeley) had before him a specimen or two of the extent to which intimidation flourished in the counties. In The Times of the 20th of April last, there appeared a memorial addressed by the Londonderry tenantry of the Marquess of Waterford to his Lordship, in reference to the then forthcoming election for the county, together with the reply of the noble Marquess, which he would read to the House. Let the House remember that the memorialists belonged to a class of gallant men who, as the late war abundantly proved, were ready to die on the hill side, and shed the last drop of their blood for their country. The petitioners say:—

"That they are inclined to believe your Lordship is warmly attached to the tenantry on your Lordship's estate, and that you respect their feelings and conscientious convictions; that, acting under that belief, they respectfully approach your Lordship to request you will be graciously pleased to permit them, at the approaching general election, to record their votes according to the dictates of their consciences; and that you will give directions to your agent and representative here to protect them in the religious and faithful exercise of their electoral rights. Several landlords in this county have already done so. This favour being so reasonable a request on their part, your tenants do not anticipate a refusal, and have nominated Messrs., &c., a deputation to wait on your Lordship, and they, as in duty bound, will ever pray."

What was the answer to that communication?

"Ashbrook, April 3.

"Sir—I am directed by the Marquess of Waterford to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, together with a Memorial from some of his tenants in this county, and to say that he would wish them to vote for Mr. Clark and Sir H. Bruce at the coming election. Yours faithfully,

"J. B. BERESFORD.

"Rev. N. M. Brown."

He (Mr. Berkeley) supposed that if the noble Marquess had not been pleased to be sweetly tempered they would have had a still rougher reception. He would now, by way of antithesis, present an extract from the speech of a great landlord in this country, and an hon. Member of that House, which formed a pleasing contrast to the document he had just read. Mr. Robartes, in the course of an address to his constituents of Cornwall at the last election, called on them to reflect on the position of a poor but honest voter who was compelled to vote against his political convictions; and he (Mr. Robartes) declared that, putting himself in the position of such a man, if he were asked if he desired to have the franchise, he would rather be without it if he was to hold it on the understanding that he was to vote in opposition to his conscience. He further said he should like to see the ballot to-morrow, because he should then feel more at liberty to speak to his tenants on political subjects, and to try to win them over to his own convictions. He was afraid to do so now, because if he spoke strongly there was always an idea that some unfair means would be used to compel them to vote in a particular way. He should therefore continue as before, to support the Motion of the hon. Member for Bristol. A more noble specimen of the conduct of an English gentleman was not to be found. That man need never fear the ballot. His sentiments were founded upon the sentiments of one of the finest characters ever drawn by Steele and Addison—Sir Roger de Coverley. The old knight said, "I love to enjoy my own opinion, and consequently I never constrain the opinions of those who depend upon me." In The Tablet of May 15, under the head of "Freedom of Election in Ulster," he found a statement that twenty tenants of the Marquess of Hertford had received notices to quit on account of their votes at the Lisburn election. He found in a Woolwich paper a paragraph having reference to the election preceding the last for West Kent, in which it was stated that a holy man of the Church of England who resided in Essex, but had property in Kent, having intelligence that a tenant was about to vote for Mr. Martin, despatched to him this letter—

"I hope in a few days to fix the time for coming down to receive the rent. The object of the present letter is the West Kent election. I hope you are, like myself, a good Conservative, and will vote for Sir Walter Riddell at the approaching election. Landlord and tenant should always vote upon the same side, and if we proceed to a new lease that will be one of my stipulations."

The rev. gentleman had strange ideas of the rights of conscience. The paper stated that the "screw" would not work, and that the tenant retained his independence. Another instance of intimidation had been the subject of legal proceedings under the Corrupt Practices Act in the case of "Queen v. Barnwell," and that was a failure. The House would do him the justice to recollect that he had lifted his voice against the Corrupt Practices Act, and that he had branded it as a disgraceful specimen of insincerity. It was enacted for the benefit of candidates, and not for the interests of electors. The legal expenses were carefully cut down and the illegal expenses were left untouched. The cases which could be specified were cases of unsuccessful intimidation, and they were few in comparison with those which, being successful, passed unknown. In South Wiltshire a noble Lord contested the county against the present hon. Member, and he was celebrated by a county poet in heroic verse—

"Without a fault, and with lots of tin,

The best of the three is Lord Henry Thynne."

He did not know how such a man could fail to win an election, but tin, like virtue, did not always meet with its reward, and Lord Henry Thynne did fail, and in his parting address attributed his failure to intimidation, or what was commonly called "the screw." At South Northamptonshire, Lord Althorp was charged by Mr. Carter with intimidation, and he retorted by making the same charge against the other side. In Cumberland, threats were made of publishing the pollbook, and in Bedfordshire it was actually done, in the form of a newspaper supplement. In West Sussex there was no opposition to the return of Lord March and Captain Wyndham, and both hon. Members inveighed against the ballot. The gallant Captain said that the non-electors had as much right to know how the electors voted as the electors had to know how he voted. But the non-electors had not to control, to reward, and to punish the electors, as the electors had to control, to reward, and to punish their representative. If a Member of Parliament voted in secret it destroyed the very essence of the representative principle. He left the gallant Captain to reconcile his view with that of Mr. Burke, who said, "The House of Commons never could control the functions of Government, unless the Members themselves were controlled by their constituents." Lord March took up the old song, and said the ballot was unmanly and un-English. Within a very few weeks, however, both he and his noble Father, the Duke of Richmond, gave a notable example of the difference between practice and precept. It chanced that a chief constable had to be elected. In the western division of Sussex eight out of nine members voted against the ballot. It was understood that the votes in that division for the constable were not to be taken openly. Everybody supposed that the Duke of Richmond would have appeared with the ballot-box of the Conservative Club under his arm; but his Grace, to avoid countenancing the ballot, hit upon a most ingenious expedient. He appeared with an old hat and a pack of cards. He deposited the old hat in a corner, and dealt out the cards. The magistrates put the names of the candidate on the cards, and deposited the cards in his Grace's hat. What was the difference between voting by ballot and voting in an old hat? Why should the one be called unmanly, un-English, and cowardly, and the other brave, manly, and British? He could see no difference between the two things. He called both voting by ballot; at all events, the mode adopted by the Duke of Richmond carried out the principle, if not the letter, of the system of voting, which he wanted the House to sanction by its approval. So much, then, for the elections in counties. With regard to the boroughs, the Committees now sitting upstairs would show the scenes that were enacted at the last elections. Those precious disclosures the House would have an opportunity of considering, and he trusted it would lay them to heart. He had stated that in 1832 Mr. Disraeli spoke of an intolerable terrorism as then prevailing. That system produced a terror of two kinds—in the first place, a terror of ruin; and in the next, a physical terror of loss of life or mutilation. Of the latter, he had an admirable example before him in the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Board of Trade, and he could not help saying that it was a very hard case when candidates were compelled to look for the protection of their brains to the thickness of their skulls. The broad handkerchief of The Times was now waving in the air, still wet with tears for the right hon. Gentleman. That journal not only mourned for him, but actually embalmed his broken head in three or four leading articles. How came it, he asked, that The Times did not look to the other cases of violence that occurred during the last elections? The treatment received by the right hon. Gentleman was bad enough, and much to be deprecated; but why did not The Times direct its attention to those cases of violence that took place in Ireland? Not a word was said about them; but the right hon. Gentleman, somehow or other, enjoyed the favour of The Times, and all its sympathy was reserved for him. He thought that his noble Friend the Member for the City of London was a good deal to blame for the acts of violence and intimidation that disgraced the recent elections. In more than one part of the country the noble Lord had been cited as a great authority under whom those who committed the violence had acted. The noble Lord had told the people over and over again that the elective franchise was a trust. [Lord John RUSSELL: Hear!] He very much doubted the soundness of that proposition, because if an elector discharged his duty by voting for whom he pleased without let or hindrance, he defied the noble Lord to show him in what the breach of trust consisted. Supposing, however, that the franchise was a trust, that argument told as much in favour of the Ballot as against it. But what he wished to say was, that the noble Lord was responsible for much of the violence perpetrated at elections. Two or three Sessions ago he brought forward the case of the Cork election, at which the supporters of a gallant Friend of his, General Chatterton, were brutally used, although he admitted that the two representatives of Cork were hon. Gentlemen of the highest respectability, who would be the first to set their faces against such violence. Nevertheless some disgraceful things were done, and, according to the evidence, they were instigated by the priests, who said to the people, "Lord John Russell tells you that the elective franchise is a trust; now, boys, all who vote for Chatterton are guilty of a breach of trust." If such arguments were addressed to ignorance or malignity there could be no mistake as to the result, for a mob was not able to discriminate between what the noble Lord really meant and what they believed him to say. He held in his hand a polling-book, got up by a society of non-electors, in Rochdale, with a view to exclusive dealing, and a more complete instrument of tyranny he never saw. The electors were designated under their various trades or crafts, the supporters of Sir Alexander Ramsay being distinguished from those of Mr. Miall, and, although there could be no doubt that the book had been got up against the former, he was sure that Mr. Miall would scout the very idea of such a publication, for a man more fond of liberty and of freedom of voting in elections did not live. Here, again, the noble Lord the Member for the City was cited as an authority for these shameful and tyrannical proceedings. "The theory of the present representative system," said the compilers of the Rochdale polling-book, "according to a great constitutional authority—Lord John Russell—is that £10 householders hold their votes in trust for the class who do not possess that property qualification, as well as in their own right, and this vindicates the practice of publishing a list of the voter's names." If the doctrine that the election franchise was a trust, bore such fruit as this, the sooner they got rid of it the better. He would not trouble the House with any more details regarding the violence and intimidation perpetrated at the last elections. The scenes that occurred at Drogheda, at Lisburne, in Galway, and in other parts of Ireland were perfectly shocking, and it was very interesting to read the truthful accounts given by the reporters of the malversation of the franchise, and compare them with the mendacious statements of interested parties. But, instead of dwelling upon the Irish elections, he would proceed to reverse the picture and direct the attention of the House to the elections which recently took place in the colony of Victoria. The establishment of the ballot in Australia was mainly due to the exertions and ability of Mr. Nicholson, the member for North Burke in that colony, and, though opposed by the same arguments as in this country, the system had operated in the most satisfactory manner. He would not quote paragraphs from the Australian newspapers which he had before him, but would merely refer to a compendium of them contained in a speech delivered by Mr. Nicholson, in which that gentleman, referring to the recent elections in that colony, showed that in no case had there been any violence or disturbance, and stated that the ballot had imposed a decided and welcome check on the noisy and turbulent demonstrations which had hitherto been inseparable from a contested election. In addition to the tranquillity with which they had been conducted, these elections had been characterized by great completeness of polls—a fact which was an answer to the objection that in this country it was not from terror, but from apathy, that persons abstained from voting. Hitherto the Australian elections had exhibited the same paucity of voters compared with the number of electors that was to be found in England; but at the last election the number of voters polled in some of the districts was within one or two of the whole number upon the register. The expenses, too, had been greatly diminished; and such had been the effect produced, that many of those who were formerly opposed to the ballot were now to be found in the ranks of its supporters. Among others, the Attorney General, who before the election was particularly hostile to the ballot, had announced his determination in future to support that mode of election. Sincerely thanking hon. Gentlemen for the attention which they had given him while he brought before them these details, without which he could not establish his case, he submitted that he had now proved to the House by facts that wherever the ballot had been tried it had been productive of none but the happiest results, and that there was nothing to be set against it except suppositions, guesses, and calculations that it would not do in England what it had done elsewhere under precisely similar circumstances. A Liberal Government never appeared to him to such disadvantage as when it opposed a Liberal measure, and was forced to seek protection under the gabardine of Toryism. That was a position in which he was sorry to see his hon. Friends, and it was matter of great regret to him that in this matter he stood against his Friends and was defeated by them. It was now, however, practically understood that the ballot was opposed by the aristocracy and landocracy, because they would not give up the power over the constituencies which was given to them by open voting. But why should not they give up that power? They lived in a loyal country—the only country in which the aristocracy was beloved by the people, and a country which was essentially anti-democratical. Then, why did they not seek to gain from the love of the people that which they now compelled by an usurped authority? Depend upon it they would stand much better with the people if they did so. It was unmanly, and showed moral cowardice to adhere to the existing state of things, not to trust to the people in whom they might confide, and rather to compel obedience from their fear than to obtain it from their love. He had ever seen that it was impossible that any Reform Bill should be final unless protected votes were one of its provisions, and he now entreated the Government, at the last moment, to adopt the conviction arrived at by their friend Sydney Smith, whom they had so often quoted, and who wrote the most brilliant pamphlet, but unsound, as it was brilliant, in favour of open voting and against the ballot. What said Sydney Smith? In a recently published letter, written in reply to a correspondent who had complimented him upon his able writing, he said with regard to the ballot, “But it will come, though I write never so wisely.” He (Mr. Berkeley) told them that it must and would come, and that therefore it was infinitely better that they should give to the people that which they would at the present moment receive as a precious boon rather than wait and be compelled to surrender to them that which they would demand as a right. In conclusion he begged to move for leave to introduce a Bill to cause the Votes of the Parliamentary electors of Great Britain and Ireland to be taken by way of ballot.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he rose to second the Motion, but in so doing he should content himself with adding very little to the able and instructive speech of his hon. Friend. He would, however, congratulate the friends of the ballot that from the appearance of the House there was a prospect of there being at least a debate upon this important question. On the last occasion on which it was brought forward, with the exception of a speech from an hon. Gentleman opposite, there was no debate, and no one on or near the Ministerial bench addressed the House. Now, considering that this question had the support of a large portion of the Liberal party, he thought that Her Majesty's Ministers might at least have condescended to justify their conduct in refusing to entertain it. It was very difficult, on all subjects, when very little was said against you, to argue the case—but he never remembered that his hon. Friend had done so well—indeed he had outdone his former arguments. The ballot had generally been opposed on two grounds—one that it was un-English, of which his hon. Friend had disposed, and the other that it would not stop bribery and corruption. It was impossible to say what would be the result of a system until it had been tried, but for his own part, he believed that nothing could be worse than the existing state of things. Certainly, he feared that so long as there were persons in this country bad enough to offer bribes there would be found others weak enough and poor enough to take them. There was, however, one thing worse than bribery, and that was “the screw,” to which his hon. Friend had referred. A bribe might enable a poor man to pay his rent, or might confer some other benefit upon him, but from the exercise of improper influence by a landlord or a customer no good could result. He represented one of the largest constituencies in this country, and so far as he knew there was no question upon which the great body of the electors felt more deeply than that of protecting the voter by the ballot. There was no doubt that from some cause or another a very small proportion of the electors recorded their votes. In Westminster he had seen ladies driving from shop to shop canvassing the tradesmen, a large number of whom were consequently compelled to make themselves practically non-electors, in order to avoid the difficulties they would otherwise be placed in. To show how the system worked, and the feelings that existed with regard to it, he would mention a case which had recently occurred. He held in his hand the particulars of a conversation between a political friend of himself and his gallant colleague and a tradesman in that borough, who had a most flourishing trade. This man, whom he would designate as C., for that was the initial of his name, had strong political opinions, and had congratulated him and his hon. and gallant colleague on having gone to the right lobby on the question of the ballot. His friend remarked that that was a question which he supposed that tradesmen wished settled, and that he did not suppose that C. split his vote. The gentleman went on to say that his business was so good that he could not afford to vote at all. He was a house decorator, and his trade lay principally with wealthy people. He had never voted against his conscience, but if he were to vote in accordance with his conscience it might be the ruin of his wife and children. He had once voted, he said, for General Evans when he stood against Captain Rous, and for his pains he lost three of his best customers; consequently he had never given himself any trouble to be on the registrar, and was, in fact a non-elect. There were hundreds and thousands of electors, he added, in Westminster who were in the same position as himself. In the debate of 1838, Mr. Grote showed, in his own admirable manner, that open election was tantamount to the disfranchisement of hundreds and thousands of electors, seeing that a considerable number of electors declined to exercise their franchise, as they would damage themselves by exercising it conscientiously, and he went on to argue that thus to deny to electors the means of voting conscientiously and safely was, in fact, to disfranchise them altogether. It would be difficult to show that the protection of the ballot would not tend to enable men to give their votes conscientiously. He (Sir J. Shelley) had made an analysis of the divisions on the ballot in the last two years, and the results shown by that analysis threw a curious light on the position of the Liberal party on the question, for he found that in 1855 there were 166 Members present who voted for the ballot, two tellers, and thirty-six pairs, making in all 204, while 218 Members present voted against it, which, with two tellers and thirty-six pairs, made 256, leaving a majority of fifty-two against the Motion or fifteen more than in the previous Session, but eight less than in 1853. This majority consisted of thirteen Members of the Government, ten Whig Members, and 233 Tories, so that the main body of the Liberal party were opposed to the Government on that occasion. But if the Liberal Members were sincerely of opinion that no Reform Bill would be of any effect without the ballot, they had only to stick close together, and, though a change of Government might be the consequence—which none would deplore more than himself—yet the evil would only be temporary, and probably a fusion of parties might be brought about which would result in the formation of a Government—including, perhaps, the right hon. Member for Bucks and the hon. Baronet the Member for Hertfordshire, whom he saw opposite, who had both at one time been ardent supporters of this proposition—with the ballot as a fundamental and Cabinet question. In the division of 1856, 111 Members present voted aye, which with two tellers and forty-three pairs, made 156 for the Motion: while there were 151 Members present, two tellers, and forty three pairs against the Motion, leaving a majority of forty against it. Now in that majority there had been twenty-seven Liberals and Peelites, of whom thirteen had been Members of the Government; so that only fourteen independent Liberals and Peelites had opposed the Motion. He should add that among the Members of the Government who had supported the Motion were to be found some of the most able and popular men who had of late years been engaged in the Administrations of this country, such, for instance, as Lord Duncan, Sir B. Hall, Admiral Berkeley, Sir Alexander Cockburn (the late Attorney General), Sir R. Bethell (the present Attorney General), Mr. Bouverie, Mr. Villiers, Mr. Horsman, Mr. Fitzgerald, Mr. Massey, and Mr. Osborne. The fact was, that as regarded that question the Government, instead of being a support, were an incubus to the Liberal party. In conclusion, he had to state that he felt much pleasure in seconding the Motion.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: After the direct appeal which has been made to the Members of the Government, couched in catechetical form, by the hon. Member for Bristol, I should be wanting in courtesy to the House and to the hon. Gentleman if I did not take an early opportunity of expressing the views which I have formed upon this question. I regret to find that those views will not, from what I hear, coincide with the opinions

generally entertained on either side of the House. I am unable to adopt the views so clearly stated by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Bristol. I cannot form that sanguine estimate of the beneficial effects of the ballot which the hon. Gentleman has sketched out in his address; and, on the other hand, I do not share in the alarm with which the ballot is generally regarded on the other side of the House. I hope the House will afford me the opportunity of stating as briefly as I can the grounds upon which I have formed my opinion, after the best consideration which I have been able to give to a question difficult in itself, and on which there exists such great discordance of views. When a question is brought under the consideration of the House for the first time, it often happens that the hon. Member who brings it forward argues in favour of his own opinion in a general and discursive manner, somewhat in the form of an essay, with a view of introducing the subject to the House, and showing the arguments upon which his proposal rests. Such was the state of this question when it was first brought forward in this House by my Friend Mr. Grote. No one who reads the speeches which he delivered annually in this House during a series of years will deny that it is impossible to state the arguments in favour of the ballot with greater clearness, or in language more elegant and precise. In his hands this question passed through what I may call its didactic period. From his hands it passed into those of the hon. Member for Bristol, and the stage which it reached under his auspices may, I think, without offence to him, be termed the humorous stage. He has for some years annually brought this subject under the consideration of the House with great command of facts and great play of imagination and wit, and he has made a favourable impression on his hearers by the diverting manner in which he has placed it before them. I do not undervalue the remarkable powers of my hon. Friend in agreeably illustrating this subject, but having passed through those two stages, the question of the ballot has now arrived at what I will take the liberty of calling the practical stage. Not being able to rival my hon. Friend in his powers of imagination, I am desirous of examining the question practically, and consider whether or not the ballot is adapted to the wants and circumstances of this country. In order to arrive at a practical result upon this question, the natural course is to consult history, and to see how this ballot has operated in other countries. If we look to the Continent, we find a state of things totally different from anything which exists in this country. It is difficult to profit by the experience of the Continent, where no powerful State has hitherto been able to consolidate a Parliamentary Government, and where the only States that have Parliamentary Governments are those of a second rank. But as to the operation of the ballot on the Continent, I would take the liberty of referring to the statement made by a distinguished statesman and writer on politics—who was examined by a Committee of this House, I think, in the year 1837—I mean M. de Tocqueville, the author of a work on democracy in America, as well as of another on the French Revolution. He was examined by the Committee on Bribery at Elections. Being interrogated on the subject of the ballot, he stated to the Committee that the object of secret voting in France was to protect the voter against the power of the Government—that voters on the Continent dreaded that omnipotent being, as he denominated it—namely, the Government—and that secret voting was, therefore, regarded in France as a shield against the Executive Government. He admitted that it was not difficult to ascertain any person's vote; still, he said, that was the view taken on the subject of the ballot in France. That being the case, I think I need scarcely say that the experience of France and of other continental States is of little value with respect to the working of the ballot in this country, where there is no overwhelming influence of a centralized bureaucracy to overawe the elector, and consequently the privilege of vote by ballot, or secret voting, would, in that respect, be of little avail to him. Neither do I think that the examples of this institution in some of our colonies—those new societies in which this mode of voting has lately been introduced—can be of much assistance to a country whose social and political condition is so different as that of the mother country. The country to which we must look as furnishing really important lessons upon this subject, and which I apprehend is always in the minds of those who recommend the establishment of the ballot in this country, is the United States of America. I believe that I shall not misrepresent the feeling of those who originally recommended the ballot to this country, if I say that their object was to introduce into England the mode of voting generally practised in the United States. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. H. Berkeley) in his speech this evening distinctly referred to the example of the United States. He said that the working of the Ballot there had been perfectly successful, and nearly in all cases he held up the practice of the United States as a model for our imitation. [Mr. H. BERKELEY: The principle,—not the details of the practice.] I certainly understood the hon. Gentleman to say that he recommended the United States to us as an example for our imitation. My hon. Friend now says that he does not approve the details, but merely the principle of the institution; but I really do not very well know how to distinguish between the principle and the details of an institution. I will, however, endeavour, with such lights as I possess, to ascertain what are the principles and the mode of voting established in the United States. The Motion which we have under consideration is this—that leave shall be given to bring in a Bill to cause the votes of Parliamentary electors in Great Britain and Ireland to be taken by way of ballot. This Motion assumes that we know what is the meaning of the word “ballot” as applied to elections. Ballot is not a mode of voting known to the law or constitution of this country, and I do not know that I can ascertain the meaning of the term in any more authentic manner than by inquiring in what sense it is used in the United States. I presume that that use represents the principle, and not merely the details of its working. With the permission of the House I will read the following extract from a work by a gentleman who has travelled in the United States, Mr. Tremenhare, being a work on the constitution of that country, which he states to be founded upon the best native authorities—namely, the jurists; and let me remark that they are writers of very high authority. He says:—

“There is another subject which requires to be noticed under this head of the elections in the United States—namely, the mode of giving the votes, which, as has been seen, is in some States appointed to be viva voce, in others by ballot.”

Now, we come to the explanation of the ballot:—

“It is necessary to repeat that this word never means in the United States ‘secret ballot,’ unless in the instances, which are rare, when the word ‘secret’ is expressly added to it.”

In this country we invariably associate with the word 'ballot' the mode of giving a secret vote by dropping a "ball" into a covered box, in the manner too well known to need to be described, but in the United States I apprehend the ballot is never taken in the same manner as we vote in our private clubs, and does not at all turn on the principle of secret voting. He goes on thus:—

"In the United States the word 'ballot' has, in its general acceptation, nothing to do with the word 'ball,' but means 'a piece of paper, with the names of the candidate or candidates written or printed upon it.' In the Southern and Western States generally the voting is entirely open, and usually viva voce. At all elections in the other States the friends of the different candidates stand round the voting places, with the written or printed voting papers (called tickets) in their hands, and as each voter approaches he takes from the hands of one of the agents of the candidate or candidates for whom he intends to vote one of these lists, openly before all the world, and delivers it, folded or unfolded as the case may be, to the persons taking the poll. The tickets are now universally, I believe, printed; and being printed upon coloured paper—the colour or some distinguishing device indicating the party to which the candidates belong—the very fact of presenting a paper thus coloured or marked, though it might be folded up, in itself at once shows which side the voter takes at the election."

That I apprehend to be a correct description of the process of voting in America, and I will only say that it entirely accords with a description which I have myself heard from American gentlemen. I never heard any American gentleman with whom I conversed on the subject describe the ballot as being secret voting. They have always described it to me to be what it is described by Mr. Tremenheere to be—namely, a system of voting by ticket, which may be, as it generally is, put into a box, or whatever other receptacle may be prepared for it. The distinction, therefore, between the ballot and the mode of voting practised in this country is this—that in the one case there is an authentic register of the voters kept, whereas in the other there is no such register. No doubt, where the mode of voting by ballot prevails in the United States it is not possible to obtain an authentic printed list of the voters such as is commonly known in this country as the poll-book. Such register does not exist; but if any person would stand by the polling-booth as each voter comes upon the scene he would be able to ascertain the side on which each person votes. Lest it may be thought that I quote doubtful or partial witnesses, I am fortunately able to adduce testimony which I think my hon. Friend himself cannot challenge. In the course of his speech he referred to the Society for Promoting the Adoption of the Ballot, of which he himself is chairman. That society has issued several tracts for the purpose of recommending the ballot. I have before me two of those tracts, and, as they appear to be under the patronage of my hon. Friend, assisted by a numerous and highly respectable committee of gentlemen calling themselves "the Friends of the Ballot," I can hardly be doing wrong in quoting them as evidence of the practice of the ballot in America. The first of those tracts (of which I hold before me a second edition) is called The Ballot in America. After giving a description of its working in several States, it says—

"A most extraordinary system of optional secrecy obtains. In one or two States the secrecy is compulsory, but the general practice is what is called optional secrecy."

The next passage is a description of the mode of voting in the important State of New York, which, as it is not long, perhaps the House will allow me to read—

"Where there is, on the one hand, no register of electors, and, on the other hand, a system of printed tickets, it is perfectly clear that, for some local reason, the inhabitants of the State are not really desirous to secure secrecy in voting either for themselves or others. This may be called ballot, but it is not secret voting."

It ends with this summary—

"The result generally may be said to be this—that while in the various States above-named different forms of ballot are made use of, one great purpose has been kept in view—that of securing to every elector the option of secrecy with regard to his vote. In short, as has been well expressed by an eminent Statesman of our own country, 'In none of these States is any record kept against any man of the manner in which he votes.' In a country where the suffrage is almost universal, and where great inequalities of condition among those who possess it do not generally prevail, it is not surprising that many should appear individually indifferent as to the observance of secrecy in its exercise. But protection is afforded by law to all who feel its want, and choose to avail themselves of it."

That is the description given in this tract, and the House will see that it accords with what I have read from the work of Mr. Tremenheere. It shows that when we speak of the ballot as a secret mode of voting, what we are to understand, so far as the American practice goes, is, that if a voter chooses to conceal his vote he has the power of doing so; but that if he does not think fit to conceal his vote he may give it openly; and that therefore secrecy is confined to those only who are desirous to obtain it. I wish the House to be fully in possession of that fact, inasmuch as I think it has an important bearing on the practical working of the system. The next tract to which I shall direct the attention of the House is one of the same series, published under the direction of my hon. Friend. It is No. 5 of that series, entitled The Test of Experience as to the Working of the Ballot in the United States, and I am the more desirous of quoting from it because it is to the practical experience of the system that I am anxious to call the attention of the House. The society for promoting the introduction of the ballot having become aware that some important transactions had taken place on this subject in the State of Massachusetts, Mr. Wickham, the hon. Secretary, wrote in April, 1855, to the hon. Amasa Walker, Secretary of State for Massachusetts, requesting from him information as to those transactions, and especially as to some recent changes of law on the subject of vote by ballot. Now, I wish particularly to direct the notice of the House to this correspondence, and to the facts disclosed in the letters and documents transmitted by Mr. Walker. He describes the state of the law in Massachusetts, where, it may be observed, vote by ballot was in existence, and where, therefore, there already was to be found that perfect security against electoral evils against which my hon. Friend says the ballot is sure to provide. Though the ballot existed there, however, it did not produce all the results that the friends of the system in this country seem to expect. It appears to have been there decided in a court of law that a printed as well as written vote was within the meaning and intent of the constitution. This decision (says Mr. Walker)—

“Made a great change in the character of the ballot. It destroyed a great part of its secrecy, for as soon as the legality of printed votes was admitted, each of the different parties would have something in the size or appearance of its ticket, by which it could be readily distinguished from those of other parties. One, for example, would have tickets printed on yellow paper, another on blue, another on pink, &c. Oftentimes, moreover, such tickets were ornamented with some pictorial representation, so that a man's vote could be recognized almost as far as the man himself. Hence, very soon after printed votes were introduced, complaints began to be heard from all parts of the State, especially from the large commercial and manufacturing towns, that the secrecy of the ballot was impaired, that intimidation and coercion were used at the polls, and the independence of the voter greatly lessened.”

This was the state of matters in one of the Northern States of the Union dealing with the ballot, preserving during the whole time the name of the institution, and therefore, so far as I understand, the principle of the ballot. The writer goes on to say—

“The evil had now become so great, that many people felt anxious for a change in the mode of voting, and various improvements were suggested. But the great practical difficulty seemed to be, to get a method which should be perfectly secret, and at the same time afford perfect security against fraud.”

Now, this difficulty occurred in 1840, at a time when vote by ballot was an established institution of the State, and embodied in the constitution. The great practical difficulty seemed to be to combine secrecy with perfect security against fraud. Mr. Walker adds, “the two objects appeared for a long time incompatible.” Now, I wish the House to observe that at this time Mr. Walker thought that secret voting and security against fraud were incompatible, and that no means were known in the United States of reconciling these two things, showing that in the United States secrecy was not essentially a part of vote by ballot. Throughout the speech of my hon. Friend he assumed that secrecy is an essential part of vote by ballot. He contrasted vote by ballot with open voting, to show, as he said, that open voting was a ratification of a treaty between two dishonest men, while the ballot was a secret mode of voting by which that ratification was frustrated. So that the whole of my hon. Friend's argument falls to the ground if secrecy is not a part of the ballot. I feel quite sure that a large number of people in this country are in favour of secret voting, because they believe it has been the practice of the United States and has succeeded there, both of which things are shown by the very publications of my hon. Friend's society to be inconsistent with the fact. Mr. Walker, after saying that the difficulty was to find some means of reconciling secrecy with security against fraud, proceeds to say—

“While thus thinking upon the subject, it suddenly occurred to me (for I had never heard it suggested) that the true method was to enclose the ballot in an envelope, and then, having sealed the same, place it in the ballot-box.”

Now, it is of importance to observe that he speaks of this idea as one never heard of before, as having flashed suddenly upon his mind for the first time as a means by which secret voting could be carried into effect without fraud. The result of this sudden inspiration was that Mr. Walker prepared a Bill which he presented to the Senate; but the Bill being rejected the former mode of voting continued. In the following year, however, 1851, the Liberals (he says)—

“ Consisting of the Democrats and Free-soilers united, came into power, and the Bill for the Better Security of the Ballot was again introduced into the Legislature, and passed by a handsome majority.”

For the first time, therefore, and under the influence of the Secretary of State for Massachusetts, secret voting was established in that State by law in 1851. [Mr. H. BERKELEY observed that it existed in the State of Michigan also.] Mr. Walker tells us that the mode of voting by enclosing the vote in a sealed envelope occurred to himself for the first time—that it was a new discovery—and, therefore, no similar system could have existed in any other State. The law that was now passed remained till 1853. He says—

“ In 1853 the Conservative party came again into power, and not daring directly to repeal the Ballot Law, so popular had it become, virtually destroyed its efficacy by enacting that ‘ any voter might use the envelope or not as he should choose.’ ”

Now, this alteration of the constitution took place under the system of secret voting by means of a sealed envelope, and therefore we must suppose that the views of the electors of Massachusetts were faithfully represented, and that the wishes of a majority were carried into effect in repealing that system of secret voting. The end seems to have been that secret voting was made optional with the people, and Mr. Walker goes on to say—“ This emasculated the law, as every man who voted under envelope would be presumed and taken to be hostile to the dominant party.” He then says that very soon after the virtual repeal of the ballot law an election took place for delegates to the Convention, called for the purpose of amending the constitution of the State. This election resulted in the return of an overwhelming majority of the Liberal party, and in the Convention which met in 1853 the sealed ballot was proposed as a part of the constitution of the State. The amended constitution was submitted to the people for their adoption in the succeeding fall, and all the amendments rejected by a small majority. By the defeat of the amended constitution the people were thrown back upon the existing law; a new party, calling itself “ American,” took the field, and carried the State by a triumphant majority; and Mr. Walker concludes this narrative by saying—

“ The Legislature elected by this party is now in session. The restoration of the sealed ballot law was proposed in the popular branch, and carried by a good majority; it was, however, lost in the Senate, the more Conservative branch, by a majority of one vote. So that the law now stands that the voter may deposit his vote in a sealed envelope, or not, as he may choose.”

That brings the history of this law in the State of Massachusetts to a close, and it shows that the ballot there having been, in the first instance, practically an open one, in which every person exhibited his vote, if he thought fit to do so, a system of compulsory secrecy was introduced; that it remained in force for two years; that it was then repealed, and has not since been reintroduced. Therefore, as far as any inference is to be drawn from my hon. Friend's publication, it appears that there is now no State of the American Union in which the system of compulsory secrecy in voting exists. I infer this partly from Mr. Walker's narrative and partly from the Report of the Committee of the Senate and House of Representatives of Massachusetts, which is appended. They describe the evils of voting very much in the same sort of way as my hon. Friend described them in this country as existing in full vigour under a system of ballot, and then they go on to say—

“ The use of letter envelopes, which has within a few years been introduced into this country, has, it is believed, suggested a very simple, cheap, and efficacious remedy for all the evils which have heretofore been complained of.”

I am afraid I have wearied the House by reading so many passages, but I was desirous of placing before them in an authentic form evidence which I think cannot be disputed, of the true nature of the working of the ballot system in America. Now, we have nothing to show that at this moment there is a single State of the American Union in which the system of compulsory secrecy exists with regard to voting. In the majority of States, undoubtedly, the system of vote by ballot exists, probably engrafted in most of the State constitutions, but the practice appears to be this:—The voter places his ticket in a box; there is no poll-clerk, no person to record his vote, and therefore no list of votes is published after the election; the votes are ascertained by counting the number of tickets deposited at the polling-places, but each person is fully at liberty to exhibit his vote if he thinks fit to do so, and the general practice is, in fact, to exhibit them. Well, in considering what would be the effect of acceding to the Motion of my hon. Friend, we must, before we can fully understand what we are about to do, ask what the system is which he recommends. Does he recommend the sealed envelope system, or does he recommend the system of optional secrecy? Now, all his arguments are founded on the assumption that the secrecy is to be compulsory, and I would therefore, in the first place, venture to call the attention of the House to this material fact,—that the whole experience of the United States is against the system of compulsory secrecy; that that system has only been tried recently as an experiment, so far as I know, in a single State; that it there remained in operation only two years, and that it has not since been re-established. It is clear, therefore, using the language of the title-page of this tract, that if we appeal to “the test of experience,” the experience of the United States is against compulsory secrecy and in favour of optional secrecy. Now, just let us consider what would be the result of an attempt to introduce compulsory secrecy into this country. At present the whole of our electoral proceedings are founded on the assumption that the opinions of the candidate are avowed, that he has certain supporters among the voters, and that they come forward and vote for him on public grounds. Perhaps they form a committee; they appear as his friends, as the advocates of the political system which he espouses; he puts forward addresses declaring his opinions; he canvasses electors on the ground that he holds certain opinions; he hopes that they will support him as entertaining similar opinions; the whole conduct and course of an English election is, in fact, a publicity of opinion on the part of the candidate as well as of the electors. Sir, no person in this House has a greater objection to intimidation at elections than myself. I fully sympathise in everything which my hon. Friend has said against this practice. I object, quite as strongly as he can do, to the illegitimate influence of landlords or others with a view to the coercion of their tenantry or their dependents at the poll. There is nothing he can say on that subject to which I am not prepared to give my assent. But, having made that statement, am I prepared to adopt his remedy, or to think that that which he proposes as a remedy would in fact prove to be such? On the contrary, my firm conviction is, that to attempt to introduce a system of compulsory secrecy in voting in this country would be an attempt to row against an irresistible current—that it would be an endeavour to force on the people of this country institutions thoroughly repugnant to their habits and their nature. If my hon. Friend were to bring in a Bill, not in the ambiguous phrases which he has chosen, but distinctly enacting the sealed envelope system, by whatever name he chose to call it, making it compulsory for an elector to conceal his vote at an election, I believe he would find that the general feeling of the country was against it. If you are to subject a man to a penalty—because to this extent you must go—for showing his vote at an election, how can you allow the system of canvassing? Will it be possible, then, to allow a candidate to visit an elector and to ask him for his vote? If no person is to be permitted to declare his vote, and if an election is to be as secret and silent as a funeral, it seems to me that it would be a gross inconsistency to promote any intercourse whatever between a candidate and the electors to permit a candidate to address the electors, or, indeed, to allow of electoral meetings at all. You must be prepared to go the whole length of prohibiting all preliminary expressions of opinion on the part of the voters, unless you allow them to express their opinions, if they think fit to do so, when they give their votes. My own belief is that my hon. Friend has been indulging in general phrases, extracts from newspapers, stories about coercion, for a series of years, without very minutely considering the details of the measure which he wishes us to adopt; and I am rather inclined to think that he never actually faced the enforcement of compulsory secrecy, but that what he has in his mind is a system of optional secrecy—that is to say, a law which should permit any person who wishes to vote secretly to give his vote in that way. If I do not misinterpret the views commonly entertained upon the subject, my belief is that that is the kind of ballot which most persons have in their minds when they hold it forth as a panacea for all electoral evils. Suppose, then, the measure for the adoption of the ballot were embodied in such a form as I have described—namely, that of optional secrecy—allowing a person either to conceal or to exhibit his vote as he thought fit. Now, I must be permitted to express an opinion, though it may not perhaps meet with universal assent, that the great majority of the voters at one of our elections are prepared to avow their votes—that, in fact, they are desirous of doing so. My hon. Friend, in a manner derogatory, in my opinion, to the mass of the electors throughout the country, has pictured them as driven to the poll like flocks of sheep. The experience, however, of most hon. Gentlemen who have canvassed a constituency, I think, will tell them that, though the bulk of the electors may be of no very exalted station, they in general entertain decided political opinions in favour of one party or another, and that a very large number of persons on both sides are desirous of proclaiming their support of one candidate or the other. If the vote by ballot were introduced in the optional form, and if every person were permitted to display his vote, I think that the result would be that the great majority of the electors would exhibit their votes. What, then, would be the consequence of such an institution with respect to protecting voters against whom intimidation is sought to be practised? The only effect would be, that those who desired to coerce a voter would give him notice that he would be watched at the poll, and that, if he did not display his vote, it would be assumed that he had voted contrary to their wishes. The only result of such a law as could be practically worked in this country would be that, where persons were resolved upon intimidation, the mode of intimidating would be changed, while no effectual protection would be given to the dependent voter. Now, I will put a case in illustration of this. Suppose—that which I hope may never occur again in this country—a division between the different classes of society on the subject of the laws of food, and that the agricultural interest were arrayed against the rest of the community; suppose a rural parish in which resided, say a blacksmith and a wheelwright, who were small freeholders, working for the neighbouring farmers, and earning their livelihood by such employment; suppose that these neighbouring farmers meet, and that they inform the two freeholders, who are suspected of wishing to vote in opposition to them, that, unless they exhibit their votes at the polling booth, it will be assumed that they have not voted in the manner prescribed, and that their custom will be taken from them in consequence—in what respect, I ask, in such a case, would the law of optional secrecy afford any protection to those men? Clearly it would give no protection; and, in order to afford effect-

tual protection by means of secrecy to voters, you must, by law, make secrecy compulsory. In other words, you must do that which has not been done in the United States; you must introduce a system of which you have no experience; you must change the whole character and conduct of our elections; you must alter the very habits of the people, and you must attempt to do by legislation that which I feel confident legislation in this country will be powerless to accomplish. It is for these reasons, then, Sir, that I oppose this Motion—not because I think that voting by ballot is un-English or unmanly—not because I share any of those popular objections to the vote by ballot which my hon. Friend treated with so much contempt—but because I believe that, in one form it is utterly inapplicable to, and irreconcilable with, the habits of this country, and that it is not recommended by the experience of those countries which are held up as the models which we should imitate, but which, having tried it for a short time, have rejected it. I oppose this Motion because, in the form of compulsory secrecy, I believe that it is not possible to introduce the ballot into this country; I oppose it, also, because I believe that, in the only form in which it could be introduced, that of optional secrecy, it would be perfectly ineffectual for the object in view, and because it would not afford that protection to the voter which my hon. Friend thinks it would afford, but would leave us in the state in which we now are, in which we must look to the cultivation of public opinion, to the diffusion of sounder views on the relations of electors and those who are able to control their votes, and to the gradual diminution of that most objectionable system of electoral intimidation and coercion. It is, I say, to those moral influences, and not to the influence of the law, that we must look, and look with confidence, for the amendment of our present practice. In support of the view, that public opinion tends gradually to correct all the worst descriptions of intimidation, I would appeal to the last election. With regard to bribery, I do not believe that the ballot would provide any effectual remedy, although, with regard to coercion and intimidation, no doubt, if we suppose compulsory secrecy, and everybody faithfully keeping his secret, protection might be afforded; but we are not entitled to anticipate that there will be any such alteration of the law so long as the opinions of this country remain unchanged. The other system, which is practically the one pursued in the United States, would leave us where we are at present, tending gradually, and more and more in each successive election, to the exercise of an independent judgment by the electors, such as I believe they exercised at the last general election. Judging from such means of observation as I possess, it is my firm belief that, even if the votes at the last election had been given under the shield of any form of ballot which my hon. Friend could devise, the result would have been substantially identical with that which the open voting of the country has produced.

MR. GREER said, that, following the example of the right hon. Gentleman who had last addressed the House, who had eschewed the didactic style, and had certainly not lingered long on the humorous, he should endeavour to attempt the region of the practical, and in the first place he would express his content that the right hon. Gentleman had rested his arguments on the results of experience, as the advocates of the Ballot were perfectly prepared to rest their case on that ground. The right hon. Gentleman had principally dwelt upon the case of the United States, and had stated that in certain parts of America compulsory secret voting was the rule, and that in other parts the voting might be secret or not, at the option of the voters. Now, he asked, was the right hon. Gentleman prepared to concede even the latter modified system? would he give optional secret voting to such constituencies as wished it, and would he give compulsory secret voting so soon as it could be shown that compulsory secret voting was practicable? If the right hon. Gentleman wished to see the details of the Bill of the hon. Member for Bristol (Mr. H. Berkeley), why would he not vote for the first reading, and then argue the measure itself at a later stage? The experience of the United States was, he thought, particularly valuable to this country, inasmuch as the people were of the same habits and language as ourselves, and, therefore, better adapted for our guidance than that of continental nations. The United States, however, differed from this country in this material respect, that there secret voting was not so necessary as it was in this country, in order to arrive at the real feelings of the electors. What had been the experience of this country with regard to open voting? The principle of the constitution of this country was that every elector had a right to exercise his franchise freely and without control, but ever since the time of William III., down to the Reform Bill of 1832, he found that attempts had been continually made, but without success, to protect the voter in the exercise of his franchise. Even lately there had been an Act of Parliament passed expressly to suppress corrupt practices at elections, and yet at the recent general election it was notorious that those corrupt practices had been as rife as ever. It was because all former attempts to suppress those evils had failed that an application was now made to the new Parliament to pass a law which would have the effect of protecting electors in the exercise of their constitutional right. [Cries of "Divide!"] He called upon hon. Members who were so anxious to declare their opinions by their votes to stand up and support their votes by arguments. Many of them had extinguished popular opinion amongst the constituencies they represented; but he hoped they would not be allowed to put it down in that House. If the ballot was such a bad thing, why did hon. Gentlemen avail themselves of it in their clubs, and yet deny it to the unfortunate elector? To oppose the ballot upon the simple ground that it was secret and cowardly was sheer hypocrisy. He knew well that undue influence had been exercised in Ireland to a great extent, and in that part of the island with which he was particularly acquainted he could state that tenants, in coming forward to vote according to their convictions, but against the wishes of their landlords, exposed themselves to the very severest penalties, because they were mostly tenants at will, holding their farms at the pleasure of their landlords. He was, however, happy to assure the hon. Member for Bristol, who had referred to the correspondence between the Marquess of Waterford and his tenants, that although the letter of the tenants was not couched in quite such sturdy terms as the hon. Member appeared to desire, yet many of them had faced the trial, and had voted according to their consciences.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Sir, although I might well claim as an excuse for not addressing the House upon this subject, that I have often done so on former occasions, yet, as my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, considering this to be a new Parliament, has thought it necessary to make new, and, I must say, greater exertions to prove his case than ever he has done before, I will venture to trouble the House with some of the views which I entertain in opposition to his measure. It is not to be denied that the hon. Member and the Ballot Society have made considerable impression upon a large portion of the public, and therefore I have felt it my duty, carefully to consider and reconsider the various arguments which are urged for and against the ballot. It appears to me that my hon. Friend, and those who act with him, rest their case upon three assumptions of fact and of opinion, all of which I believe to be erroneous. The first assumption is, that at the present moment there prevails so much of intimidation, that it is impossible that the opinions of those, to whom the elective franchise has been intrusted, can be fairly ascertained. The next assumption is, that the voter has a right, an indefeasible right, to give his vote without reference to the opinions of any other person but himself, and without being brought before any tribunal of opinion to answer for the vote. The last assumption is, that there prevails a very general opinion throughout the country in favour of secret voting. Now, Sir, I will treat of these several assumptions in their order. The first is, as I have already said, that intimidation prevails to such an extent as to prevent the opinions of the electors from being fairly ascertained. If my hon. Friend relies upon particular instances, I will allow that no general election takes place without some particular instances of intimidation being brought forward in this House. But, when my hon. Friend passes from the proofs which on several occasions he had brought forward of different instances of intimidation, such as that of the agent or steward of the Marquess of Waterford, which he has adduced this evening, and proceeds to say that the electors do not fairly represent the opinions of the constituent body, then I conceive him to be grievously in error. My hon. Friend referred, in support of his views, to the elections for counties. If we look at the elections for the counties, let us look at them for the last quarter of a century. I remember when the Reform Bill was first proposed there were about eighty Members representing the counties of England and Wales, and no less than seventy-six were elected to vote in favour of the Reform Bill. I remember, too, afterwards, that when there came the question of the repeal of the Corn Laws, when protection was the banner on the one side and free trade on the other, the Liberal Members for counties, who formed so vast a majority at the time of the Reform Bill, lost their advantage and became a minority. I believe that upon both those occasions the opinions of those who elected those Members were truly represented. I believe the great majority in favour of the Reform Bill faithfully represented the opinions of the county electors in favour of the measure, and I believe no less than the majority of county Members, who resisted free trade, truly represented the opinions of the farmers and others who returned them, and that the feeling in favour of free trade did not prevail then. I must say, in contradiction to the hon. Gentleman who says, that if general opinion had been allowed to prevail at the elections, the Corn Laws would have been repealed at a much earlier period, that I remember a very particular and detailed statement of Mr. Cobden, in which he said, that when he and Mr. Bright—and there could not be two more powerful and eloquent advocates of any cause than those two gentlemen, whose loss from the House I regret every day—when they first arrived at Leeds to hold a public meeting, there was some difficulty in filling the room with the supporters of the total repeal of the Corn Laws, and, as they passed through the streets they were totally unnoticed, proving evidently that they were not much in favour with the working classes. Mr. Cobden went on to state that, in the year when the Corn Laws were repealed—namely, a short period before the famous declaration of Sir Robert Peel, was the first occasion when the working classes were in favour of the abolition of those laws, and that when he and Mr. Bright went down to Leeds, at that time, they were received with acclamation. I believe that to be a true representation of the state of things. I remember that in 1841, when Parliament was dissolved, and when the working classes were told on the one hand that the repeal of the Corn Laws would bring them cheap bread; and, on the other, that the repeal would bring lower wages, which would more than compensate for the cheapness of bread, their minds were a good deal divided between those representations, and I believe that they were rather of the opinion that the diminution of wages would make their position worse, on the whole. At all events, there was a great division of opinion on the subject, and my belief is, that the elections at that time fairly represented the state of opinion in the country. Adverting to the question of the influence of landlords, I must say that it is my opinion that the tenants, generally speaking, prefer to vote on the same side with their landlords rather than against them. In proof of this, I will give an instance which I heard from the late Earl Spencer, then Lord Althorp, who advocated the ballot, was against the corn laws, and was a liberal landlord, so liberal, indeed, that he would never have thought of disturbing a tenant in his occupancy on account of the manner of his voting. I asked him whether his tenants in general were, like him, for the repeal of the corn laws, or whether they were for protection. He said that he believed they were generally for protection. I then asked him whether, in case of an election, they generally went with him, or voted for protection, and he replied that they generally voted on the same side as he voted on. That is a strong instance of what I believe to be the disposition of the tenantry of England to vote with their landlords, whom they respected; for he was sure they did not think that if any one, or all of them, had voted in favour of protection, there was the least chance that a man like Earl Spencer would disturb any one in his tenancy. When I am told, therefore, of tenants voting with their landlords, I admit that there are certain cases of intimidation, disgraceful to those who practise it, and very hard on the intimidated; but I deny in general that it is the truth that tenants in voting in the same way as their landlords vote otherwise than according to their own wishes. To give another instance—when the question between protection and free trade was in agitation, the counties generally sent Members to that House to represent protection, who therefore sat on the Conservative side of the House, and yet we have seen at the late election, when there was no longer a question of protection, but when we were all free traders, there was exhibited no longer the same disposition, and we have seen where contested elections have taken place, the Liberal candidates come again into the places they formerly occupied, and enjoy the same favour with the electors as they did before this question of protection arose. There, again, I do not see that the intimidation of landlords prevented the election of Liberal Members for the counties. The change took place at the late election, and I believe and hope that it will take place to a greater extent at the next election. I shall not have any fear that the electors who vote in that way will be punished by Conservative landlords in consequence of their vote. I come now to the next proposition or assumption of my hon. Friend, which is the general assumption always made, but which I must always protest against—namely, that in contradistinction to every other class in this country the electors—the freeholders, leaseholders, and £10 householders—are to be accounted infallible, without sin as without error, and therefore there is to be left in their hands the complete and despotic power of voting according to their pleasure without any control whatsoever. The right of voting is a trust, and a similar trust is held by all who exercise power—from the Sovereign on the throne downwards—for the benefit of the people. Those who sit in the other House of Parliament hold their seats and the power of legislation as a trust for the public benefit. It is the same thing with the Ministers of the Crown and the Judges of the land, and with the electors, who are invested with the power of sending Members to this House to dispose of the property and maintain the liberties of the people of this country. Is that a wrong principle? Is there any class that ought to be free from this inspection and this control of public opinion? Take the case of a person in one of the highest positions in this country—the Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench. The late Lord Ellenborough, the Chief Justice, was a person of great talents and eminent learning, and exceedingly well qualified to hold that high position. We are told in a recent biography—a work calculated to delight and instruct all who read it—the Lives of the Chief Justices, by Lord Campbell—that Lord Ellenborough felt extremely hurt at the public comments made by the press and by the public in general on his conduct on the bench. Will the hon. Gentleman—will any one say that it was wrong that the public should make these comments? I believe that, highly qualified as Lord Ellenborough was, those who made the comments were right, and that his bias and inclination in favour of authority and power made him justly liable to censure; and shall I say, when a man, learned and able like him, was subjected to the censure of public opinion, when his words and acts as a Judge in a high court of justice were to be scrutinized and examined, that the freeholders and £10 householders are to be free from examination and scrutiny altogether in respect to the manner in which they exercise their power, and that they alone are to be deemed irresponsible? I will not say so, for I hold it to be contrary to the spirit and principles of the British Constitution to make such a concession. My hon. Friend might make out some case for this irresponsibility, as he seemed to imply, if he were to maintain that there should be universal suffrage, or manhood suffrage, as it is called, and that all persons of full age should have the vote. But that would be a new theory. It would be the theory, not of the British constitution, but of some other constitution. What the British constitution does is to give to certain persons with certain qualifications certain conditions of power, and then to leave the public in general to control, criticize, and check the exercise of that power. Such is the case with the power of the Judge on the bench. He is a person of a certain career and eminence at the bar, with qualifications which cause him to be placed in that high position; and then he is subject to be controlled by public opinion. The same is the case with the Ministers of the Crown. Suppose any question arises—such as the China question, the Italian question, or the present unhappy state of India. The Ministers may adopt any measure they please, for they are the executive and chosen councillors of the Crown; but they must afterwards be subject to public opinion and to the censure of this House, if in the opinion of the public and of that House they should be deemed to have acted hastily or in error. Then, with respect to the electors of this country, whose power is as important as that of the Judge on the Bench, or of the House of Lords, or of the Ministers, I am but bringing them under the control of public opinion when I say let us know how they vote, and how they exercise their power, and let them be subject to censure if they do wrong in the exercise of that power. Well, but it is said that it is impossible they can err. Now, I think I have known instances in which the voters have acted in a way which would excite the indignation and blame of any one. I think I have heard—and I believe I need go no further than the table of this House for an example—of a candidate standing for a place, and of persons in the town coming round him and expressing their willingness to form his committee and canvass the voters, and yet when the election came on all these members of his committee accepted bribes for their votes, and voted for his opponent. That is conduct which no one could approve; but then my hon. Friend says, "Do not let them be subject to any censure for it. Let them go and vote in secret." Therefore these members of the election committee might have gone to the candidate and told him that they had used every exertion in his favour, that they considered it most unfortunate that the election should have gone against him, and that they could not imagine how it happened, while every one of them had got £10 or £20 in his pocket as an inducement to vote contrary to their professions. That is the sort of change which my hon. Friend recommends. My hon. Friend states that he has a high moral authority for saying that a voter may very well give his promise to a candidate, and yet be at liberty, according to the rules of a very sound morality, to break that promise and vote another way. I suppose I must accept that as sound morality. It may be so, but I can only say that it is strange and new to me. My hon. Friend put the case of Brown, who was very much intimidated. I beg leave to bring Jones and Robinson into court, and ask them what they have to say of Brown's conduct. Brown, being a principal tenant, is asked by his landlord to canvass with him for a candidate who is going to stand for the county. The landlord says, "The election won't take place for some time, but we are going to have a dinner in favour of Conservative principles; you are, I am sure, a very good Conservative; if you will take the head of the table and give the toasts and lead the way it will be a very great advantage to us." Well, Brown says, "Oh, to be sure," because if he does not do so he will let out his secret. Now, this is not an illustration of mine. My hon. Friend will know whence I draw it. Brown presides at the dinner; he gives the wrong toast; he makes the wrong speech; he sings the wrong song; and after thus persuading his landlord and all the gentlemen at table that he is an excellent Conservative, on the day of election he goes with another ticket and votes secretly for the Liberal candidate. [Mr. ROEBUCK: Hear!] My hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield would think that a very fair proceeding. [Mr. ROEBUCK: Hear!] I am not now disputing its morality, but I believe that is the sort of conduct to which people refer when they say that the ballot would be un-English. They mean that that sort of deceit, of treachery, and of promise-breaking is un-English, and they come to the conclusion that secret voting is an un-English proceeding. I do not wonder at it. I am very much inclined to be of their opinion. I next come to the assumption of my hon. Friend that this proposal of the ballot meets with very great favour in the country. Now, although there is a considerable party in favour of the ballot, although there are a great many of the electors, particularly those who feel sore after a general election that in their cases intimidation has been exercised, who urge its adoption, and who excite their neighbours on the subject, I do not believe that the general opinion of this country is in favour of secret voting. I have had occasion to address large bodies of persons, numbering, perhaps, 3,000 or 4,000, and to state my objections to the ballot, and I always found that the meeting was at least equally divided in opinion, if, indeed, the majority did not approve of my views. I entirely believe the statement which has been made with so much ability and clearness by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He has gone into the details of the American elections and has shown what I have constantly heard stated by Americans—that the ballot in America is by no means synonymous with secret voting. [Mr. ROEBUCK: Hear!] But that in many cases you may know by the form or colour of the ticket a man takes in what way he votes. A man may take a blue ticket or a yellow ticket, which represents the interests of particular candidates, and then there is an end of secrecy and of security against intimidation. As the Chancellor of the Exchequer said, quoting the opinion of one who has written on this subject, if you provide that secrecy shall be optional, you at once give a customer, or a landlord, or whoever wishes to intimidate, the means of defeating secrecy altogether. The customer, or the steward, or the landlord may say to an elector, “If you vote secretly, and your voting paper is not in an envelope of a particular shape or colour, we shall at once conclude in what way you have voted, and we shall regard you as much an enemy as if we had heard you give your vote viva voce to the opposite party at the poll.” This, I imagine, is perfectly clear, and the only resource is one against which the English blood of the Americans has revolted, and which is adopted in only one State—namely, the establishment of compulsory secrecy, precluding every man from divulging the manner in which he has voted, or what his disposition may be. Does any one believe that such a regulation would be tolerated in England any more than it has been in America? Does any one believe that, in the case of an election, the frank and truth-telling feeling of the people of this country would not prompt nearly every man to say, “I am anxious for the success of Mr. So-and-so, or Sir Thomas So-and-so; I shall certainly give him my vote, and I hope my neighbours will do likewise”? That is found to be the case generally. Secrecy, therefore, would be confined to a few, and being confined to a few, it would not benefit that few. It may be said, “What mischief could result from introducing a system which would not completely change the habits of the country?” Well, I think it would be mischievous to introduce a new mode of voting which, so far as it goes, would tend, as I believe, to take away something from the frank and open character of Englishmen. There would also be some mischief in introducing what appears to be a considerable innovation that is not likely to succeed. I cannot believe that the adoption of this new mode of voting would produce a complete change in the character of Englishmen; but I do think the evils it would introduce would far counterbalance the good it would effect. I do not believe that the elections in this country are generally marked by intimidation and corruption, and I cannot agree with my hon. Friend when he says that an open vote is a corrupt agreement between one rogue and another. We have gone on a long time with this imperfect, and, as it appears, corrupt mode of voting, under which we have gained great liberty, and the system of secret voting has only been proposed, or even thought of, within late years. Liberty has made greater advances in this country than in any nation of Europe, and I venture to say that there is more freedom in this country than exists even in the United States of America. Without wearying the House with details, I will only ask them to look at the triumphs of liberal measures during the last twenty-five or thirty years, all gained under a system of open voting. Parliament has been reformed, the corn laws have been abolished, corporations have been opened, and an infinite number of liberal measures of a similar nature have been adopted, all this having been accomplished under a system of voting which my hon. Friend says consists entirely in a corrupt agreement between one rogue and another. On behalf of this much maligned House, and our much maligned constitution, I must demur to the statements of my hon. Friend. My hon. Friend said, "Only consider the case of Australia; why, in the colony of Victoria you have had a most wonderful instance of the success of secret voting, and even the Attorney General has been convinced of its value." I believe the constitution of Victoria was adopted by the House of Commons at my recommendation two years ago, and when it is held up as the great object of our imitation I am reminded of the exclamation of one of the characters in that amusing play The Rover, "Glorious news! the barons have been successful. The venerated and inestimable inheritance of Britain, Magna Charta, was signed last Friday week, the 3rd of July." The veneration of my hon. Friend for the new constitution of Victoria appears to me very much of the same kind. For my own part, I should prefer waiting a few years before we follow the example of the Assembly of Victoria. It may be a very good example; but I think we, the older, and therefore the more cautious assembly of the two, may afford to wait a few years in order to see whether this triumph of secret voting proves so satisfactory as it is presumed to be at the present moment. I cannot refrain from noticing one statement of the hon. Baronet the Member for Westminster (Sir J. Shelley). He said—and he made it out well enough by figures—that the great majority of the Liberal party voted in the last Parliament in favour of the ballot, and that there were only twenty—or perhaps not more than ten or fourteen—Liberals out of office who voted against the ballot. I do not know why hon. Gentlemen who have been elected by large constituencies should be excluded from the right of voting because they have accepted office. But the hon. Gentleman proceeded to say that as the great majority of the Liberals are in favour of the ballot they have only to go to the noble Lord at the head of the Government and to tell him they will not support his Administration any longer unless he and the Cabinet carry the measure of the ballot. I think this coming from a determined adherent of my noble Friend is the most degrading proposal I ever heard. I can understand Sir Robert Peel saying at one time that the state of Ireland was such that he had been induced to abandon the views he once held with respect to Roman Catholic Emancipation. I can also understand Sir Robert Peel saying, that the course of the discussion on the corn laws, and the state of those laws were such as to lead him to think that the best course for the welfare of the country, and one which would not be injurious at the same time to Conservative institutions, would be the repeal of those laws; but, to tell hon. Gentlemen who are not convinced—to tell members of the Cabinet, that because the great majority of their supporters vote for the ballot, they are not to entertain the views which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has expressed to-night, would be a most mischievous innovation, and I must say it is a most disgraceful proposal. This, too, is the language held towards a Minister of the Crown whom the hon. Member professes to respect, a Minister of the Crown who deserves that respect, and I am sure he will show to-night that he is still more worthy the respect of this House by scornfully rejecting such a proposal. It has been said that a vote given by a tenant, or a tradesman against his conscience is a lie, and that a Member who is sent to this House in consequence of that vote is the incarnation of a lie. I should say that the Members of a Cabinet voting in favour of a Bill for the ballot, against their opinions, and against their convictions, would also be to pronounce a lie; and that, for such a measure to be passed by this House as expressing their deliberate opinion in favour of the ballot, would be but the embodiment of that lie. In using this strong language, I am but following the example, and using the language of my hon. Friend. My hon. Friend certainly deserves success for the perseverance and ability he has evinced in this matter. For my own part, I will only further say, that if Parliament should decide that the ballot is to be the law of the land, I, like others, must bow to that decision; but, until that is made the law, so long as I am permitted to give a vote on this subject, that vote will be recorded against secret voting, and in favour of the ancient mode of open and deliberate voting.

MR. H. BERKELEY, in reply, said, that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had assumed a false position, and argued the question upon it. But the case he assumed was not his (Mr. Berkeley's) position at all. He confessed he was greatly astonished and not a little amused at hearing papers read against the ballot, which he himself had but two years ago urged upon the House in favour of the ballot. He had never contended for a sham ballot, or said that anything like open voting was what he desired. By "ballot" its supporters meant secrecy at the polling-booth, and nothing else, and the use of open voting papers, or boxes or urns open to public inspection were, in effect, the same as viva voce voting. And when he quoted America, it was in support of the position that though there had been irregular elections of open voting in some States, there the votes were open, and the evils were such that the Americans were altering it, and were adopting the system he desired to see established; namely, the system of close and secret ballot. The only case where the ballot was successful was, when the voting was perfectly secret. The right hon. Gentleman set up America as that which he (Mr. Berkeley) believed to be perfection; he could only say that was not his opinion. The American was not a model system; but the Chancellor of the Exchequer had addressed himself entirely to prove that open voting in America was not successful, and he (Mr. Berkeley) made him a present of that fact. He had ignored the case of Australia and the Colonies, and so had the noble Lord, rather ungratefully, as it seemed to him, being, as he was, the parent of the constitution of that colony. But in that constitution he left out the only way which experience showed was necessary to secure free voting. Since the ballot was adopted that constitution, which failed before, had proved perfectly successful. But the noble Lord said, that in England some isolated cases of intimidation might have crept in. Had he forgotten the Committee of Mr. Grote, and the 900 pages they had on the malversations of elections? Where did he find improvement now? He must say that he was disappointed that his noble Friend did not support the ballot. Even at the last London election his language was such as to lead him to suppose that the noble Lord had no strong opinion against it. The noble Lord, had, indeed, never pledged himself to the ballot; but he had often raised the cup to the lip of its supporters, and then dashed it away; indeed, a relative of the noble Lord, a distinguished officer of that House, had publicly made such a statement as was well calculated to raise the hopes of the London constituency that the noble Lord had seen and eschewed the error of his ways. After the indulgence the House had shown him, he would not occupy further time, but he must express his astonishment at the noble Lord the Member for London again attempting to rely on the exploded fallacy that there was immorality in breaking a constrained pledge to do an improper act. Had the noble Lord forgot Paley? did he not remember the words of Milton—"Ease will retract vows made in pain as violent and void." And ought they not to be retracted? Although he confessed that his noble Friend had disappointed him, yet he never expected anything but opposition from the noble Lord at the head of the Government, nor did he think that anything would change the opinion of that House but a strong manifestation of opinion from without.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in explanation, remarked, that what he had said was, that although in America vote by ballot prevailed generally, yet that in only one State was it ever accompanied by compulsory secrecy, and that in that State this state of things only existed two years, and that the measure enforcing it had been since repealed; so that as far as the publications of the Ballot Society went, it did not appear that in any State of the United States the vote by ballot was now accompanied by compulsory secrecy.

Motion made, and Question put, "That leave be given to bring in a Bill to cause the Votes of the Parliamentary Electors of Great Britain and Ireland to be taken by way of Ballot."

The House divided:—Ayes 189; Noes 257: Majority 68.

REGISTRATION OF NEWSPAPERS.

PAPER MOVED FOR.

MR. AYRTON, in rising to move for a copy of the case submitted to the Law Officers of the Crown respecting the Registration of Newspapers and other printed Papers, and their opinion thereon, said, that as he understood his Motion was not to be assented to by the Government, he would briefly state the grounds upon which it was based. By the 60th of George III.—one of those Acts which were passed at a time when legislation for the benefit of the subject was not so common as now—it was provided that no publication, whether a newspaper or a pamphlet, should issue unless the publisher gave a recognizance to the Crown to the extent of £400, with two sureties to the like amount, in case the printed paper should contain any seditious or blasphemous libel. Shortly afterwards, when the unreformed Parliament was endeavouring to contend against public opinion, and to put as many fetters as possible on the liberty of the press, that law was extended so as to require security not only against seditious and blasphemous libels but against every possible conviction for libel that might take place. He need hardly say that this Act was a gross obstruction to the establishment of any public journal, and the publication of any pamphlet or other literary production; but some time afterwards, when an Act was passed for regulating the stamp duty on newspapers, provision was further made that every person desiring to publish a newspaper should register himself, his printer, and his publisher, in the office of the Commissioners of Taxes. The main object of that Act was to protect the revenue by regulating the collection of the stamp duty; but it would be recollected that two Sessions ago the duty on newspapers was repealed, and, in his opinion, the securities which the law provided for the due payment of the duty ought to have ceased at the same time. When the Act was under discussion, however, great opposition was raised to its entire repeal, and the provisions affecting registration remained in force. The Government were disposed to modify those provisions, while many hon. Members at that time desired that the law should be wholly abrogated; but, in order to avoid any opposition to so desirable a measure as the repeal of the newspaper duty, they were content to accept a Bill confined to that one object, leaving untouched those restrictions, which had been introduced merely to facilitate the collection of the stamp duty. Whatever might have been the views of Parliament, it was quite clear that the moment the duty ceased to be paid, the public regarded the whole statute as obsolete; and, in point of fact, several newspapers had been published from time to time without any regard to the provisions of the law touching registration. No notice was taken of these publications by the officers of the revenue until a very recent period, when a circular was sent by the Board of Inland Revenue to many publishers, the concluding sentence of which was to the following effect:—

“The Board, on finding that several newspapers were published without registration or the required security since the passing of the Act, rendering optional the payment of stamp duty on newspapers, have thought it right to consult the law officers as to whether, the Act having ceased, it remained incumbent on the Board to enforce the provision regarding the registration of newspapers, and the opinion given by the law officers upon the question is, that that duty is still imposed upon the Board.”

Now, what he complained of was, that the Board of Inland Revenue had submitted an unfair and partial case, touching only a small part of the question, to the law officers of the Crown, who, if the whole matter had been put before them, would doubtless have given a much more comprehensive opinion than that ascribed to them in the circular to which he had referred—an opinion which would have rendered it incumbent upon the Board to prosecute, not only the publishers of newspapers, but every person who should issue any literary production in contravention of the statute. It was an abuse of power to single out a certain class of persons and punish them for violating provisions of the law which were equally disregarded by other portions of the community. The statute in question, one of the six Acts which were now universally condemned, was a disgrace to this country, and its enactments were so stringent and extravagant that no Government would venture to enforce them. It provided that any person who should print or publish for sale any newspaper, pamphlet, or other paper containing news, intelligence, or occurrences, or any remarks thereon, or upon any matter in Church or State, without giving recognizances in £400, with two sureties, to meet any charge of libel, would subject himself to certain penalties named in the Act. He did not think it possible that the Government could really intend to enforce all the provisions of such a statute, and in that case nothing could be more unfair than to apply the law to the publishers of newspapers, and exempt all other persons from its operation, and he considered the conduct of the Government in connection with this circular such an abuse of power, that he now asked the Government to lay the whole case before the House, in order that they might be able to judge whether they had dwelt with the whole subject or with only a small portion of it, with the view of making certain individuals the objects of persecution. In conclusion he might observe that he had received several petitions complaining of the manner in which the Government acted in regard to this question, and which he would lay on the table at the proper time. The hon. and learned Member concluded by moving for a copy of the case submitted to the law officers of the Crown respecting the registration of newspapers and printed papers, and their opinion thereon.

MR. W. WILLIAMS seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That there be laid before this House, a Copy of the Case submitted to the Law Officers of the Crown, respecting the Registration of Newspapers and other printed Papers, and their opinion thereon.”

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he confessed he did not very clearly comprehend the object of the hon. Member's Motion. The hon. Gentleman moved for a copy of a case submitted to the law officers of the Crown on the subject of the registration of newspapers, and the opinion given thereon. It was well known to hon. Members that it was not the habit of the Government to produce the opinion of the law officers of the Crown; they were confidential opinions, given for the guidance of the Government, and the value of such opinions, the freedom of counsel between the Government and their law officers would be at an end, if they were liable to be called for by the House. With regard to the object of the Motion, therefore, he did not think he was justified in acceding to it, and he hoped the hon. Gentleman, having had an opportunity of making his statement, would not expect that it should be granted. He would, however, proceed to answer the substance of the hon. Gentleman's remarks. Two years ago, when the stamp duty on newspapers, the compulsory stamp, was abolished, care was taken that the Act which was passed should not interfere with the registration of newspapers. He himself proposed the measure to the House, and he distinctly stated that it was intended simply to relieve the newspapers from the stamp duty, and not to touch any of the other parts of the law, one of which parts was the registration of newspapers, which was intended not merely for the convenience of the Government and the public, but to provide individuals who might be libelled with facilities for obtaining proof of the publication of such libels. The opinion of the law officers of the Crown was that the present law, as regarded registration, was not affected by the Act which removed the stamp duty. He did not know whether the hon. Gentleman had any doubt on the law, but if he had, he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) could only say that the law officers of the Crown had no doubt on the subject. If any complaint was made against the exercise of the discretion of the Government with regard to the use of the registration, that was a matter which might fairly be brought before the House; and if the hon. Gentleman would state to him any case of that kind, he would have it investigated; but, so far as he was aware, there was no such case.

MR. AYRTON said, he would take another opportunity of bringing the subject before the House.

Motion negatived.

SUPERANNUATION BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

LORD NAAS, in rising to move for leave to bring in a Bill to repeal the 27th section of the Superannuation Act of 1834, said he must claim the indulgence of the House for a short time even at that late hour (a quarter past eleven) while he laid before them a case worthy of attention, involving, as it did, the interests of a large number of some of the most devoted and most able servants of the Crown, and involving also a very serious grievance, which called for the immediate interference of the House. He approached the question with considerable diffidence, not from any doubt of the justice of his cause, but because he spoke in the presence of many who were better informed than himself upon the subject, and of others who were the authors of the Act of 1829, from which this system dated. The history of the superannuation of the Civil Service dated from 1810. Before that time no general system of superannuation existed, but various modes prevailed of providing retiring pensions for civil servants of the Crown. Life offices were created, the salaries of successors were frequently charged with pensions for the payment of their predecessors, and sinecures were created and pensions granted. In 1810 a general Act was passed, which dealt with the whole question of superannuation. In the Customs and Excise Department an old system of superannuation which had been the subject of various Treasury Minutes and Acts of Parliament still remained, but in 1812 a Bill was brought in by which the sum of £334,000, the amount of the old superannuation funds in the Customs and Excise, was swept into the Exchequer, and a general superannuation was granted to these civil servants on a liberal scale. That system continued up to the year 1820. A considerable period had then elapsed since the termination of the war, and the country was alarmed at the great expenditure upon various departments of the service. In that year Mr. Hume made his celebrated Motion in Parliament upon the subject, and an Amendment proposed by Mr. Banks, to the effect that an Address be presented to the Crown, praying that an inquiry might be instituted into all the branches of the public service, political as well as military, with a view to economy and retrenchment, was carried. Upon that the Treasury, adopting the course which had always since that time prevailed upon similar occasions when Parliament had been attacked by paroxysms for retrenchment, set to work in earnest, and made their first foray upon the salaries of the clerks in the Public Offices, and a Treasury Minute passed in the year 1821 laid down the principle that all persons in the civil service should pay a certain percentage upon their salaries, in order to form a superannuation fund, and fixing a scale of allowance for retiring officers; and in 1822 an Act was passed to carry the provisions of that Minute into effect. But in the Report to His Majesty, made by Lord Sidmouth, then Secretary of State for the Home Department, his Lordship said it appeared to him to be much more rational to assign to civil servants such unencumbered salaries as might be thought just for them to receive, than to resort to the complex and illusory system of ostensibly giving them a certain salary and then deducting a portion of it for compensation. That was Lord Sidmouth's opinion of the very system which was prevailing at the present day. However, notwithstanding this and similar remonstrances from various quarters that Act was passed. It provided that all civil servants should contribute to a superannuation fund by a deduction at the rate of two-and-a-half per cent from all salaries between £100 and £200, five per cent from all salaries above £200, and ten per cent from all salaries above the regulated amount—that was to say, beyond the amount which might be fixed as the future permanent salary of any civil officer. It was at the same time provided that in case of the death of any civil servant, or of his resignation or removal from office, without his having received any retired allowance, the whole amount of his contribution should be repaid. The principle of that Act, however, appeared to be so unjust that in the year 1824 it was repealed, and an Act was passed which provided that the whole charge for superannuation should again be placed on the public revenue, and that the amount of the deductions received under the previous Act, which amounted to the sum of £90,000, should be returned to the contributors. He had, therefore, in favour of the proposition which he intended to lay before the House, the strong fact, that the system of charging public servants for the superannuation allowance to be made them, was during its trial between the years 1822 and 1824 so universally condemned, that the Government felt bound to bring in an Act to repeal it after its trial for that period. Well, the new system continued for some years, until again the attention of the Legislature was directed to the heavy charge for superannuation, and in 1828 Sir Henry Parnell's Select Committee on Public Income and Expenditure, in their third Report, recommended the readoption of the system which existed between 1822 and 1824. They proposed, however, to make a distinction as to the scale of superannuation between the then existing civil servants and those who should be afterwards appointed, and they recommended that in the case of future appointments the scale should be so regulated that the whole charge should be provided out of the fund raised by deductions from their salaries without any cost to the public, while, at the same time, having regard to vested interests, the scale prescribed by the Act of 1822 should be maintained in the case of existing civil servants, and if there should be any deficiency in the fund that that deficiency should be made good from the public revenue. A Bill had been introduced by the then Chancellor of the Exchequer to carry those recommendations into effect, but after meeting with a strong opposition, headed by Lord Glenelg, that Bill was withdrawn. He had thus brought the history of the matter up to the year 1829, and from that year the system which at present existed dated. Up to that year there existed a system of superannuation to which the clerks in the public offices were not called on to contribute. This was the subject of such discussion in Parliament, and though the Bill of 1828 was withdrawn the Government in the following year showed that they had not given up the idea, for in that year a Treasury Minute was passed for the purpose of reducing at a future period the heavy charge for superannuation, and by that Minute deductions were imposed upon the salaries of all civil servants who might be thereafter appointed, at the rate of 2½ per cent on salaries not exceeding £100, and of 5 per cent on salaries exceeding that amount. A subsequent Treasury Minute, passed in 1831, regulated the mode of awarding retiring allowances, and in 1834 an Act was passed which carried those arrangements into effect. By that Act the scale of retiring allowances was fixed to commence at one-fourth of the salary after ten years' service, with a septennial increase until it ended at a maximum of two-thirds of the salary after forty-five years' service. It was easy to guess what the object of the Government was in 1834 in passing that Act. It was simply to reduce the public expenditure under the guise of a Superannuation Fund. The avowed object was, provision for civil servants; but, looking to the circumstances of the time in which that Act was passed—to the fact that public charges for effective servants had reached the amount of £21,000,000, and for non-effective £5,000,000—there could be no doubt that the bonâ fide object of the measure was the reduction of expenditure, while the Government endeavoured to persuade the country that in forcing the civil servants to contribute to the Superannuation Fund they were granting a boon to those servants. It might be asked why that Minute of 1829 was not protested against? The fact was, there was no one to protest against it; because as the Minute of 1829 was not retrospective, there was no one concerned in opposing it at the time. That legislation was for children unborn. Having thus sketched the history of the superannuation system, he would now show the manifold inequalities and anomalies which existed in it. The Royal Commissioners, who had presented their report in the spring of the present year, divided the civil servants as regarded superannuation allowances into five classes. The first class included the higher political and judicial offices and the diplomatic service, and to the persons in this class pensions were granted without deductions. In the second class were civil servants who received their appointment before the 4th of August, 1829, to whom superannuation allowances on a very liberal scale were given without any deductions. To the third class belonged civil servants appointed subsequent to the 4th of August, 1829, and those connected with the departments which, since the passing of the Act, had been brought under the operation of the Treasury order, their salaries were charged with deductions. The fourth class included those who were neither subject to abatements nor entitled to superannuation allowances; and the fifth, those who were not brought within the Act but obtained superannuations from the Treasury. Out of 56,740 employed in the civil service, at salaries amounting in the aggregate to £5,595,000, only 15,311 were subject to abatements; the other 41,429, whose salaries amounted to £3,172,000, were guaranteed their pensions, but suffered no abatements. This was one of the monstrous inequalities by which the system was characterized. But there was another anomaly to which he wished to call the attention of the House, and that was, the unequal operation of the tax on the different classes. To show the inequality between the second and third classes, suppose that A entered the service in 1828 at the age of twenty. He might after fifty years' service be entitled to a pension of £100 a year for which he would have suffered no abatement. If B entered the service in a similar capacity in 1830 he would after fifty years' service be entitled to a pension of only £66 13s. 4d., and would have suffered abatements to the amount of £1,049. The inequalities were not, however, confined to differences between classes, they were to be found in the treatment of different members of each class. For instance, in the Post Office, letter carriers, messengers, and mail clerks paid no abatements, but were entitled to superannuations. [Mr. WILSON made a gesture of dissent.] Superannuations had been granted to letter carriers who had served the country for a length of time. The officers in the higher departments of the office, however, were liable to abatements. In the same branch of the service the chief officers at London, Dublin, and Edinburgh suffered abatements, while those at Liverpool, Manchester, and Glasgow neither paid for superannuation nor received it. Some time ago it was discovered that the officers of some of the hulks at Portland and similar places suffered abatements, while the officers who were at Millbank, Dartmouth, and other prisons did not; but this inequality was removed by a Treasury Minute, passed in the year 1851, which abolished the deductions from the salaries of officers of the hulks, and granted them superannuations on a different scale of allowances. These were a few of the inequalities and anomalies which existed, and which might be multiplied almost ad infinitum. If different classes were differently treated, it amounted to this—that public servants were differently remunerated for the discharge of the same duties. So unsettled and so fluctuating had been the conduct of both the Government and the Legislature upon this question, that the civil servants could not consider that Act of 1834 as a final settlement of the question. In addition to these inequalities there were weighty objections to the whole system of the civil service. These objections might be divided into three classes. The first objection was that the civil servants were not altogether sufficiently remunerated. Into that question he did not propose to enter, and with it his Bill would not interfere. At the same time he might be allowed to state, that of 16,000 persons included in the second and third classes the average pay was only £141 per annum, and of two-thirds of that number the average salaries amounted to but £86 per annum. It could not be said that those amounts were exorbitant. Sir Charles Trevelyan had stated in his evidence before the Commissioners that the Treasury had lately, in fixing salaries which were not to be subject to deductions, fixed them at the same amount at which they would have stood if no abatements were to be made from them for superannuations. This was another proof that the civil servants were not overpaid, and that the question of superannuation ought not to be mixed up with that of the salaries. The second objection which they took was, that many of those who contribute to the fund do not get any benefit from it. Cases of this sort involving great hardships had come to his knowledge. In some cases men had died having contributed to the fund for a great part of their lives, and their wives and families had received no benefit from it. It was calculated that only one in seven of those who paid ever derived any advantage from the fund. It might be said that the amount of superannuation allowances fairly represented the amount of the contributions, but he felt convinced that the most delicate calculations of all the actuaries in the world could not persuade the six out of the seven who never received any allowance that they were fairly treated. The system partook of the nature of a tontine, and was liable to all the objections urged against tontines. It was, in fact, a species of gambling. The third objection was that the amount of reduction was more than equal to the whole superannuation paid. The tax at present amounted to upwards of £66,000 a year, and the allowances paid were only about £11,000. During the twenty-seven years that the Act had been in operation the civil servants had paid £900,000, of which £80,000 only had been returned to the contributors in the shape of allowances, leaving a balance of £820,000, which if it had been funded would have amounted to £1,000,000. Such were the imperfections of the superannuation system, and so great were the objections felt to it that in the beginning of last Session the Government brought in a Bill to amend it. That Bill was satisfactory so far as it went, but it did not deal with the question of the deductions. It was referred to a Select Committee, which went very deeply into the subject and agreed to several important Resolutions. The first Resolution, proposed by the noble Lord the Member for Lynn (Lord Stanley), and carried by a majority of nine to two, was neither more nor less than a condemnation of the whole system of reductions. It was as follows:—

“That in the opinion of this Committee it is desirable to do away with the system by which a portion of the salaries of civil servants is deducted on account of superannuation allowances.”

The second Resolution was proposed by the hon. Member for Horsham (Mr. Fitz-Gerald), with the exception of the words at the end, which were proposed by the hon. Member for Richmond (Mr. Rich), and only carried by a majority of one. It was,—

“That, as a condition of such deductions being done away, the rates of payment in the various branches of the civil service shall at the earliest possible period be revised, with due regard to the amount of deductions remitted.”

The consequence of the Report of that Committee was that at the end of the Session the Government brought in a Bill which was founded on the Report; but, besides proposing to remove the deductions paid by the civil servants, it also proposed, in consequence of that remission, to reduce the salaries to the amount of the deduction remitted. It also proposed to calculate the superannuations which the civil servants were to receive upon the reduced scale of salaries, so that if it had passed into law the civil servants would absolutely have been in a worse position than they were now. The Bill consequently did not meet with general approval, and, owing partly to that cause and partly to the advanced period of the Session, it was withdrawn. In the recess the Government took the very wise and proper step of referring the whole matter to a Commission. That Commission was composed of Lord Belper, Lord Monck, Sir Alexander Spearman, the hon. Member for Southampton (Mr. Weguelin), and Sir Edward Ryan. Considering the high position and experience of the Commissioners, and the long time that this question had been debated, he was justified in looking at their decision in the light of an arbitration between the civil servants and the Government. On their decision he rested his whole case, and he craved the attention of the House to this very important passage of their report:—

“It has not been without much anxious consideration that we have arrived at the conclusion that it is our duty to recommend the total abolition of deductions for the purpose of superannuation, without any corresponding reduction in the salaries on which such deductions have been charged. Our first impression in entering on the inquiry referred to us was adverse to this arrangement; but on a careful review of all the difficulties of the case we became satisfied that, with a view to public interests alone, we could recommend no other settlement of the question as likely to be permanent and satisfactory. We are aware that the present system of deductions has had high authorities in its favour, and at the time when it was introduced it may have been considered a convenient mode of carrying into effect the unpopular measure of a general reduction of salaries. Nevertheless, for the reasons which we have already stated, we believe it to be unsound in principle; and we think that its inherent defects have developed themselves in difficulties of administration, of which the effect has been to create a mass of anomalies and inconsistencies most injurious to the public service. In this, as in other similar cases, it may be found impracticable to escape from a vicious principle and to establish a reasonable and uniform system without some temporary pecuniary sacrifice. But, believing that there is no other satisfactory solution of the difficulty, being confident that the ultimate advantage of the public will be much more than a compensation for any possible temporary loss, and having regard to the importance of maintaining the character and efficiency of the civil service, we are of opinion that by the recommendation which we have made we shall best discharge the duty which has been assigned to us."

A recommendation more strong or more forcibly expressed he never met with. One word with regard to the pecuniary loss which his proposition might occasion to the Exchequer. That loss, he believed, might be amply compensated if this question were sincerely taken up, and a thorough revision made of the salaries of all the civil servants. By selecting such of them as were thoroughly efficient and giving them to understand that they would be treated well and liberally paid a great reduction might be made in the present number of the civil servants. Moreover, the superannuation allowances granted several years ago were much more liberal than the present scale, and of course as the present recipients died off there would be a reduction of expenditure in that respect. But even if a slight addition were made to the national burdens by his proposition, he believed that it would be amply compensated by converting a discontented into a contented and cheerful class of men. There was a precedent for the course which he recommended. He alluded to the measure adopted in 1847 with regard to the Chelsea pensioners on the Motion of Lord Panmure, then Mr. Fox Maule, and which was regarded as just, notwithstanding the addition which it made to the public burdens. Up to that year the pensioners were subject to a deduction of 5 per cent from their pensions, on account of their being paid in advance. This, however, was remitted to them, and thus a charge of £60,000 a year was thrown on the country. The Government had no reason to justify them in refusing to deal with this question. They had been asked several times this year whether they intended to bring in a Bill on this subject, but they merely replied that until the question which the Committee had put to the actuaries with regard to the deductions under the Act of 1834 had been answered, they could not undertake to submit any proposition to the House. But, as the system established by that Act had been unequivocally condemned by the Committee itself, and also by the Commission, the answer to that question could not at all affect his proposition. He thought he had shown that there was a sufficient reason for the immediate abolition of the Superannuation Tax, and as the Government declined to do anything in the matter, he called upon the House to support his Bill. The remedy which he proposed was sharp and decisive, it was to introduce a Bill containing but one clause, repealing the 27th Section of the Act of 1834 which authorized the deductions. This course, however, would not prevent the Government from imposing such conditions as they might deem necessary. Those conditions might be discussed hereafter. The merits of the civil servants had been admitted from time to time by every eminent statesman. The civil servant was seldom rewarded by popular applause. He worked generally in retirement and often in obscurity. The only reward which he could hope to receive was his small salary and the consciousness that he had faithfully discharged his duty. If the Government admitted that the grievances of which the civil servants complained ought to be abolished, he hoped that they would support his Bill, and endeavour to carry it through Parliament. If, however, they should refuse to give him their support, he hoped that they would state frankly what course they intended to take. The noble Lord concluded by moving for leave to bring in a Bill to repeal the 27th Section of the Superannuation Act, 1834.

MR. HANKEY said, he rose to support the Motion. He did not deny that the civil servants were bound by the terms of the Act of Parliament which was in force in reference to the civil service when they received their appointments, but the question was whether it was right to enforce an Act which had been found to work with grievous injustice towards them. It was a sound principle, acknowledged by all the highest authorities who had considered the subject, that the proper way of paying the civil servants was to give them a moderate salary, and to hold out to them the expectation of a moderate retiring pension when no longer able to discharge their duties. If the salaries were fixed on a fair and equitable scale then it was unwise and unjust to impose a tax upon them such as they were now subjected to. It was said that notwithstanding this tax there were always plenty of candidates for these offices. He believed that if a tax of 20 per cent.

were employed, the Government would still find an abundance of applications; but that would not prove the system to be a wise one. Was it a wise provision to make a man put by a certain amount of his daily earnings, when he might prematurely die, and his wife and family derive no benefit from it? The House had no right—it was not morally honest to call on the clerks of the civil service to make such a sacrifice. They could make a much better and safer use of their money themselves in providing for those who had a claim upon them than any Government or Parliament could possibly do. Where was the fund to which they were said to contribute? It had no existence. He defied any hon. Member to show that the amounts paid by those clerks were credited to them in any of the public accounts. He must say he regretted that the noble Lord had felt it his duty to bring forward this Bill, for it was derogatory to the character of the Government of this country that there should be quarrels and disputes between them and their servants. That House never could enter into the question truly, or settle it in any satisfactory manner. Nevertheless, the movement was in the right direction, and he would give it his support. He would prefer, however, to see the Government take up the question and settle it in a manner satisfactory both to the civil servants and the country.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Notwithstanding the late hour at which we have arrived (twenty minutes past Twelve o'clock), I shall feel it my duty to follow the noble Lord through the statements which he has laid before the House. The subject is too wide, the questions involved are too large, the civil service, whose interests are affected, is so important, and the sum of money which the noble Lord proposes to vote away is too great, to allow me to be silent on this occasion, or to pass the Motion by without putting the House in possession of what I consider to be the material facts of the case. I can assure the House that the task is not one that I have any desire to undertake; but I feel that it is a task from which, in the discharge of my duty, I ought not to shrink. The noble Lord has given a very clear, and, with one or two exceptions, which I shall presently notice, a very fair account of the origin of the present law with respect to superannuations. The true origin of the present state of things is this:—In the period immediately after the peace, the feeling in the House and country ran strongly in favour of economy, and one of the objects to which economy was directed was a reduction in the Civil Service Superannuations—"the dead weight," as it was called. I have before me the work of Sir Henry Parnell on financial reform, which embodies the general view held at the time, and in which he expresses a decided opinion against all superannuation pensions whatever. He says the salaries of the civil servants are unnecessarily high, so high as to afford every person adequate means of making provision for himself, and speaks of it as being undesirable that Parliament should grant them any superannuation pensions whatever. I do not coincide in that opinion. I only mention it to show the opinions in which this legislation began, and which there are in the House hon. Members old enough to remember. The Finance Committee at that time appointed recommended that reductions should be made from the salaries of the civil servants sufficient to create a fund out of which superannuation pensions might be paid, and an Act was passed embodying that recommendation. But when they came to apply the system to the salaries of existing civil servants, the strongest objections were made to it by them and by their friends in the House, on the ground that it was an undue interference with vested interests; that persons who had entered the service on certain conditions ought not to have those conditions disturbed by the interference of Parliament and by the imposition of an annual tax on salaries for the creation of a fund out of which superannuation pensions should be paid. The result was that the Act which enforced that system was repealed, and the sums actually received as abatements from the civil servants were, by the order of this House, repaid. In consequence of the failure of that attempt, the Treasury, on the recommendation of the Finance Committee in 1829, introduced the system at present existing, namely, that all persons entering the civil service after a certain day should be subject to a deduction from their salaries. Inasmuch as that regulation did not interfere with existing interests, and as everybody who accepted office had full notice of the deduction, it was thought a fair one, and was first embodied in a Treasury Minute, and afterwards, in 1834, in an Act of Parliament. Every civil servant who entered the service since 1829, and, subsequently, since 1834, has had full notice that he accepted office upon these terms, and knew that the full salary voted by this House was not the sum which he would receive, but that in case his salary was under £100 he would receive it subject to a deduction of  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent; and, if above £100, of 5 per cent. That regulation, as I have said, was embodied in an Act of Parliament; everybody had full notice; and there is not the smallest pretence for the assertion that any breach of contract has taken place with any portion of the civil service. The same Act of Parliament also introduced a certain scale of pensions, and, in like manner as each civil servant knew that he was liable to the annual deduction, so he knew that he would only receive a pension under the terms described by the Act. The question of a fund never arose. Neither the Treasury Minute nor the Act of Parliament contained a word about a fund. The Treasury made no fund; they merely accounted for the deductions, which were in the nature of a tax laid upon the salaries of the civil servants, and these deductions were annually stated in the papers presented to Parliament. There never was the smallest pretence for saying that the whole matter was not fully within the cognizance of Parliament. Remember, I am not now justifying the system, but describing the way it arose. That system has continued from 1834 down to the present time under the operation of an Act of Parliament, but as the number of civil servants who were liable to the abatement increased, which they did in successive years, and as the operation of the war income tax made itself felt, the deduction from the salary of 5 per cent under the superannuation tax, and of 6 per cent under the income tax, no doubt pressed very hardly upon them. Their complaints gradually increased, owing to the joint operation of these two causes, and on succeeding to the office I now hold, I found that many representations were made, that the question had been brought forward in this House, and I was also informed that a Bill had been prepared in the Treasury which dealt with the subject to a certain extent, making no alteration in the abatements, but introducing an improvement in the scale of pensions. In the beginning of the Session of 1856, I introduced a Bill which brought the subject under the notice of the House, and at the same time, wishing to treat the question in the fairest manner, I moved for a Select Committee, in order that the measure which I had introduced should undergo consideration by it, but principally for the purpose of enabling the House to hear the complaints of the civil servants and examine the foundation upon which the existing system rested. The complaints in question turned very much upon the opinion as to the existence of a fund to which the noble Lord has adverted, and also upon the circumstance that, as it was alleged, the civil servants paid more than they received, that the bargain between them and the public was an unfair one, that the public gained more than it was entitled to, and that the deductions were, in fact, an unjust arrangement between the two parties. This matter was very fully gone into, and during the course of the investigation, the Committee desired that the opinion of two eminent actuaries should be taken upon a question which involved the equity of the case of the civil servants—that is to say, whether or not they paid more than they received. The matter was accordingly referred to by two actuaries, who found it involved such a vast quantity of numerical details, that they were unable to complete their report before the Committee terminated its sittings; and, therefore, the Members of that Committee were not assisted in their decision by the opinions of these two gentlemen. The Committee, however, came to an important Resolution as affecting the subject of the noble Lord's Motion. They resolved, upon the Motion of the noble Lord the Member for Lynn (Lord Stanley), "that in the opinion of this Committee, it is desirable to do away with the system by which a portion of the salaries of civil servants is deducted on account of superannuation allowances." They, therefore, condemned the system of annual abatements. When this Resolution was under the consideration of the Committee, a noble Lord not now in the House, but who then represented Portsmouth (Lord Monck), at my suggestion (for I was Chairman, and could not myself propose it) moved the addition of these words:—"With respect to all persons who may enter the civil service after a future day to be named." The proposal which seemed to me an equitable one was, that we should leave all those persons now in the civil service in their present positions, without varying the terms upon which they accepted office, but that the system of deductions should be abolished with regard to all future civil servants.

The noble Lord (Lord Stanley) acceded to that Amendment, but the majority of the Committee were hostile to it, and therefore the Resolution was carried simply as a condemnation of the system of annual abatements. However, the Committee felt the difficulty they had to encounter in making an indiscriminate addition to the salaries of the existing civil servants without any corresponding increase of duty on their part, without any claim on the ground of merit, but simply because this tax had been imposed, and it was now thought advisable to remit it. The Committee, on consideration, felt the difficulty of adding £60,000 or £70,000 a year to the salaries of the civil servants without any apparent reason, and therefore they came to this additional Resolution, which, as they thought, would meet the difficulty. They resolved:—

“That as a condition of such deductions being done away with, the rates of payment in the various branches of the civil service shall at the earliest possible period be revised, with a due regard to the amount of deductions remitted, as there is no ground for an indiscriminate augmentation of salaries, which would otherwise result from the change proposed; that the revision now referred to shall be made previous to the 1st of April, 1857, when the abatements shall cease.”

I certainly understood this Resolution to mean that the Treasury should revise all the salaries of the existing civil servants, and that, except in some special cases which might require peculiar consideration, they should reduce all the present salaries to an amount equivalent to that of the abatements, so that, although the abatements themselves should be abandoned, the total amount of the salaries received should be unchanged. That was the effect of the Resolution come to by the Committee, and it was embodied in the Bill, which, however, came under the consideration of the House too late in the Session to be passed into law. I was pressed to abandon it, and having done so, in deference to what appeared to be the opinion of the House, there the matter ended for that Session. During the recess, it appeared desirable to Her Majesty's Government that this matter should undergo further investigation, and, accordingly, a Commission was issued, composed, as the noble Lord has with great candour admitted, of very able and competent persons, who produced a Report, the ability of which must be generally recognized. But the question which now arises is, whether the House shall at once proceed to repeal the clause in the Act of 1834 without any further legislation on the subject, merely upon the suggestion of the facts brought under their notice to-night. The noble Lord did not state to the House that the recommendations of the Commissioners involved a great number of questions which do not belong strictly to the subject of these abatements, and if he founds his case upon the Report of the Commissioners he is bound to give effect to the whole of their recommendations. The noble Lord said that it would be competent for the House, if they gave him leave to introduce his Bill, to accompany it with conditions which might restrict its operation. In answer to that, I beg leave to say that such a proposal does not meet the case. The recommendation of the Commissioners refer to many subjects quite independent of the conditions for the abolition of the abatement. In the first place, they recommend a new scale of pensions. Well, that can hardly be considered a restriction upon the abolition of the abatements; it is a separate subject which requires careful consideration. They further recommend an alteration with regard to the age of retirement, a provision respecting compulsory retirement, another respecting gratuities to be allowed to public servants, another with reference to compensations. They also make a recommendation respecting political pensions, another as to the pensions of judicial officers, to be arranged on a separate scale; and other recommendations refer to dockyard officers, the department of the Post Office, and the class of extra clerks. Those are the matters which, if the House be inclined at this moment to take up the subject, it will be absolutely necessary in some way to deal with. Another part of the question which must be considered is the great magnitude of the sum involved, and the importance of not taking a hasty step or legislating on imperfect information on account of the large pecuniary interests which are at stake. I will just state what is now the entire charge for pensions and superannuations of the civil service, and the House will see how large a sum we have to deal with. The diplomatic pensions amount to £25,718; the judicial and legal pensions and compensations for loss of office or fees amount to £240,551; the civil service pensions under the Superannuation Act amount to £867,295; and the pensions granted to artificers of the navy and ordnance amount to £74,700, making a total of £1,208,264 per annum now payable in respect of superannuation allowances to the civil service, and with a large portion of which we are asked to deal according to the Bill of the noble Lord. At present the Act is in this form—that all the departments which are brought under its operation are subjected to annual deductions, and that those departments which are not brought under its operations are not subjected to annual deductions, and are not entitled to the superannuation pensions. The present rule, therefore, with regard to deductions draws a line in some measure between those offices which are entitled to superannuation pensions and those which are not; and if that clause of the Act of 1834 were simply abolished without any further legislation, a large class of salaried officers would immediately come upon the Treasury, and would apply for superannuation pensions, on the ground that they were now equally entitled with the rest, inasmuch as the system of deductions was abolished. The salaries of civil servants, subject to deductions under the Act of 1834, amount to £2,426,699 per annum, and the salaries of civil servants not subject to deduction amount to £4,910,602. Officers of the latter class are not now entitled to superannuation pensions; but if we simply abolish the present abatements, without taking a general view of the subject, and adopting the precautions which such a change in our system necessitates, we shall find a heavy permanent charge added to the expenditure of the country. I am perfectly willing to concede to the noble Lord that the present system, under which superannuation allowances are granted, is full of anomalies and inconsistencies, and that the present rule with respect to the abatements is far from satisfactory. I cannot admit, however, that the creation of a fund was ever promised either by Parliament or by the Government; neither can I admit that there has been any breach of a contract by any Government. The Commissioners themselves distinctly state their opinion that no such breach of contract has taken place, and that the civil servants have no claim on the ground of equity for the proposed change. The Commissioners recommend the change on the ground of expediency. They say, “the system is a bad one; you must pay forfeit for the abolition of it; you cannot get rid of it without surrendering £60,000 or £70,000 a year, and we think the system is so bad that we advise you to abandon it even at that cost.” I admit, then, that the system is a bad one, and I regret that it was ever introduced. Still, it was deliberately introduced by Act of Parliament in 1834; that Act of Parliament has been in force ever since. All persons who have entered the civil service since that time have been perfectly cognizant of its provisions, and all the salaries of the present officers have been received subject to those deductions. Moreover, most of the great departments of the Government have been repeatedly revised since 1834; the salaries have been fixed with the knowledge that they were subject to these abatements; they have been received with that knowledge; and, I may add, that though the salaries of the political officers have in many cases undergone reduction during the last twenty years, yet that the alteration of the salaries of the general body of the civil service has been in the shape of increase, and not of diminution. Under these circumstances, I cannot admit that there is any equitable ground for the claim of the civil service. It is a matter, no doubt, for the consideration of this House whether they will make such an alteration in the law as will confer this immediate and indiscriminate increase of salaries upon the civil service. It is a mistake to suppose that this is a matter which is within the competency of the Executive Government. The Executive Government has no power to make the change that is suggested. The provision is included in an Act of Parliament; the present abatements are a tax upon salaries which is levied upon the authority of an Act of Parliament like any other tax; the Treasury is merely ministerial in the matter, and an Act of the Legislature will be necessary to effect the proposed alteration. Looking, then, to the extensive consequences of the simple alteration of one clause which the noble Lord proposes, and considering the necessity of legislating upon this subject—if it is to be legislated upon at all—in a more comprehensive manner and with a wider regard to consequences than is now proposed, it is not in my power to vote in favour of the Motion of the noble Lord. I would also say, that I do not see how the Government would be justified in undertaking to do anything with regard to this question until the Report of the actuaries has been received. The subject is now under the consideration of the actuaries, and the Commissioners promise the result in a supplementary Report. Under all the circumstances, then, and looking at the position in which the question stands, I do not see how it would be possible for me to accede to the Motion of the noble Lord. It is for the House to say whether the question can be decided in this summary manner, and whether, as guardians of the public purse, considering the large sum of money involved in this Motion, they think themselves justified in deciding in favour of it.

SIR FRANCIS BARING said, this was a question of so much importance as concerning the whole Civil Service, that the House ought not to come to a conclusion upon it without the fullest discussion. As that was impossible that evening, he hoped his right hon. Friend would waive his objection to the introduction of the Bill and allow the discussion to be taken on the second reading.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he was willing to assent to the introduction of the Bill, provided that it was fully understood that the object of such concession was merely to give an opportunity for fuller discussion, but the noble Lord must not be misled into believing that the Government would agree to the principle of the measure which was proposed.

(No. 1).

MEDICAL PROFESSION (No. 1) BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That the Bill be now read a Second Time.”

MR. CRAUFURD said, that in moving that the Bill be read a second time on that day six months, he would glance at the history of former attempts at legislation on the subject of medical reform. In the course of last year, his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Headlam) introduced a measure, on which considerable labour had been bestowed, and which to a great extent elicited the united support of the medical profession, more especially of the large body of practitioners constituting the Provincial Medical Association. To secure the unanimity necessary to give a measure of that kind a fair chance of success, it was framed on the principle of a compromise. With the view to carry out that spirit in the fullest sense, and to do justice to certain Universities and other bodies concerned in the question, his noble Friend (Lord Elcho) also thought proper to bring forward a second Bill, when the House, having regard to the magnitude of the interests involved, and anxious to avoid hasty legislation, decided on reading both of the measures a second time, and then referring them to a Select Committee. The task entrusted to the Committee was that of investigating the merits of the various compromises suggested by the Bills, in order, if possible, to gather from them some means of settling a long dispute. Most of the hon. Gentlemen who composed the Committee were Members of the present Parliament; and though they entered upon their inquiry with the greatest discordance of opinion, yet, by dint of the most careful attention to the subject, together with an earnest determination to arrive at a practical result, their differences were gradually eliminated, and rarely has a Committee come to a more unanimous conclusion than that they ultimately came to. The consequence was the framing of a measure considerably modifying the one proposed by the hon. and learned Member for Newcastle (Mr. Headlam), and assuming the form now presented to the House by the Medical Profession (No. 3) Bill, introduced by the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho). In the shape in which that Bill came down from the Committee it almost entirely coincided with the measure which had been originally drafted by the Provincial Medical Association, but which had been modified in some of its details in the Bill introduced in 1856 by the hon. and learned Member for Newcastle (Mr. Headlam), in order to conciliate the corporations, who threatened to offer to it a strong opposition. Everything was in a fair train for the solution, in a manner satisfactory to all parties, of a very difficult and tangled question, when unfortunately the late period at which the Committee concluded their labours rendered it necessary that the matter should stand over till another Session. Since then his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Headlam) introduced a Bill last Session, which he presumed was the same as the Bill now under discussion, but which, owing to the dissolution early in the spring, was not printed. Now, it was certainly not a little extraordinary, after there had been a complete investigation of this subject by a Committee, that his hon. and learned Friend should almost wholly disregard the decision of that Committee, and should again introduce a Bill nearly identical with that brought in by him in the Session of 1856. He regretted this exceedingly, because, when they had got so far on the road to a reform of the medical profession, it was hardly wise to take what appeared to him a retrograde course, and by raising a new element of discord, create a fresh impediment to the settlement of that important question. What were the provisions of the Bill? It betrayed a greater anxiety to consult the interests of the corporations than he thought the House would sanction, by compelling every person who had passed an examination and who was to be entitled to practise, to become a member of some one of these corporations, and, what was more, it confirmed in perpetuum to these bodies the large fees which most people thought it highly desirable to abolish. Now, he (Mr. Craufurd) did not want to upset vested interests, but he was certainly indisposed to perpetuate an expensive system like that now existing, and to continue these corporations in the possession of privileges which were no longer suited to the spirit of our times. His noble Friend (Lord Elcho) made no such proposal. Bill No. 3 dealt tenderly with vested interests; it did not sweep away the medical corporations, which had undoubtedly done much good in their time, and which might continue to be beneficial to the profession if put on a sound basis; but, on the other hand, while preserving their dignity and prestige, it did not compel students before they could be admitted to practise to pay heavy fees to these bodies. It required that students should pass a preliminary and a professional examination, that there should be a minimum of qualification; it constituted a board of examiners from the corporations and the universities which now exercised the privileges of admitting to practise; it enacted that the title to practise should no longer be absolutely given by them, but after the student had been admitted to practise, he might still, if he chose, stand the examination, and obtain the higher degrees of any of the colleges of physicians or of surgeons, and affix to his name the additional title he would thus acquire. His noble Friend would, in fact, preserve the existing rights of these corporations, but would not compel a practitioner to pay to them the large fees which they at present obtained. That was one important change which the Bill of his noble Friend would effect. Another distinction between the Bill of the noble Lord and the hon. and learned Gentleman referred to the medical council. Last Session he (Mr. Craufurd) confessed that he was much wedded to the principle of a representative body. He thought it very fair that the profession should regulate itself, and that if it were possible to concoct a workable council on the representative principle, that would be the proper course to pursue. He must say, however, that the discussion which had taken place in the Committee upstairs, and the fuller consideration of the subject brought before them, had induced him to change his opinion. Though in theory a representative council might be thought the best, he was now convinced that it would be impossible for such a body to work in a manner satisfactory to the profession; that from its size it would be unwieldy and unmanageable, and that though nominally based on a system of representation, it would not have within itself that element which was essential to its proper working, namely, the element of responsibility. On the other hand, however objectionable in principle a Council nominated by the Government might be, a body so constituted would certainly be responsible to the country through Government; the head of the Council would have a seat in that House; and thus you really carried out the principle of responsibility to the public; whereas by the Bill of the hon. and learned Gentleman, though you got the shadow of responsibility, the substance would in reality evade you. These were the main features of difference between the two measures proposed on this subject. For his own part, he owned that he thought the Bill now more immediately under discussion was in no way calculated to advance the interests of the medical profession, though it would increase the privileges of certain corporations at the cost of the public. The Bill of his noble

Friend would reduce the expenses of students by requiring them simply to pay a small fee on the first preliminary general examination, and a somewhat larger fee on admission to the profession upon the second examination. These two comparatively small fees would replace the enormous ones now levied, and thus a great boon would be bestowed on the profession. It was most desirable that a uniformity of authority should be obtained in this matter. At present it was necessary, in order to enable a medical man legally to practise in every part of the kingdom, that he should have received not less than twenty-two diplomas, and that he should have paid fees to as many colleges or other corporate bodies. It would have been more for the honour and dignity of the medical corporations to have rested on their long and deserved reputation, and the feeling of the country in their favour, and have come forward and said, "We will not seek to obtain by Act of Parliament that which the country would refuse to give us without an Act of Parliament." Let them throw themselves upon the country then, and they would find that when placed upon a broad and popular basis they would receive the public support. He would not detain the House further, but conclude with moving as an Amendment that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

MR. BLACK seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

VISCOUNT BURY said, the effect of the Amendment, if carried, would be to substitute the Bill of the noble Lord (Lord Elcho) for that of the hon. and learned Member for Newcastle. The difference between the two measures was, that whilst the Bill of the noble Lord provided that the medical board should be appointed jointly by the Board of Health and the Privy Council, in certain proportions for England, Scotland, and Ireland, the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Newcastle provided that each of the licensing bodies now in existence should send one representative to the Board, to sit with a certain number of Gentlemen to be nominated by the Government. Now, as a lover of the representative principle, he could not but think that the latter was the better system of the two. The hon. and learned Member for Ayr (Mr. Craufurd) had pointed out the inexpediency of placing power in the hands of corporations which had already proved themselves incompetent to exercise it, but it should be remembered that though these licensing bodies might have failed, when acting singly, to use their power with good effect, that was no reason why, when they were supplied with the means of combination and united action for the advancement of the common object, they should not do all that could be required of them. The noble Lord's Bill called upon the House to believe that the President of the Board of Health would send to the Council better qualified persons than these licensing bodies, composed, as they were, of men who had devoted their whole lives to the study of their profession. He feared, too, lest this system of nomination should be made use of as a political engine; that when one party was in power, the most necessary qualification for Members of the Council would be that they should be good Whigs, and so with the other side of the House. The only objection he had heard to the Bill of his hon. Friend was, that it perpetuated the absurd distinction between physicians and surgeons; but he could not see that there was any foundation for such a charge. On the other hand, he considered that the Bill of the noble Lord would really perpetuate the system of having two classes of medical men. On another point, he certainly looked upon the Bill of his hon. and learned Friend as superior to that of the noble Lord, because it provided no exclusion for what were called medical heresies. If such men as Jenner and Harvey had lived under such a Bill as that of the noble Lord, he had no doubt that, owing to the jealousy which unfortunately always distinguished an exclusive profession, they would have been placed beyond the pale. The measure brought forward by his hon. and learned Friend provided that there should be no such exclusion, and this, among other reasons, would determine him to vote in its favour. He also preferred the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Newcastle, on the ground of the examination which it prescribed, though he hoped the provisions on this subject would be rendered more explicit in Committee.

COLONEL SYKES said, there were parts of both Bills to which he objected. Each of them professed the same desire—namely, that of raising as high as possible the standard of qualification in the medical profession; and each proposed further, that individuals who passed certain examinations should be then entitled to practise throughout the British dominions without further impediment. The object of the Bills, therefore, being the same, the question turned upon the difference in their machinery. In the first place, he would express his entire concurrence in the principle of representation as opposed to that of nomination by the Crown. He thought, however, that the Bill of the hon. and learned Gentleman was objectionable, on account of the four examinations which it proposed. The noble Lord's Bill proposed only one examination, as a passport to an individual to exercise his profession in all parts of the world; whereas the other Bill would greatly multiply examinations. Again, the hon. and learned Member's Bill would increase the expense in fees. Whilst under the noble Lord's Bill the whole expense would not exceed £25 or £30, the expense under the hon. and learned Member's Bill, independently of the cost of registration and other payments, would be £111 18s. for the diploma of physician alone. Then, again, the University element was ignored in the Bill of the hon. and learned Member. It appeared to him that such a University as Marischal College should have its diplomas accepted with the utmost confidence throughout the British dominions. By Bill No. 1 the Universities of Glasgow, St. Andrew's, and Aberdeen, were to send one representative to the general Council, and if they could not agree in their choice, it was left to the Crown to select any one of the three names so sent up. Now, this was an indignity offered to the Scotch Universities which he thought quite sufficient to condemn the Bill of the hon. and learned Member, which he should, therefore, feel bound to oppose, while he must also vote against the noble Lord's measure, because it was based on the objectionable principle of nomination to the Council, instead of representation.

CAMBRIDGE BOROUGH ELECTION.

REPORT.

MR. DEASY reported from the Select Committee appointed to try and determine the matter of the Petition of Robert Alexander Shafto Adair, complaining of an undue Election and Return for the Borough of Cambridge; That on the meeting of the Committee this day at the hour to which they had adjourned from the previous sitting, the Marquess of Blandford, one of the Members of the said Committee, did not attend, and was not present within one hour after the meeting of the Committee, and that he the Chairman had received a certificate from Edward Headland, Surgeon, verified upon oath before Joseph Prior, Mayor of Woodstock, and stating that the Duke of Marlborough was alarmingly ill, and in a state that made his recovery very improbable:

That the Marquess of Blandford was at the bedside of his father, and it seemed absolutely necessary, on every ground, that he should remain with him; and that a Letter had since been received by the Chairman from the Marquess of Blandford, stating, that his father's death had subsequently taken place.

Certificate delivered in, and read, as follows:—

"I hereby state that the Duke of Marlborough is alarmingly ill, and in a state that makes his recovery very improbable.

"Lord Blandford is at the bedside of his father, and it seems absolutely necessary on every ground that he should remain with him.

"EDW. HEADLAND, Surgeon."

"Blenheim, June 30, 1857.

"Deposed and sworn before me, JOSEPH PRIOR, Mayor of Woodstock."

Ordered, That the Marquess of Blandford be excused for not attending, and be discharged from further attendance on the said Committee.

MR. DEASEY further reported from the said Committee, That they had adjourned till this day, at half after One of the clock.

Ordered. That the Report do lie upon the Table.

MR. GROGAN asked if it were competent for the Committee now to proceed with the investigation of the case before them?

MR. SPEAKER: It is distinctly provided by Act of Parliament that they may do so.

DEBATE RESUMED.

COLONEL FRENCH said, that the noble Lord (Lord Elcho) was bound to rise and give his reasons why the House ought to refuse to read the Bill a second time, in order to enable him to bring the measure which he thought necessary before the House. Now, so far as he (Colonel French) could gather, there was every reason to believe that the object the noble Lord had in view might be effected in Committee; and certainly no ground whatever had been laid by the hon. and learned Member for Ayrshire (Mr. Craufurd) for postponing the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Newcastle. The noble Lord's name appeared on the notice paper as the mover of an Amendment against the Bill, but he had chosen to delegate this duty to another. It might be that he wished to have the last word; but it was only due to the House, after the notice he had given, that the noble Lord should put himself into the front rank. He, therefore, begged to call upon the noble Lord, to rise and state his reasons for asking the House to reject that measure.

MR. W. EWART said, that he did not see that the noble Lord was obliged to comply with the appeal which had been made to him by the hon. and gallant Member for Roscommon—[Lord ELCHO: Hear!] With reference to the general principle of the two Bills, he (Mr. Ewart) would grant that there was something fascinating in the principle of representation contained in the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Newcastle, but when he looked at the workable character of the two Bills, he must confess that he was inclined to give the preference to that of his noble Friend (Lord Elcho), which was certainly the more workable of the two. True, there might be an objection to the council being nominated by the Crown; but then it should be remembered that the Crown would be responsible; that there would be a person sitting in this House as the representative, more or less, of the medical body, and that he would be responsible to the House. It had been objected by the noble Lord the Member for Norwich (Viscount Bury) that the medical council would assume a political character; but he (Mr. Ewart) did not see that that would necessarily be the case more than with any other public department, the constituent Members of which were nominated by the Ministers of the Crown. For instance, there were constituent parts of the Board of Trade, the Board of Customs, the Board of Inland Revenue, and other boards, which were made responsible to Parliament; but they did not change their places with a change in the political character of the Government or of Parliament. Those persons continued to hold their offices notwithstanding such changes, so long as they gave satisfaction in the performance of their duties. He saw no objection to this principle, then, provided the Board so nominated was a national Board, responsible to Parliament, and both of these he believed it would be under the Bill of his noble Friend. On the whole, he certainly preferred the Bill of his noble Friend, which was more rational in its character, which respected but did not obey the medical corporations, and which, he believed, was more consonant with the wishes and interests of the medical practitioners generally. Much, therefore, as he admired the representative theory contained in the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Newcastle; yet, seeing that the Bill of his noble Friend contained the principle of representation, so far as to make the council responsible to Parliament, and that it was a more operative Bill, and more likely to be practicable than that of the hon. and learned Member, he should certainly give his support to the Bill of his noble Friend.

MR. HATCHELL said, the objection made out of doors to the first Bill seemed to be based chiefly on the ground that it had emanated from the medical profession itself; but that appeared to him to be a strong argument in its favour; for if there were one profession or calling in the community concerning which it was almost impossible for non-professional persons to be judges of the manner in which that profession ought to be conducted or controlled, it was this very profession of medicine. He supported this Bill because it contained the principle of representation; for he believed that it would be found impossible to form any governing bodies for the medical corporations and societies of the country, so as to enable them to act to the satisfaction of the profession without having recourse to the principle of representation. That was not his opinion only: it was the opinion of all the most competent persons who had considered the subject. He was himself unconnected with the medical profession; but he believed it was the opinion of all writers on the subject of medical reform, that three provisions should be introduced into any measure that should be propounded; firstly, that all persons who intended to practise medicine should undergo a preliminary examination in science and art; secondly, that they should pass a strictly professional examination; and, lastly, that there should be some system of registration, whereby it could be known who had, and who had not qualified themselves to practise. The Bill of the hon. Member for Newcastle contained these provisions, therefore he would support it. It was objected that the distinction between surgeons and physicians was invidious, and ought to be abolished, but he could not conceive any distinction less invidious than that which was acquired by greater abilities or superior attainments; and he believed that such distinctions were calculated to secure to the public a higher standard of competency in the profession than there would exist were all to be brought down to one dead level, as was proposed by the Bill of the noble Lord (Lord Elcho). He thought it would be unwise, moreover, to subvert those ancient institutions under which the medical profession had attained a position most creditable to the practitioners themselves and to the country.

MR. BLACK said, he was placed in an awkward position, for whichever of the Bills he might support, he should offend a portion of his constituents. He believed, however, that the best test of a medical man's competency was the opinion of the public, and that, however rigid might be the system of medical examination, men incompetent to practise would succeed in obtaining certificates of competency from the examiners. He admitted that before a man was allowed to practise as a surgeon or physician he ought to be examined as to his skill by competent persons; but why should he, after having obtained a certificate of his competency, be called upon to enter into a corporation, to submit himself to its regulations, and to pay certain fees? There ought not to be any class distinctions in the medical profession. Those who had attained the highest eminence in this country as consulting physicians, probably started in their public career by attending to infantile diseases. From mere surgeons they rose by their perseverance, and the increased confidence of the public in their ability, to the position of distinguished physicians. For his own part he should have preferred a more liberal measure than either of those before the House, but he would suggest that whatever was beneficial in Bill No. 1, should be engrafted on the No. 3 Bill, which he regarded as a better "stock." That part of the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Newcastle-on-Tyne which provided that there should be a council of representation was unanimously opposed by a deputation of Scotch medical practitioners; and so strong was the feeling of the medical profession against that provision that the Secretary of State for the Home Department assured the deputations that waited upon him that, although the Government, generally speaking, were in favour of the Bill, they would oppose that part of it. He (Mr. Black) objected to the Bill, because it gave such immense power to the corporations of the profession, and placed such restrictions upon its practice. One of its clauses provided that in the case of a practitioner removing from one part of the kingdom to another, he should not be allowed to practise in the place to which he had removed until the expiration of two years, so that he must remain perfectly idle for those two years. He (Mr. Black) had no desire to injure the ancient medical institutions, they had been of great service to the community; but he thought it should be optional with physicians or surgeons to enter them, and not compulsory. The majority of the profession would, no doubt, have the ambition to seek admission into them. No person was compelled to enrol himself a member of the Geographical or the Geological Society, and entrance into the medical corporations should be equally voluntary. It was not on the privileges which they might confer, but on his skill and good conduct that a practitioner ought to rely for his success.

MR. GROGAN said, that what the hon. Member who had just spoken wanted, was evidently free trade in medicine; but he contended, in opposition to that doctrine, that it was imperative upon the legislature to take care that the health and safety of the people were not entrusted to incompetent hands. It was a singular peculiarity of this debate, that Bill No. 3 was supported by all the hon. Gentlemen who came from the North of the Tweed, and Bill No. 1 by those who came from the southern part of the island. It was, however, universally agreed that it was desirable to improve the education of medical men, and that, for this purpose, mere voluntary study was not enough. It was a matter which must be put under regulations and restrictions, if they would have a well-educated body of medical men, and at this both Bills aimed, but they went about the accomplishment of the object in different ways. Under one Bill the Council was to consist of thirteen members, who were to be all selected by Government. Under the other, they were to be chosen by the different Colleges or Corporations. But, was it necessary, he would ask, that a science which had attained the highest rank should be placed under the control of a Council to be appointed by the Government? He (Mr. Grogan) preferring the representative system to the system of a nominated Council, preferred, therefore, Bill No. 1 to Bill No. 3, and though he did not, by any means, consider that measure as perfect, he believed that all Amendments could be better engrafted on it. But there were other points to be considered. Almost all the medical societies, the colleges, the schools of medicine, the universities, were all but unanimous in favour of Bill No. 1, with the exception of the universities north of the Tweed. Was the House prepared to run counter to the opinions of those medical men of the highest rank, and the greatest experience in this country, or in the world, as to the mode of teaching medical men in future? Dr. Hamilton Rowe, who recently pronounced the Harveian oration at the College of Physicians, declared that, if the Bill before Parliament (No. 3) passed into law, it would be subversive of the high tone of the profession, and cause the extinction of the college. It was impossible to avoid the worst results, if free trade in medicine were adopted. There was also another opinion to the same effect from an M.D. of Edinburgh. A paper had been laid before the House respecting the valuable museum of anatomical preparations maintained at such cost, and attended with such care, by the College of Surgeons; what was to become of that important museum if the funds of the college were placed under the control of the rival body proposed by the Bill of the noble Lord? Could it be expected, for a moment, that the same care, or attention, or cost would be expended on its maintenance? He (Mr. Grogan) thought, however, that other parts of both Bills were valuable—registration, for instance; and he candidly admitted that many points of No. 1 Bill might be changed with advantage; but he looked upon that Bill as a better stock on which to engraft such alterations as were necessary, and he should, therefore, support it in preference to the Bill of the noble Lord.

MR. NEATE said, he rose to warn the

House against the growing custom of undervaluing those ancient institutions which had done good service to the State, and of turning them to purposes for which they were never intended. Free trade and unrestricted competition were very good in, but very bad out, of their place. Free trade was a very good servant, but a very bad master. It was to monopoly that much of our progress in arts and sciences was due. That remark applied to the medical more than to any other learned profession. Did the House wish to see free trade, extended to the legal profession or to the Church? The noble Lord (Lord Elcho) asked them to enter upon a new course entirely at variance with that which had been pursued for many generations, and which had raised the medical and other learned professions to a degree of eminence, dignity, and usefulness, which they had not attained in any other country. He was speaking, however, as if the Bill of his hon. and learned Friend would sanction a monopoly; but it would do nothing of the kind. It would admit everybody without distinction to qualify himself for the medical profession, but it would also require, as it ought to do, that those who had been long connected with that profession should ascertain whether he had, in fact, so qualified himself before he was permitted to practise. The College of Physicians was, no doubt, for a time actuated by a spirit of selfishness and exclusiveness, but it had renounced that spirit, and was determined to meet, as far as possible, the requirements of the present state of society. The House of late had heard a great deal about the extension of Scotch writs and judgments, but he, for one, was not disposed to give increased currency to Scotch prescriptions with regard to the scientific societies of this country. It was for the interest of the State at large to maintain, in some shape or other, professional aristocracies, for if they were destroyed, the only other aristocracy which remained—that of wealth and position—would be placed in a more isolated and insecure position than before; and, therefore, from considerations of general and political expediency, as well as in respect to the health of the community, he should support the Bill of the hon. and learned Gentleman.

MR. VANCE said, he should support the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Newcastle, on the ground that it was a measure for the reform of the medical profession, while the Bill of the noble Lord was one of entire reconstruction, and in some cases of entire destruction, of existing rights and privileges. He thought that the different degrees of the profession recognized by the Bill were of great importance. No doubt it might do very well in a remote colony to do without professional distinctions, but in this country it would be a practice attended with the greatest possible inconvenience. It had been urged as a grievance that parties could not change their medical qualification for two years; but he (Mr. Vance) did not look upon that as a hardship, as the parties could give notice, and satisfy the heads of the profession that they were entitled to change. The hon. and learned Member for Ayr (Mr. Craufurd) said, that the institutions appointed to make examinations were obsolete, and behind the spirit of the age; but when it came to be considered that these bodies consisted of the Colleges of Physicians and Surgeons, and of the Universities, he could not allow the censure of the hon. and learned Member to pass without comment. With respect to the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Newcastle (No. 1), he considered that there were many points omitted; for instance, he considered that the Apothecaries Company of Ireland were not fairly treated in it; they did not wish to interfere in matters not pertaining to them, but he held that they were as well entitled as their brethren in England to form part of the examining body, with regard to pharmacy, poisonous ingredients, and matters of that kind. The Bill of the noble Lord violated existing rights, and took away pecuniary privileges which had been granted by Royal charter, while it did not provide for a preliminary education in medical science. The Bill of the hon. and learned Member did not do this, and he (Mr. Vance) thought, therefore, that the House should support it, as in so doing they would follow the principle enunciated by a great statesman, namely, to reform existing institutions, and change them in accordance with the wants of the age, but not to destroy them.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, the hon. Member for Oxford spoke of the House consulting the dignity of the medical profession by passing Bill No. 1. He (Mr. Duncombe) was not prepared to define what the dignity of the profession meant. He thought they were sent there for the welfare of the people, and not to promote any dignity; but at all events he could not fancy the dignity of the profession more insulted on any occasion than by the paper before the House, which contained no fewer than five medical Bills, or Bills relating to the medical and surgical profession. First, they had the Medical Profession Bill, No. 1, and Medical Profession Bill, No. 3. What had become of No. 2 he did not know, but he supposed it had taken the wrong medicine. Then there was the Vaccination Bill, for which he was responsible, and which was a Bill to repeal the Vaccination Act, smuggled through Parliament, and to take the parliamentary lancet out of the national arm. Then there was the Medical and Surgical Sciences Bill. There was only wanting the Poisons Bill, which was blundering through the other House, to wind up with the second reading of the Burials Bill, which also stood on the paper. In all these Bills, however, there was no provision made for the interest of the public. This country had already got a State religion and a State education; and it was now about to get State physic. He (Mr. T. Duncombe) objected to Bill No. 1 and to Bill No. 3; but he should vote for Bill No. 3 as against Bill No. 1, and then when Bill No. 3 came to a division he should vote against that also, to return the compliment. These medical reform bills were not what the country required. The people of this country wanted a Bill which should place all medical practitioners on an equal footing, after having undergone the same examination. That, however, would be impossible under the Bill of the hon. and learned Gentleman. The medical reform required was to do away with exclusive privileges of all kinds in the practice of medicine. The country had no confidence in chartered societies, as regarded real medical science, and he thought that a worse quackery even than medical quackery was legislative quackery. The Colleges of Physicians and Surgeons in London and Dublin had exclusive privileges no doubt, but they were not at all adapted to the present day. In short, they wanted a medical reform bill with something like a schedule A with Gattons and Old Sarums in the medical world. Look back to former days, and see the injury these colleges had done to the public in attempting to impede the march of medical science. The individual who first invented tourniquets to supersede hot pitch upon amputated limbs was persecuted;

while the individual who applied cantharides as a cure for dropsy—a German doctor in this country—was incarcerated in Newgate at the instance of the head of the College of Physicians. Could any confidence, then, be justly placed in the action of these bodies for the interest of the public? It was Sir A. Carlisle who said of medicine that it was an art founded on conjecture and improved by murder; and instead of appointing a council composed of the chartered bodies he would say, “Leave the Colleges of Physicians and of Surgeons, the one to prescribe for and the other to operate upon the public, and let the Apothecaries’ Company drench them both.” He (Mr. Duncombe) advised the House to reject the Bill on these grounds. He also advised the House to reject it because of the registration which it proposed. He wondered, for his own part, how the medical men of the United Kingdom could desire to be reduced to the condition of cabmen, and wear a badge round their necks. If, however, they wished to be badged and numbered, then, in Heaven’s name, he would say, let them be so; but as he considered that the public interest was not only not promoted, but was, on the contrary, injured by the kind of legislation proposed in these Bills, he should oppose the second reading of the Bill under discussion.

MR. BLAKE said, that he, as an Irish Member, should give his most strenuous opposition to Bill No. 1, and if the second Bill came to a division, he would vote with the Scotch Members in preference, because it would not destroy a numerous and valuable class of men, the apothecaries of Ireland, who were the poor man’s doctors, as the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Newcastle in effect proposed to do. He (Mr. Blake) was for placing the Irish apothecary on the same footing as the English apothecary in every respect.

MR. BRISCOE said, he should support the second reading of Bill No. 1 on account of the composition of the council. Under this measure the council would consist of seventeen representative members and of six nominated by the Crown. As six were to be nominated members there would be no difficulty in having one of them a Member of that House, while the seventeen representative members would ensure the confidence of the profession and of the public. So far from agreeing, therefore, with his hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury (Mr. T. Duncombe), he believed that in voting for the second reading of this Bill, he was honestly and conscientiously consulting the best interests of the public. As regards the fees paid to the College of Physicians for a fellowship, which amounted to £55, it was found that £25 went to the Government for the stamp, while £10 was applied to the support of the library. The remainder alone went to defray the expenses of the College.

LORD ELCHO said, that the hon. and gallant Member for Roscommon (Colonel French) had described the course which he (Lord Elcho) had pursued in this matter as an extraordinary one. Feeling that to a certain extent it was so, and admitting the justice of that remark, he must ask the kind indulgence of the House while he endeavoured to show that it was by a sense of public duty alone that he had been actuated in the course which he had taken. It was the more necessary that he should do so, because his motives had been subjected to misconstruction both by the profession and by the public out of doors, and it had been stated freely that his only object was either to obstruct medical reform or to rival his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Newcastle (Mr. Headlam) as a medical reformer. Now, with respect to obstructing medical reform, he assured the House that he was much too sensible of the necessity of some measure of reform with reference to the medical profession to throw any impediment in the way of it. The anomalies at present were so great and so injurious that he had long felt it to be desirable that some measure of reform should be carried into operation. He would just mention to the House three of the anomalies of the present system. In the City of Edinburgh there was a distinguished professional man, Professor Simpson, who was, perhaps, as eminent a man in his branch of the profession as any one in the kingdom. He was physician to Her Majesty in Scotland; but, under the present state of the law, if he were to be called to London in consultation with any of Her Majesty’s physicians on the subject of Her Majesty’s health, he would be liable to be prosecuted for practising within seven miles of London. Such of the population as resided within seven miles of the metropolis were the property of the Royal College of Physicians of London; that was their hunting ground; and if any medical man from Dublin or Edinburgh came to attend a gentleman in London with whose constitution he was acquainted, he would be liable to be prosecuted. Again, the degree of the London University was deservedly considered one of the highest medical diplomas in the world ; and a London University graduate might practise in any part of Great Britain except within seven miles of the very place where was situated the University from which he obtained his degree. The third anomaly was that the Archbishop of Canterbury possessed the power of granting medical degrees without examination. The hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. T. Duncombe) had quoted the analogy of the hackney cabmen with respect to registration. He (Lord Elcho) would follow up the figure, and he said that the present state of the law with regard to the medical profession was as absurd as if the cabmen in Palace Yard, with certain badges round their necks, could only convey hon. Gentlemen to Belgrave Square; and that those who asked to go to Hanover Square must procure a cab from some other quarter. So far from wishing to rival his hon. and learned Friend as a medical reformer, it would be sufficient to state that when his hon. and learned Friend gave notice of his Bill, he (Lord Elcho) asked him if it were the same as that which had been amended by the Select Committee on which they had both sat last Session, stating that, if it were so, any sort of assistance which he could give him was at his service ; and it was only upon finding that his hon. and learned Friend's Bill was not the amended Bill of the Committee, but the very same Bill, with the exception of some alteration in the constitution of the council, which his hon. and learned Friend had brought in at the commencement of 1856, that he determined to oppose it. He did not pretend to be a more practical man than others, but he ventured to think that if they wished to pass a good measure of medical reform, the practical course would be to take up the Bill in the amended state in which it had been left by the Committee at the end of 1856, and not to take it up as it had been introduced at the beginning of 1856. He (Lord Elcho) stood by the Bill of the Committee, and he asked the House to reject the Bill of his hon. and learned Friend, with the view of substituting in its place the Bill of the Select Committee ; because, whatever the fate of the Committee's Bill might be, he ventured to predict that the Bill of his hon. and learned Friend could not pass into a law. No less than three pages of the Parliamentary notice paper last year were filled with notices of Amendments upon the Bill of his

hon. and learned Friend as originally introduced. Altogether there were fifty-one Amendments on the paper, and inasmuch as every principle of that Bill, which was objected to at that time, was to be found, if possible in a more aggravated form, in the present Bill, he left the House to judge what chance it would ever have of passing into a law. He wished to discuss this question upon some broad and intelligible principle, because it appeared to him that such was the rule which they ought to lay down for themselves upon the second reading of a measure, in preference to dealing too much with matters of detail. But first let him read to the House the names of the hon. Members who composed the Select Committee of last Session. The Members were Mr. Cowper (in the chair), Mr. Headlam, Mr. Brady, Mr. Craufurd, Sir W. Heathcote, Mr. Napier, Lord R. Grosvenor, Mr. Black, Colonel Dunne, Mr. Bell, Mr. Strutt (the present Lord Belper), Mr. A. Hastie, Mr. Percy, Mr. Howard, and Lord Elcho. He considered that Committee to have been fairly constituted. Upon it were the three hon. Members whose names were on the back of the Bill of his hon. and learned Friend, and altogether he believed that there was no improper element in it. He had never sat upon a more unanimous Committee. Indeed, so unanimous had they been "upstairs," that he had ventured to express a hope that their proceedings in the House upon the subject of medical reform would be characterized by equal unanimity ; and, with the exception of Colonel Dunne, who was no longer a Member of the House, they all agreed to support one another upon the question, sinking all minor differences in the hope of getting the Bill through. To return now to the question of principle. The principle of the Bill of his hon. and learned Friend was that of giving a monopoly on the subject of medical education to the medical corporations. Upon that ground he (Lord Elcho) was opposed to the Bill now ; upon that ground he had been opposed to it last year ; and upon that ground he should continue to be opposed to it so long as it contained the principle in question. At the present moment there were twenty-one licensing bodies in the United Kingdom. Of those, eleven were universities, and nine were corporations, the twenty-first being the Archbishop of Canterbury. His hon. and learned Friend in his Bill gave the whole licensing power to the corporations, and to the corporations alone. It was true that in the council he gave a certain amount of power to the Universities, but even in the council the proportion given to the Universities was not fair in comparison with the number given to the corporations. By the Bill of his hon. and learned Friend also every member of an University was compelled, before he could be recognized, to be examined by one of those corporations. Moreover, he was compelled to join one of those corporations, and there was an extraordinary clause in the Bill which obliged every gentleman who had passed the necessary examination to reside two years in one country before he could be registered in another. The only reason for that, so far as he had been able to ascertain it, was this. There had always existed a certain degree of jealousy of Scotchmen and Scotch doctors, and even the cheers of that House when expressions of a depreciatory character with respect to Scotchmen were made use of, evidenced that the feeling still existed. It had been shown by Smollet in Roderick Random, for Roderick Random when he went up for examination before the College of Surgeons in London was asked where he came from. "From Scotland," was the reply. "Of course—none but Scotchmen come here—you Scotchmen overspread us as the locusts did Egypt." Scotchmen, however, in this respect followed a natural law, for he (Lord Elcho) well remembered that the late Dr. Buckland in his lectures at Oxford related as a curious fact that the footprints of the palæontological tortoise invariably tended southwards, and that there was no instance of their footprints tending northwards—a remarkable illustration of the tendency of Scotchmen to go south and never to return! Scotch doctors, however, went through as strict an examination and stood as high in the world of science as gentlemen who had received diplomas from English Colleges. To justify the principle of his hon. and learned Friend, that the whole power should be given to the corporations and taken from the Universities, his hon. and learned Friend should show, as the hon. Member for Oxford (Mr. Neate) had endeavoured to do, that monopoly would work well for the public. The hon. Member for Oxford stated that he did not see why the medical profession should not regulate itself in the same way as the clerical and legal professions did. He (Lord Elcho) was not aware that the medical profession held the doctrine of apostolical succession from Galen and Hippocrates, unless, perhaps, those members did so who had received their degree from the Archbishop of Canterbury; and as regarded the legal analogy, he made bold to say, even in the presence of so many luminaries of the law, that the opinion had long prevailed, among laymen at all events, that distinguished as that profession was, still it might have been improved if admission to its ranks had been obtained, not by the payment of fees only, and by the aptitude of the stomach to digest a certain number of dinners, but by some system of practical examination upon the practice and theory of the law in its different branches. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dublin University (Mr. Napier), was so sensible of the objection to the manner in which the legal societies admitted members to the legal profession, in consequence of having eaten so many dinners in hall, that he moved for the appointment of a Royal Commission on the subject. They had not to do with theory, but with what has been, and is, the practice. They found the practice of licensing universally exercised by the Universities. It existed in the case of the Oxford and Cambridge Universities, and it practically existed in the case of the Scotch and Dublin Universities, and in the case of the Queen's Colleges. This right on the part of the former Universities dated from ancient times, and they had a recent instance of the recognition of that right in a Bill which in 1854 passed through that House, for the purpose of extending to London graduates in the unfortunate position he had referred to the same rights and privileges which were extended to those of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge. It was an extraordinary fact, too, that among the warmest supporters of that Bill sanctioning the principle that University degrees should give a licence for practice was the hon. and learned Member for Newcastle himself, who supported an Amendment to the effect that the University of Durham should be put on the same footing. Therefore, he repeated that, as regards this country, the principle was founded on old charters, and was sanctioned so recently as 1854 that Universities might grant licences for practice. What was the state of things on the Continent? In France the sole licensing power was the University of Paris; in Germany it was not the profession, but a Government Board which licensed; and in Italy the same rule held good. The right of the Scotch Universities to grant medical degrees originated in bulls of the Popes, subsequently confirmed by Statute, in which it was stated that the same rights, privileges, and immunities were conceded as were held by the Universities of Paris and Bologna. If, then, this had been the practice both at home and abroad, he thought some strong ground should be shown why, when it was attempted to remedy the defects of the medical profession in these liberal and anti-monopoly days, a monopoly should not only be perpetuated, but that the holders of that monopoly should have privileges given them which they had not heretofore possessed. Had this practice worked badly, and were the University medical degrees so inferior to those given by the medical corporations? On this point he would read a letter sent by Dr. Reid, the Examiner of the University of St. Andrew's, to the Committee which sat in 1847. Mr. Lawrence, a distinguished member of the College of Surgeons, had stated that the St. Andrew's degrees were valueless, and that he would not trust the smallest union to the charge of a medical officer who only held a St. Andrew's degree. Dr. Reid thereupon wrote to the Committee a letter in which he stated, speaking of St. Andrew's medical degrees—

“ No degree is granted without a regular and stringent examination, in accordance with regulations in force since 1826. In 1840 there were thirty candidates, of whom six were rejected; of the six rejected one possessed no diploma, four were members of the Royal College of Surgeons of London, and one was a licentiate of the Royal College of Surgeons of Edinburgh. In three years previous to 1845 there were seventy-one candidates, of whom twelve were rejected; of the twelve rejected, six, or one-half were members of the Royal College of Surgeons of London; some of them also held the diploma of the Apothecaries' Company. In 1846, out of five licentiates of the Royal College of Surgeons of Edinburgh who presented themselves, three were remitted to their studies. In 1847 there were forty-nine candidates, of whom eleven were rejected; of the rejected, seven were members of the Royal College of Surgeons of London, one licentiate of the Royal College of Surgeons of Edinburgh, one licentiate of the Dublin Apothecaries' Company; some of them likewise were licentiates of the London Apothecaries' Company.”

The fact was that no practical examination in surgery was required at the College of Surgeons, although cases of hernia, fractures, and cases of that kind which required experience, were the class of cases which generally came before surgeons. What, he asked, were these medical corporations? They were merely mediæval guilds, like those of the grocers, shoemakers, and other municipal institutions dating from the same time; but the existence of old charters giving the Universities the right of licensing showed clearly that they possessed the right long before these medical corporations. At that time all learning, whether legal or medical, was centred in the Universities, the Members being ecclesiastics. In 1163 a law was passed which forbade the shedding of blood by ecclesiastics, and in consequence of that law the ecclesiastics selected the barbers, who shaved their heads to bleed for them, and that was the origin of the Barber-Surgeons' Corporation. Hon. Gentlemen in their walks, not at the west end but in out-of-the-way parts of London, had perhaps seen over a barber's shop a pole painted in various colours, but might not be aware what it was intended to represent. The pole represented the wand formerly held by a patient when undergoing the operation of bleeding, and the stripes round the pole represented the ribands by which the patient's arm was bound up. The connection between the barbers and the surgeons was particularly exemplified by the shield of the Edinburgh Royal College of Surgeons, which up to last year bore on it the emblems of shaving—razors, and so forth. On turning to The Encyclopædia he found that in the time of Henry VIII. the physicians, and also the barber-surgeons of London, were incorporated, and those two bodies overstepped their jurisdiction by prosecuting those who did not belong to either, so that it became necessary to pass an Act in 1543 for the protection of the irregular practitioners. In 1606, James I. incorporated the apothecaries, uniting with them the grocers, and they also began to prosecute as soon as they had obtained their privileges. He had now shown the House the origin of these medical corporations, and their true character was to be found in the Act of Henry VIII., which enacted—

“ Whereas it was enacted that no person within the city of London, nor within seven miles of the same, should take upon him to exercise and occupy as a physician or surgeon, except he be first examined, approved, and admitted by the Bishop of London and others; sithence the making of which said Act the Company and Fellowship of Surgeons of London, minding only their own lucre and nothing the profit or ease of the diseased or patient, have sued, troubled, and vexed divers honest persons (as well men as women) whom God hath endued with the knowledge of the nature, kind, and operation of certain herbs, roots, and waters, and yet the same persons have not taken anything for their pains or cunning, but have ministered the same for God's sake and charity; and it is now well known that surgeons admitted will do no cure to any person but where they shall know to be rewarded with a greater sum than the cure extendeth unto, for, in case they would minister their cunning to sore people unrewarded, there should not so many rot and perish to death as daily do for lack of surgeons."

The same character was to be found in the preamble of the hon. and learned Gentleman's Bill. Now, he asked hon. Members whether, in 1857, they found old corporations, such as the city of London for instance, managing the affairs with which they were intrusted so well that they would grant to those medical corporations, the relics of ancient guilds, powers which they had not heretofore possessed? It was asked, not that they should have a fair share of power—to which he should not object—but that they should have a complete monopoly. It was on these grounds that he asked the House to reject the Bill of his hon. and learned Friend. As it might be for the convenience of the House to have but one discussion on both the medical Bills standing on the Orders of the Day, he should now say something in support of that Bill which he asked the House to substitute for the Bill of the hon. and learned Gentleman. The reasons which induced him to bring that Bill forward he had already stated to the House. Both Bills had the same object, that of medical reform.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE rose to order. He thought it irregular to discuss during the consideration of one Bill the merits of another standing in the business of the day.

MR. SPEAKER said, that as in the course of the discussion that day there had been a constant reference to both of the Bills, it was rather too late now to interpose to prevent the noble Lord entering upon the statement he was about to make.

LORD ELCHO said that, fortified by the decision of the Speaker, and also by the example of the hon. Member for Finsbury, who had himself referred to both Bills, he should proceed to point out to which Bill the preference ought to be given; and he here would observe that he felt the full force of what had fallen from the hon. Member for Finsbury, to the effect that they should be as liberal as possible, and not restrain the profession by needless restrictions. Both Bills had the same object in view—namely, the establishment of an efficient registration of practitioners, but the Bill of the Committee of 1856, which he proposed should be adopted, proceeded to effect its object in a totally different way from the Bill of the hon. and learned Gentleman. The main objection raised against the Bill of the Committee by those who were opposed to it rested on the constitution of the council. They urged that the council ought to be representative, and not nominated by the Crown. He did not, however, consider that provision in the Bill to form the principle of the measure, the important question being whether the House would give a monopoly to the existing corporations or not. That was the principle involved in the Bill, and the constitution of the council was a matter for consideration in Committee. This form of council was adopted by the Committee of 1856, not to give irresponsible power to the Crown, but because they considered it offered the best guarantee for the constitution of a good council. It was thought that if the council were nominated by the corporations the members would go to it as mere delegates of those corporations, while a good council would be nominated by the Crown. Nevertheless, as objections were still raised to the nomination of the council by the Crown, the Committee of 1856 made, as a check on any irresponsible exercise of power, a responsible Minister in that House the head of the council. At that time the President of the Board of Health, who was now in a moribund state, was in full vigour, and that officer was accordingly taken as the natural head of the medical council, which would to a certain extent act as a Board of Health. Now that that office was nearly abolished the Home Secretary or some other public official in that House might be substituted. However, this point, as he had said before, was matter for consideration in Committee, but the question whether a monopoly should be given to the medical corporations was not matter for consideration in Committee. No doubt the Bill of his hon. and learned Friend had been taken by the Select Committee for a basis, but it was so altered, root and branch, that scarcely any part of the original was left. It was therefore impossible so to alter it as to make it resemble the Bill adopted by the Committee. The Bill of the Committee proceeded on the principle of forming a new examining board, to be composed of an equal number of members of the existing corporations and universities. Every candidate, after having passed an examination as to general learning, would have to appear before this board, and, after passing examination, would receive a certificate entitling him to practise as a licentiate in medicine or surgery. It would afterwards be open to him to qualify himself for the higher branches of the profession. There would, however, be no invidious distinction between the surgeon and the physician, and there would be no restriction limiting his practice to one part of the kingdom. Nor was there any clause in his Bill which required that university graduates should be examined. His Bill looked to the public interests, and the public interests alone. It therefore provided that the fees should be paid into a common fund, which was to be distributed in payment of examiners and in aid of museums. A great deal had been said about preserving old institutions and collections, such as the Museum of the College of Surgeons and the Hunterian Museum. Well, his Bill left the council the power of distributing the fees amongst these institutions as they thought right and proper. This system, however, did not suit the corporations. They are remnants of the old guilds, and "guild" is derived from an old Saxon word, "gildan," to pay; and from their fees the College of Surgeons derive an income of £12,000 a year. His Bill did not touch those fees. Any person who obtained the degree of licentiate might go to the College of Surgeons for a diploma, and they could charge such fees as they considered right. He had stated generally the difference between the two Bills, but he did not wish the House to take the character of the Bill he advocated from any description of his, for it might be said that he was a Scotch jobber. Let the House take the testimony, not of any interested party, but of the medical corporations themselves. He held in his hand a petition from the Dublin Corporation of Apothecaries, and it stated that the amended Bill of last Session "is characterized by an equitable adjustment of the vested rights of all parties, and at the same time contains adequate security for a suitable education, preliminary and professional;" and the petitioners prayed that the amended Bill might be passed into law. That was the opinion of one corporation in Ireland, and he would now also state what was the opinion of the Edinburgh College of Physicians—itself a medical corporation. When the Bill came out of Committee last year that body drew up a paper, in which they stated:—

"The amended Medical Bill has appeared to the College of Physicians worthy of support, and they earnestly trust that it will be passed in the present Session of Parliament, because it will put an end to the constant agitation which has prevailed in the profession on the subject of medical reform for many years past. It will secure in the fullest possible manner that equality of privilege which has long been contended for; it will secure a good minimum standard of education; it will not interfere with the higher grades of the profession, but will leave colleges and universities unfettered in elevating the standard of qualification for those honours which they are entitled to bestow; it will, for the first time, render imperative a proper preliminary examination; it will save those practitioners whose position merely requires the lowest qualification the necessity of passing more than one examination, by combining the representatives of several into one efficient examining board; it will provide an authorized register, which will at once show who are legally qualified practitioners, and what are the qualifications which they possess; it will provide for such of the museums and other adjuncts of the existing incorporations as are of real public benefit, without rendering them dependent, as heretofore, on the fees of those whom that particular body may pass; it will for the first time introduce some sort of government in place of the present anomalous state of the profession by means of a council, which, if judiciously chosen, may succeed in harmonizing the various conflicting medical incorporations and universities which have never yet been nor are ever likely to be, able to adjust their several claims for regulating the profession. While, in our opinion, it will inflict no real injury on the incorporations, it will give great satisfaction to that large section of the profession who are unconnected with these bodies."

Now, let him adduce the opinion of the British Medical Association as given last year in reference to the amended Bill. There was first a meeting of the Committee, from which Resolutions were submitted to the whole Association, and passed. Those Resolutions were to the effect that the provisions of the amended Bill carried out the principles which the Association had always contended for, and the Association stated that they were desirous of seeing the Bill at once passed into a law. It was Madame de Staël, he thought, who said that the opinion of foreigners was the same as the judgment of posterity, because it was removed from prejudice; and he might here observe that he had received a letter from a medical man in Jersey stating that the profession there were most anxious that his Bill should be extended to the Channel Islands. He should not trouble the House with any more arguments in favour of the Bill, but would proceed to meet some of the objections urged against it, and first, as to those urged against the constitution of the council. He repeated that he did not hold that part of the Bill to constitute the principle of the measure, but he wished to show that other persons beside the Committee of 1856 considered the constitution of the council not objectionable. A gentleman, whose name could never be mentioned without honour, had drawn up a most able analysis of the two Bills. Mr. Warburton, the Gentleman he referred to, said on the part of the senate of the University of London, that that body greatly preferred the constitution of Lord Elcho's council with its Committees, to the Constitution of Mr. Headlam's general council and branch councils. Even the corporations themselves expressed similar views, for the Royal College of Physicians of Edinburgh last year suggested—

“Whether there is not a danger that delegates sent directly by the corporations, or by any public bodies, would not be likely to lean too much to the interest of those bodies, and therefore the less to those of the public and the profession in general?”

and therefore proposed—

“That the number of the council should not exceed twelve. That the President of the General Board of Health should be the chairman of the medical council.”

That was the exact constitution as proposed by the Bill, and yet they found the corporations now coming forward and denouncing the Bill as a strong interference with their rights. Such inconsistency was monstrous. The Royal College of Surgeons was active in its opposition to his Bill in the present year, although last year a petition from that body to the House of Commons stated:—

“That your petitioners are of opinion that a medical council or central authority of some kind might be instituted with advantage to the public, in order to establish and enforce education and examinations of equal value as a foundation for reciprocity of practice in the three kingdoms. They believe that a council nominated by the Crown, not exceeding five or seven in number, including two non-medical members, might usefully regulate the course of education so as to secure the harmonious co-operation and efficiency of the several schools and licensing bodies. The more immediate connection with the State thus established would create an interest on the part of Government in the affairs of the profession, would insure the personal competency and responsibility of the council, and raise the profession in the estimation of the public.”

He trusted, therefore, that the House would hear no more of the injustice and degradation endeavoured to be heaped upon these corporations by means of a council nominated by the Crown. He now came to the next objection, and that was that his Bill merely provided what was called the “one portal system,” that in fact there was but one entrance and one examination. But, in reply to this he would ask, for whom were they legislating? For the people of England, and not for the rich merely. The rich had it in their power by means of their guineas to summon to their bedsides in time of illness Sir Benjamin This or That, or any Baronet or Knight who was on the rolls of the register; but the House had to take care that the general practitioners, who were charged with the care of the poor, were not incompetent. In his Bill security was taken that the name of no man not qualified to practise in the opinion of a competent authority should be on the register. When a man was on the register, the Corporations and Universities would then compete together to induce him to go to one or the other. They would grant titular distinctions, and the public would of course form their own opinion as to the comparative value of these particular distinctions. He contended, therefore, that his Bill left competition open, but it was a competition upwards, and not a competition downwards, as provided by the Bill of his hon. and learned Friend. The Edinburgh College of Physicians made the following statement with reference to the proposal to abolish all the existing examining boards and to set up in their places one chosen jointly by the Universities and the Incorporations:—

“Although some of these bodies have undoubtedly faithfully discharged their duties others have been most remiss, and, from the obvious difficulty of preferring one to another, it seems better to establish one common portal through which the profession must be entered. While men continue to be actuated, as they are at present, by honourable ambition, and while the competition in our profession remains as it is, there is little fear of this engendering a dead level in medical acquirement; all will, indeed, enter by one portal, but most will seek the higher honours which Universities and Colleges will bestow. There has been no want hitherto of a strenuous competition for the mere honorary distinctions in the profession, and this is not likely to be arrested by the Bill.”

Mr. Fergusson, the eminent surgeon, expressed the following opinion in a letter to a friend with regard to his (Lord Elcho's) Bill:—

“In so far as I am myself concerned, I have no objection that my preference to Lord Elcho's Bill should be known. I have for nearly thirty years advocated a main feature in that Bill—the one portal system. There is, in my opinion, no single feature in what is called medical reform of greater importance than this. In other respects there seems a simplicity of arrangement in Lord Elcho's Bill which induces me to look far more favourably upon it than that of Mr. Headlam.”

The views entertained on the subject of the one portal system by the Edinburgh

College of Physicians and by Mr. Fergusson were strongly advocated thirty years ago by Dr. Thomson, the celebrated professor of medicine in the University of Edinburgh. Dr. Thomson, in his Life of Dr. Cullen, thus expresses his opinion:—

“If it be desirable, for the interests of society, that there should exist a separate class of medical practitioners, under the title of physicians, the Legislature would surely confer a greater benefit on the public by fixing a course of preliminary and professional education, and providing for the strict examination of those who desire to be licensed to practise in this capacity, and then leaving them at liberty to exercise their profession when they please, than by indulging particular corporations in the exercise of a narrow and exclusive system of monopoly, the only conceivable operation of which is to engender arrogance and presumption, and consequently ignorance and rashness, in the minds of those who are admitted within its pale, and jealousy and rancour in those who are kept without it.”

Similar views were maintained by Dr. Carpenter, of the London University, in the British and Foreign Medical Review, but which it is not necessary that I should quote. He (Lord Elcho) now came to the charge that he was endeavouring to carry out what was called “a Scotch job.” Unfortunately, everything he touched seemed to be converted into a Scotch job. He had been charged with jobbery because he had advocated the 25-inch scale for the Scotch survey, and now, because he was anxious to destroy monopoly and to benefit the public, he was accused of being engaged in a Scotch job. He believed that his proposal would be advantageous to Scotland, but others would be equal gainers, as, for instance, the London University and University College. He must say, however, that he had had little communication with the Scotch Universities with reference to his measure, which he had brought forward simply for public interests. It had been further said that the greatest unanimity prevailed among the medical profession on this subject, and that he (Lord Elcho) was merely throwing down an apple of discord. The existence of that unanimity, however, he begged to deny. By some hocus-pocus the names of two hon. Gentlemen opposite, the hon. Member for the University of Oxford (Sir W. Heathcote), and the right hon. Member for Dublin University (Mr. Napier), who had last year fought the battle of the Universities against the monopolists, appeared this year on the back of the Bill introduced by the hon. and learned Member for Newcastle-on-Tyne. He gave that hon. and learned Gentleman full credit for the diplomatic tact which had led him to get the names of those two hon. Members placed upon the back of his Bill. Last year the names of the hon. Member for Ayr (Mr. Craufurd) and the hon. Member for Leitrim (Mr. Brady) appeared upon the hon. Gentleman's Bill, and, it might naturally have been supposed that when the hon. and learned Member for Newcastle-on-Tyne introduced this Session another measure of medical reform, he would have consulted the hon. Gentlemen who previously backed him, and would again have placed their names upon the Bill. His hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Headlam), however, had not said a word on the subject to one of these hon. Gentlemen, but went over to the enemy, and enticed from their ranks—by what bribe he (Lord Elcho) knew not—the two hon. Gentlemen opposite whose names now appeared upon the back of his Bill. This seemed rather sharp practice, and consequently he (Lord Elcho) asked the hon. Members for Ayr and Leitrim (Mr. Craufurd and Mr. Brady) to allow their names to be placed upon the Bill which he introduced. They unhesitatingly consented, and he obtained leave to bring in the Medical Profession No. 2 Bill. The next day he met the hon. Member for Leitrim (Mr. Brady), who requested him, as a personal favour, to take his name off the Bill, stating that, from peculiar circumstances connected with his position in Ireland, he did not wish to meddle any more with medical reform. He (Lord Elcho) acceded to the hon. Gentleman's request, but the consequence was, that he had to get the order for the Bill discharged, and to obtain leave to introduce the Medical Profession No. 3 Bill, which stood next upon the orders of the day. He wished to say a few words with reference to a document which had been circulated among hon. Members, and which denounced him for disturbing the unanimity of the medical profession on this subject. That paper was written by a member of the College of Physicians of London, and he doubted whether the oldest Member of the House had ever known so extraordinary a production addressed to Members of Parliament. The paper was headed, “Remarks on Mr. Headlam's ‘Medical Profession Bill’ and Lord Elcho's opposition.” The first sentence ran thus:—

“Surprise not unmixed with indignation is the general feeling of the medical profession of the three kingdoms on finding that Lord Elcho, as the advocate of the Scotch Universities, should have come forward to oppose the Medical Bill which was read a first time last Wednesday by Mr. Headlam."

The Bill was not his (Lord Elcho's) Bill, nor was it the Bill of the Scotch Universities, but it was the Bill of a Select Committee, whose names afforded a sufficient guarantee that no "job" could be contemplated. He did not know whether the writer of this paper spoke in the name of the College of Physicians, but at all events he holds an official position in their body, and he proceeded to say:—

"It is scarcely likely that any Select Committee of the House of Commons should be in a position to comprehend the complex bearings of this difficult subject, still less to amend a decision arrived at with so much knowledge and so much care."

There was a compliment to the mental and judicial qualifications of Committees of the House of Commons! The cream of this document was, however, contained in its concluding sentence:—

"The whole profession, therefore, are determined to regulate the laws by which they are to be governed, and they are decided not to allow any Member of the House, however popular he may be, to come forward, partially instructed, and biased, as it would seem, by a small and mercenary interest, to interfere with what they believe to be wise, just, and prudent legislation."

Such a declaration emanating from the College of Physicians, expressing their determination not to allow any Member of the House of Commons to interfere with what they in their wisdom conceived to be "wise, just, and prudent legislation," was really so alarming that he felt some hesitation in inviting the House to attempt to deal with this question. If they did so, they might have Dr. Mayo, at the head of the College of Physicians, marching down to the House of Commons and ordering that "bauble" (pointing to the mace upon the table) to be taken away. He (Lord Elcho) thought that since the memorable declaration of the Grand Monarque, "L'état c'est moi," this production of Dr. Alderson had not been surpassed. Whether he spoke in his own name merely or in that of the College of Physicians, he (Lord Elcho) did not know; he must deny, however, that the unanimity which was alleged to prevail among members of the medical profession with respect to this question really existed. The British Medical Association, the Scotch Universities, Cambridge, the Queen's University in Ireland, the University of London, and the Apothecaries Company of Ireland, were dissatisfied with the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Newcastle-on-Tyne, and he (Lord Elcho) thought, therefore, there was no chance of its becoming law. The hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Headlam) would doubtless lay great stress upon the petitions in favour of his measure, but he (Lord Elcho) contended that they ought to have no weight, and he would tell the House why. He found in the British Medical Journal, the organ of the British Medical Association, a report of a meeting, at which it was resolved that petitions should be forwarded to Parliament in favour of Mr. Headlam's Bill, and the following recommendation was given on the subject:—

"It is trusted that each member will write out and sign a petition, and at once forward it to a Member of the House of Commons. The number of petitions is greatly more important than the number of signatures to a single petition; therefore no time should be wasted in endeavouring to obtain numerously signed petitions."

"Numerously signed petitions" meant, of course, numerous petitions, each signed by an individual. He believed he might state that, although among the deputation who waited upon Lord Palmerston on this subject the delegates of the Medical Association of Great Britain were mentioned, the committee of that association had not authorized any member of their body to attend. Among the deputation were also delegates from the College of Surgeons of London, but the next day a letter appeared in The Times, signed by a member of the College of Surgeons, who said that the gentlemen who professed to represent the College of Surgeons in the deputation had no more right to speak in the name of the 12,000 surgeons of England than would any three Members of that House be entitled to go to the Government as representatives of the House of Commons. He (Lord Elcho) maintained, then, that the unanimity which was alleged to prevail among the profession did not in reality exist. Indeed, the reason why all former Bills had failed was, that instead of legislating on a broad basis and seeking to promote the true interests of the people, they were founded on the narrow basis of a unanimity which the discordant interests of the Universities and of the governing bodies, rendered it impossible to establish. He hoped, therefore, that the House, instead of assenting to the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Newcastle-on-Tyne would adopt the Bill drawn up by the Committee to whom they had referred the consideration of the subject. It was absurd to endeavour to obtain the consent of all the various bodies whose interests would be affected by such a measure. If Parliament had waited until the consent of the legal profession had been obtained to improvements of the law, what efficient legal reforms could have been effected? If they had waited for the consent of the owners of rotten boroughs, when would the measures of Parliamentary Reform have been carried? If they had waited for the consent of the farmers, and had been influenced by their petitions, when would free trade in corn have been established? He called upon the House, then, to act with justice in this case, regardless of the interested opposition of a portion of the profession. He was aware of the Quixotic nature of the enterprise he had undertaken in endeavouring to induce the House to oppose an organized agitation which extended throughout the three kingdoms. He knew what influence must necessarily be exercised by men of intelligent and highly cultivated minds, whose profession it was to heal the sick, to relieve the suffering, and to smooth the pillows of the dying. Their mission was indeed high, and no one could wonder at their influence. It must be remembered, however, that physicians were but men, and that the House was now called upon to deal with men not in their individual but in their corporate capacity. If hon. Gentlemen, setting aside all the influence of private feeling and of personal predilection, would view this question dispassionately and upon its merits alone, he had little fear of the result, and he confidently anticipated that they would reject the monopolizing Bill of the corporations and would substitute in its place the Bill of the Select Committee.

MR. NAPIER said, that the noble Lord who had last addressed the House was at a loss to surmise what were the views of the Members for the great Universities on the question now before the House; but did it not occur to the noble Lord that they supported the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Newcastle, because they agreed in its principles? He (Mr. Napier) supported it upon that ground, and because it met with the approval of his constituents—a body of men as distinguished as any in the United Kingdom, and whose views he, on this matter, adopted as his own. In illustrating the position which the proposed Council would bear in relation to the Universities, he would take the case of the Universities and the Inns of Court, as he was only anxious to carry out the same views with regard to the medical profession which he had advocated with regard to his own. What were these Inns for? Solely to prepare men for the bar. They stood as between the Universities and the bar itself, just in the position occupied by the medical corporate bodies, as between the Universities and actual medical practitioners. They stood between education and actual practice. Now, when the Commission on legal education made their Report, did they propose to take from the Inns of Court their legitimate position, their proper functions, or their property? Certainly not. They simply proposed that these Inns should be made more efficient for the imparting of that special instruction which ought to be obtained by men going to the bar after they had received that general education in arts which it was the province of the Universities to impart. And, whilst alluding to the Commission on legal education, he would ask of whom was that Commission composed? Let them see how the bar was treated, and then see what had been done in the case of the medical profession. On the Commission on legal education were Judges and practising lawyers. Was the medical profession equally well treated, when the system of medical education was under inquiry? But what had the Commission on legal education, composed as it was, recommended? Why, the members decided unanimously that the Universities should confine themselves to the preparatory enlightened education necessary for every man destined to become a member of a liberal profession, but that the Inns of Court should apply themselves to the preparing of men in those particular studies which are necessary to make them fit to practise at the bar. In order that this should be done more effectively, the Commissioners recommended that one uniform plan should be adopted for all the Inns; there being some of those Inns which, like some of the Universities, granted degrees on easy terms, while others of them were anxious to raise the standard of education. However, the Commissioners, while recommending one uniform plan for the Inns of Court, did not wish in the slightest degree to interfere with the education given in Universities, and which they believed to be most important for the purpose of affording a liberal and enlightened education. In that opinion he fully agreed, because he believed it a great mistake to bring up young men from their first education on a narrow and exclusive system. Such a course would not only be a mistake in the case of men destined for the bar or the medical profession, but also in the case of those destined for the war departments of the public service, the military and naval professions. The Report on military education showed the mistake of any such system ; and accordingly it was recommended that after young men who intended to adopt the army as a profession had received in a University a sound, enlightened, and liberal education, that then, and not till then, should they enter a military college to receive that exclusive education necessary for their professional pursuits. The same rule would apply to the legal and medical professions. The College of Physicians and the College of Surgeons were intended for that particular education required for members of the medical and surgical professions. He wanted to put the medical profession on the same footing as the profession of the law, and what he was anxious about was, not so much particular details, as that the House should proceed on enlightened educational principles. This subject had been considered by a Select Committee, of which he had been a member ; but, at that time, they were embarrassed by the fact, that nearly all the medical bodies were at variance, and that great difficulty had to be encountered before they could be brought into harmony. Therefore that Committee tried to do the best it could under the circumstances. All the hon. Members of that House who had served on Committees of the kind knew how much might be learned by attention to the facts detailed in evidence. Now, he represented a University which had a school of medicine and surgery of very high standing, but the medical bodies of Dublin had felt that their interests conflicted. However, after having considered the matter, he told them that it was most important that they should have a general and enlightened system of surgical and medical education. He advised them to meet together, and confer, before the medical bills would again come under discussion in Parliament, in order to agree on some general principles. The result was that, after frequent meetings, these distinguished bodies at last came to an understanding, and the views presented in the Bill of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Newcastle embodied in the main the results at which these medical corporations had arrived ; and thus a Bill came before the House, having on the back of it his own name, as Member for the University of Dublin, in connection with the names of his hon. Friend the Member for Oxford and his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Newcastle. He could not but think that the Bills of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Newcastle and the noble Lord (Lord Elcho) were irreconcilable. They proceeded on totally different principles. The Bill of the noble Lord transferred all over to the Crown, for the council was to be nominated by the Crown, and the President of the Board of Health was to be the chairman of the council. There was no use in using the ad hominem argument—"You did not object to it before the Select Committee." No man had a right to make use of such an argument in a case like the present. He repeated that the whole medical body would be under the influence of the Crown if the Bill of the noble Lord passed ; and that, he contended, would not be a healthy state of things, neither would it be a necessary state of things, if it was possible to get the medical bodies themselves to agree to carry out, under a council of their own members, the desired measures of medical reform. The Bill of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Newcastle, provided that the council should be an independent one, and that in it should be comprised representatives chosen by the Colleges of Physicians and Surgeons, and the Apothecaries Society of England, the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, London, and Durham ; the Colleges of Physicians and Surgeons of Edinburgh, the College of the Faculty of Glasgow, the University of Edinburgh, the Medical Colleges, the University of Dublin, and the Queen's University in Ireland ; the Universities of Scotland (Glasgow, Aberdeen, and St. Andrew's) being grouped together. He was himself old enough to have drawn up the renewed charters granted to the medical corporate bodies in Dublin, and which his right hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Sir James Graham) would remember to have been granted by a Government of which he was a member, and he thought Ireland had reason to be greatly proud of her medical schools. Therefore, taking Ireland per se, he did not think the standard of medical education in that country could be at all objected to. But with respect to some of the Scotch schools, he was bound to say the case was different. They had diminished the value of their own degree by the readiness with which they granted it. He would beg distinctly to be understood as speaking with the highest respect of Scotland generally. He knew that that country had produced men eminent in all the branches of learning, besides which it was the country of his ancestors—an additional reason for his respecting it. Nevertheless he was compelled to say, that the value of some Scotch degrees had fallen in the market. He knew as a fact that many men, when they could not stand the necessary test to secure them a degree at home, proceeded to Scotland, and obtained a degree in that country from one of those Universities which did not require a degree in arts preliminary to a degree in medicine. He had met one gentleman, the holder of such a degree, who was ignorant of the name of the most commonly known works of Homer. One of the great points in the Bill of his hon. and learned Friend was, that it contemplated that before taking a degree as a physician a person must have taken a degree in art at some University; whereas his noble Friend (Lord Elcho), only required the minimum of education, thereby lowering the status of the profession to the level of the general practitioner. The noble Lord maintained the right of the Universities to grant licences to practise, but he (Mr. Napier) thought the function of the Universities should be to afford a sound preliminary and preparatory training, leaving to other bodies who were better competent to judge of qualifications for practice the duty of licensing. His noble Friend had referred to the University of London, but the opinion of that University on this subject, as expressed in a printed paper, which had been circulated by it, was contained in these words:—"At the same time the Senate have no desire to see conferred on this University any general or uncontrolled authority to grant licences to its graduates to practise; nor do they desire to secure special immunities for the University of London in particular." The University of London agreed, then, that the right principle was, that no monopoly should be given to the Universities; and this was the principle of his hon. and learned Friend's Bill. What the noble Lord wanted was, that the Scotch Universities should be at liberty to grant degrees in medicine without requiring previous degrees in arts. He (Mr. Napier) must say, that he had met graduates in medicine from Scotland whose ignorance was quite astounding. He contended they ought to take the very highest standard of education, and the question was how that was to be provided. They had in the Bill of his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Headlam) provision made for a general council formed of the representatives of all the medical bodies, and that council had the power of insisting on a good general education, and a special education in medicine and surgery. If they wished to have medical practitioners a more enlightened and better educated class, they must call upon the Universities to provide a better education. They must refer for their standard of general education to the best University, and take their licensing power from the best professional body. Then the Bill of his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Headlam) made provision for a register which stated the qualifications conferred on practitioners in every instance, and on which the public could always rely for information of that kind. But it was said there were several corporations opposed to the Bill of his hon. and learned Friend, and among others the apothecaries of Ireland. With regard to the apothecaries of Ireland he (Mr. Napier) thought that body had quite misunderstood the effect which the measure was likely to have upon their interests, and he denied that it took away from them any privilege they already possessed. It was often said that as a body the members of the medical profession were not equally well educated with the Bar and the Church, but he could see no reason why that should be. No doubt, so many advantages in the way of preferment were not open to them, but still he thought the main reason was that the education of the medical practitioner had heretofore been much too exclusive, and did not embrace that preliminary and good general education which it was one of the main objects of the Bill of his hon. and learned Friend to enforce. That Bill, too, would secure what would be a manifest desideratum—namely, a common standard of education for the medical profession of the whole United Kingdom. Where could they have that education so well carried out as in the colleges enumerated in the Bill of his hon. and learned Friend? The efficiency of that education would be indicated and proved by the licence to practise which would be given only after examinations conducted by the most competent men and controlled by the general council. With that strictly professional education the Universities ought not to interfere, as it did not come within their functions. By the Bill of his hon. and learned Friend the student intended for the medical profession, after an education at a University, would be taken up by the eminent men who attended the various hospitals and prepared by them to practise. The subsequent examinations would secure the requisite amount of competency, and there would also be the advantage of one uniform licence. As he had before observed, the University of Dublin had medical and surgical schools of high reputation; but from its great desire to advance the cause of medical education it had yielded up its special privileges of granting a power of licensing, and consented to take the position of a University imparting an education in arts, and a medical education without the power of licensing. His noble Friend (Lord Elcho) had stated that the Bill of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Newcastle was in some measure framed as a bribe to him (Mr. Napier), and his hon. Friend the Member for the University of Oxford; but he (Mr. Napier) hoped that there was nothing in the fact of Members for two such learned Universities advocating the cause of a high standard of education to warrant such a conclusion. He wished to see the medical corporations themselves taking into their own hands the work of medical reform. The same desire actuated the Commission on legal education, who had determined to do everything in their power to induce the Inns of Court to carry out the necessary reforms in legal education, and only to apply to the Legislature as a last resort. The principles of this Bill were also the same as those advocated by the Commissioners on military education, who reported in favour of a liberal and enlightened general education in the first instance, and military colleges as the intermediate between that education and practice of the profession. In France, where a contrary opinion formerly prevailed, it was now decided that it was a great mistake to exclude study in arts from the education of a medical man. He trusted, therefore, the House would not give way to the suggestions made by the opponents of the Bill of his hon. and learned Friend, emanating, as those suggestions did, from quarters where at present nothing like an adequate amount of education was given, and where the governing bodies wanted to have the power of giving degrees in medicine with degrees in arts, and, in fact, to dispose of an inferior article in the market. He thought the medical profession had not been fairly treated in this country. He could not doubt that it ought to rank almost as high as the theological profession, for a man could be the priest of his own family, but he could not be the physician of his own family. It had, however, never been held in anything like equal esteem with the profession either of theology or of the law. He could not understand why that should be, seeing how intimately our moral and physical qualities were blended together, and how delicate and important in the last degree were the functions which medical practitioners were constantly called on to discharge. Believing that the Bill of his hon. and learned Friend would have the effect of insuring to them a higher amount of general and professional education, and of elevating their profession generally, and knowing that it had the approval of his constituents, than whom there was no body of men more capable of appreciating its merits or of forming correct opinions on the subjects with which it dealt, he gave it his most cordial support. There were some modifications which probably would be thought desirable, but they could be made in Committee, and, therefore, afforded no ground for opposition to the second reading.

MR. COWPER said, he thought it required all the ability of the right hon. and learned Gentleman who had last addressed the House to justify the deprivation, contemplated in certain cases by the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Newcastle, of the power of licensing medical practitioners now vested in the Universities. He hardly expected that the right hon. and learned Gentleman, who represented a University in that House, would have given his support to this measure. Last year the right hon. and learned Gentleman took a different view in the Select Committee, and it was to be hoped that on further consideration he might revert to his former opinion. The Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Newcastle took from the Universities the power which they possessed by law of giving licences to medical practitioners; and what was the equivalent they were to receive in return? By the Bill No. 3 they would receive what he (Mr. Cowper) thought was a proper equivalent—namely, that they would have the power of nominating the examiners who were to examine in the sciences connected with medicine, while the medical corporations would nominate the examiners who were to examine in the practice of the art. When the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Napier) found fault with the education given at the Universities, he must have alluded to places where the education given was of an inferior description; but he would ask the hon. and learned Gentleman to look not merely to those Universities, but also to the Universities of London, Edinburgh, and Glasgow, which were medical schools, and especially to that of Edinburgh, where not merely the theory of medicine was taught, but also the practice in the most eminent degree. The House had heard a great deal said about unanimity during this debate. The subject of medical reform occupied a singular position with regard to the question of unanimity. While they had, on the one hand, corporation against corporation, reformer against reformer, and the most conflicting views to take into consideration, every one who came forward to legislate on the subject always began by stating that he had succeeded in attaining unanimity. The hon. and learned Member (Mr. Headlam) stated, when he sought to introduce his Bill of last year, that it had received the unanimous assent of the general body of the medical profession; but when the House went into Committee upon it, no less than fifty-one Amendments were suggested to the measure so unanimously recommended; and, indeed, the opposition to the Bill from every quarter of the House was so manifest, that the hon. and learned Member found it out of the question to attempt to carry the measure further, and he took the very wise course of agreeing to a suggestion to refer it to a Select Committee. When it was referred to a Select Committee there was really unanimity, because the only division of importance that arose was on a Motion as to the constitution of the council, which was carried by a majority of 8 to 2. As to the constitution of the council, he (Mr. Cowper) had no objection to the representative formation, if the numbers could be limited and the balance of interests adjusted, but he thought the influence of the Crown ought to be felt in that body; and, if the nomination of the Crown was not to be adopted, there ought to be a provision by which the decrees and resolutions of that council should not come into effect unless they had the approval of Her Majesty by the advice of the Privy Council. By that means the advantages of representations would be combined with the authority and responsibility of the executive government. The question, however, now before the House was not the constitution of the council. That was a matter of detail which might be settled in a variety of ways. The principle of the Bill of the hon. and learned Gentleman was the way in which it decided who was to be hereafter a legally qualified practitioner, and how the lowest requisite amount of qualification was to be ascertained. Those were matters of great importance to every individual in this country who might require to have recourse to a legally qualified practitioner. In the other learned professions the law provided that no person should hold himself out to the world as a practitioner unless he had a legal qualification. He should be sorry to be unjust to a class of practitioners who had the special protection of the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. Duncombe), or to throw any restriction which might be uncalled-for by the interests of the public in the way of quacks. If a man, having once obtained a qualification, chose to set up as a quack, and the public chose to go to him, the law ought not to interfere; but he contended, that the public ought to have every facility afforded them for ascertaining which of those quacks had had a proper medical education, and which of them had not. One great defect under the present system was the want of proper qualification among a large number of persons who were yet held to be qualified by law. Several hon. Gentlemen had assumed that the present state of the law in respect to qualification was all that could be required; but he, on the contrary, believed it was very imperfect, and that the Bill of the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Headlam), instead of providing an adequate remedy, rather aggravated the evil than otherwise. He should have been ready to support the Bill if he could have done so, but believing that its effect would be to lower instead of raising the standard of qualification, he should be compelled to vote against the second reading. [Cries of "Divide!"] If he were to leave off speaking, some other hon. Member would claim to exercise his right to be heard, and their impatience for a division would not be satisfied by his resuming his seat. First of all there was the qualification given by the College of Surgeons. If that college were restricted to the giving titles to members of the profession, making fellows, and establishing lectures, he should be anxious to increase their power; but the purpose for which especially they were not well qualified was that of licensing surgeons, whereas it was assumed by this Bill that licensing could not be in better hands. It was quite notorious that the manner in which the thing was carried on was not satisfactory. He held in his hand a memorial presented by the medical officers and lecturers of Middlesex Hospital to the Court of Examiners of the College of Surgeons, imploring them to improve the system of examination, and declaring that at present what the Court required was certificates of attendance rather than proof of proficiency. This question had often been under the consideration of the College of Surgeons, and he believed the argument that had prevailed was, that if the examination were stricter a sufficient number of persons would not be admitted into the profession. On that point he differed from them, believing that if the standard were raised the required number of candidates would come up to it. One great fault in this Bill was, that the examinations for surgery and those for the collateral sciences were both to be conducted by the same Court of Examiners. He thought the examinations in the collateral sciences should be carried on by those who taught those sciences, and that the Court of Examiners should be limited to surgery. The Court of Examiners were the senior members of the college, and had had great experience in practical surgery; but as regarded the sciences of chemistry, botany, physiology, and pathology, he must say that they had no particular aptitude for conducting examinations. A great number of years had elapsed since they were compelled to study such sciences, and they could not be expected to keep up with the progress of discovery as professors must who taught these sciences. Another objection to the Bill was, that it exempted the College of Physicians from the necessity of having an examination in the practice of surgery: so that, after this Bill passed, the physician would still be a man who with haughty and fastidious contempt for a necessary branch of the art of healing, might ignore what the humblest surgeon was compelled to know. Again, by this Bill, medical men, instead of remaining divided into the three branches of physicians, surgeons, and general practitioners, would be classed under the two heads of physicians and of surgeons and general practitioners, the two latter being put together. This was a most faulty arrangement, and one that had always been opposed by those who best understood the interest of the profession. The College of Physicians itself, in a memorial which it presented last year, said it was important that the distinction between the three orders of the profession should be maintained. The Bill of the hon. and learned Gentleman was an ill-advised attempt to patch up the defects of the existing system, and was objectionable in that it did not substitute a better examination for the present imperfect one, of which great complaint was made, and that it did not provide for an improvement in the standard of qualification of the general practitioner. If the House rejected the Bill No. 1, it would not be compelled to accept No. 3. The subject had been thoroughly examined by a Select Committee, representing as far as possible all the interests concerned, and the result had been the almost unanimous rejection of the provisions sought to be introduced by the Bill now before the House. The Government were not in any way bound to support the Bill No. 3, but as the public and especially the poor must be dependent for their health, and for the preservation of their lives, upon the proper qualifications of general practitioners, he had felt it his duty to state to the House his views upon the measure which was now under consideration.

MR. HEADLAM replied: With the permission of the House, he would refer to the history of this question a little before last Session, the period to which the noble Lord and those who supported him had confined their observations. In the year 1844, after investigations by Committees of which the most eminent men in that House were Members, the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir J. Graham), with the full authority of the Government of which he was a member, brought in a Bill which was in all respects identical with that which he (Mr. Headlam) had submitted to the House; and in the following year another Bill of precisely similar character, and containing the same recognition of the rights and privileges of corporations as he had embodied in his measure, was introduced by the same right hon. Baronet. Unfortunately the medical profession did not give to those Bills the support which they deserved, and they were lost. Since that time the subject had been agitated again and again. At last the profession had attained a degree of unanimity in favour of this Bill, which, considering the conflict of privileges, rights, and interests, was something wonderful; and he thought it was not too much to ask that the House should at least read a second time a measure which was so recommended and so sanctioned. Last year he introduced, on behalf of the medical association, not on behalf of these corporate bodies, a Bill in which regard was paid to their rights and privileges, and with regard to which there had been some misrepresentation. That Bill was read a second time without opposition. When it went into Committee, the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for the Home Department proposed an Amendment, of which he had very unfairly given notice only on the previous evening, providing that all the members of the council should be nominated by the Crown. On a division that Amendment was carried by the influence of the Government. The matter was referred to a Select Committee, of which, in the natural course of things, he (Mr. Headlam) should have been Chairman. At first, however, he declined to be even a member of the Committee. The right hon. Gentleman who had just addressed the House, then President of the Board of Health, nominated it, presided over it, and introduced into the Bill which emanated from it those clauses of which he now complained, which would entirely destroy all the organization which had grown up within the medical profession, and subject that profession to a council, to be nominated by the Crown, and of which the President of the Board of Health would be the head. If he had nothing to do with the medical profession he should, on constitutional grounds, to the utmost of his ability, oppose the clauses which would thus subject that profession to the control of the Crown. There were many reasons why it was not desirable that this council should be nominated by the Crown, but the strongest of these was, that it was from this council alone that the right to practise could be obtained. Such a constitution would place the profession entirely at the mercy of the Crown. It was the duty of the House in some measure to consider the rights and feelings of the medical profession; and he would undertake to say that the Members of that profession generally objected to the Bill of the noble Lord (Lord Elcho), and that the assents which he had obtained were mainly attributable to some trifling objections which were entertained to parts of his (Mr. Headlam's) measure. In the course of the last autumn a compromise had been come to, and endeavours had been made to settle this question by mutual concessions. It was not right that the noble Lord, or any other hon. Member, should have endeavoured to revive differences which undoubtedly existed last year, and thus, by exciting old jealousies, to throw obstacles in the way of a measure founded upon that compromise. He objected to the noble Lord's Bill, because the council was to be nominated by the Crown, because it would entirely destroy all the organization which had grown up within the profession, and because it made the minimum of education the sole barrier over which a man must pass before he entered the profession. If the House was prepared to subject to such a stigma as this not only the medical, but all other professions, let them pass the Bill of the noble Lord. If they wished for a council chosen from the profession, with a certain number of members nominated by the Crown, to which should be given the general superintendence of the profession, let them assent to the measure which he now asked them to read a second time.

MR. CONINGHAM said, that neither of the Bills met his views, and he should therefore vote against both. He should oppose that now before the House on principles of free trade, because he did not want to establish a great monopoly.

Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the question."

The House divided:—Ayes 225; Noes 78: Majority 147.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read 2<sup>o</sup>, and committed for Wednesday next.

MEDICAL PROFESSION (No. 3) BILL.

BILL WITHDRAWN.

Order for Second Reading read.

LORD ELCHO said that, as he understood that the discussion which had just concluded had been upon both these Bills, and the result of the division was in favour of No. 1, and against No. 3, he should not at present attempt to proceed further with the latter. At the same time, as he ventured to prophesy that the Bill No. 1 would not pass into law this Session, he gave notice that if the Government did not take up the question, he should next year reproduce the Bill No. 3 in its present form. Under these circumstances he moved that the order of the day for the second reading of the Medical Bill No. 3 should be read and discharged.

Order discharged; Bill withdrawn.

ROCHDALE ELECTION—REPORT.

House informed, that the Committee had determined—

That Sir Alexander Ramsay, baronet, is duly elected a Burgess to serve in this present Parliament for the Borough of Rochdale.

And the said Determination was ordered to be entered in the Journals of this House.

House further informed, that the Committee had agreed to the following Resolutions:—

1. "That it appeared from the Evidence of Abraham Rothwell, Mary Ann Hughes, Richard Hughes, and Martin Daley, that the said Abraham Rothwell, Richard Hughes, and Martin Daley were bribed by various sums of money being given to and offered to them, but the evidence was so contradictory and unsatisfactory, that the Committee feel that very little reliance can be placed upon it.

2. "That there was no evidence to show that the aforesaid acts of bribery were committed with the knowledge and consent of the said Sir Alexander Ramsay or his agents."

Report to lie on the Table.

House adjourned at five minutes before Six o'clock.

ADMIRAL OF THE FLEET.—QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that it having been customary that the senior Admiral in the service should succeed to the post of Admiral of the Fleet, it was naturally felt by the navy generally, and more especially by the officer now at the head of the list, that it was hard the commission should have been filled up since the death of Sir Byam Martin. It was a merely honorary commission, and fairly looked upon as a mark of distinction. It was therefore desirable to know whether it was intended to be filled up.

EARL GRANVILLE thought it detrimental to the public service when Parliament interfered with the Government as to the promotion or non-promotion of particular individuals. He should therefore, without meaning any disrespect to the noble Marquess, decline to answer his question.

THE DUKE OF NORTHUMBERLAND said, that the office of Admiral of the Fleet was one of the few prizes in the profession, and it had always been the practice to appoint to this distinction. The appointment was regarded by the navy as a proper compliment from the Crown. This was the first time a vacancy had occurred without being filled up, and it was, he thought, worth the consideration of the Government whether they would not continue to appoint the oldest eligible member of the service to the post of Admiral of the Fleet, the salary attached to which was not more than £365 per annum.

LORD COLCHESTER said, that the post of Admiral of the Fleet was equivalent in rank to that of Field Marshal in the army. There had been two Field Marshals lately appointed, and he thought it was unjust to the navy that they should have no officer of corresponding rank in their service, although there was an opportunity of appointing one.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that the Government were of opinion that there was no person particularly marked out at this moment to fill an office of this sort.

GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY (CAPITAL) BILL.

SECOND READING.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2<sup>a</sup>.

LORD ST. LEONARDS (who had previously presented three petitions from the holders of preference shares or stock against the Bill said, that although the Bill was one of a private character, it involved a question of great importance. Its object was, as their Lordships were no doubt aware, to provide for the loss caused by the forgeries committed by Redpath. That loss amounted to £220,000, and had been incurred in consequence of the neglect of the directors of the company, who had only to have opened the books to discover the simple method by which these forgeries were perpetrated, namely, by placing a figure of 1 before any amount of stock transferred in the books of the company. Of course the directors were anxious to have that loss provided for; and when they discovered it, as they might have done long before, they made the proposal embodied in this Bill, which was to throw the whole loss upon the half-year's revenue of the company, as if it had been incurred in that half year. Now, there were different classes of shareholders in the company, some only of the ordinary description, and some preferential shareholders. Now, people invested their money in stock of the latter description, in the belief that their interest was guaranteed, and was as secure as if they had invested in the public funds. But if this Bill were passed, it would wholly deprive them of any interest for the half year ending in January last, because, while their loss was what he had stated, the revenue for that half year was a little above a quarter of a million, and as that would be nearly exhausted in meeting these losses, the preference shareholders would get no dividend. Now, there was no reason whatever why a loss which was discovered but not sustained in one half year should be charged exclusively upon the revenue for that period. If the loss had been discovered in the half year in which it occurred (as it might have been), it might have been paid without diminishing the receipts of the preference shareholders, while further loss would have been prevented. The preference shareholders, according to every construction of the contract under which they held their shares, had a right to be paid in the first instance, and they ought to be so paid; and then all the revenue above their claims, which under ordinary circumstances would have gone to the ordinary shareholders, should be applied to meet the loss to which he had referred. The propriety of taking this course was strengthened by the fact that, although frauds and forgeries had been committed, they did not legally bind the company, which was, in fact, merely paying the loss which had accrued out of policy, and in reference to the effect of a contrary course upon the dealings in shares on the Stock Exchange.

LORD WENSLEYDALE said, although it was not his intention to oppose the second reading of the Bill, he thought that if passed in its present state, it would do a great injustice to the preference shareholders. He was himself a preference shareholder, and would suffer a considerable loss in the matter.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly, and committed. The Committee to be proposed by the Lords Committees appointed for proposing Committees on opposed Bills.

ADULTERERS' MARRIAGES BILL.

SECOND READING NEGATIVED.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD REDESDALE, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said that, its object was to remove the objection which had been taken to one of the Amendments moved during the recent discussion of the Divorce Bill, that it would be unjust to require an injured husband or wife to be married before a registrar, or on the other hand, that the clergy of the Church of England should be called on to perform the marriage service in the case of parties who had been divorced. Remedies were proposed in various shapes, which were opposed, but not on any objection to the principle, and by the present Bill he sought to meet the various grounds on which the remedies had been rejected. The first objection was, that it would be an injustice to the innocent parties to a divorce suit, that they should be obliged to have recourse to a marriage before the registrar. He proposed to remove that objection by confining such marriages to the guilty parties. He simply proposed to enact that the marriage of persons who had been divorced on account of their own adultery should take place at a registry-office. The effect of this would be that the parties could, if they pleased, have the religious ceremony performed afterwards, but it would not be compulsory upon any clergyman to celebrate their marriage. They must find some person who had no objection to perform such a ceremony, and whose conscience, therefore, would not be violated by its performance. He did not think that this would impose hardship upon any one; on the contrary, it would afford great relief to those to whom otherwise a great injury would be done. It had been said that hitherto no clergyman had objected to marry divorced persons; but no great weight was to be given to this objection, because the cases in which such marriages had taken place were but few, and it was only during the discussion of the measure now before Parliament that this question had taken a deep hold of the public mind. Under these circumstances, he moved that the Bill should be read a second time.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2<sup>a</sup>.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he thought there were a great many reasons why their Lordships should not agree to the Motion of his noble Friend, but surely it was an all-sufficient reason that he was now proposing for the fourth time that which had, within the last two or three weeks, been three times rejected by their Lordships. A proposal of precisely the same effect was made while the Divorce Bill was under their Lordships' consideration. Indeed, that proposal had the advantage of this measure, because it was more consistent, and met the whole case. This Bill only went half-way. It was said that a great number of clergymen considered marriage indissoluble, and therefore ought not to be called upon to re-marry any person who had been divorced, whether innocent or guilty. The Amendment moved by the noble Earl to his left (Earl Nelson) went to that extent, and therefore, if assented to, would have removed the whole of this, as he believed, imaginary grievance. It was three times decided by their Lordships that it was not right to interfere in such a case, and that he thought, was of itself a sufficient reason why this Bill should not be read a second time. There were, however, other reasons which would, he hoped, induce their Lordships to pause before assenting to anything which would establish so strange a precedent as that involved in this Bill. His noble Friend proposed that a certain form of marriage should be adopted for persons who had been divorced. Suppose the Bill now before the House of Parliament did not pass into a law, the consequence would be that, as the only divorced persons known to the law were those divorced by the ecclesiastical courts, all such persons might go before the registrar and marry, and if they were indicted for bigamy might justify their marriage under the provisions of this Bill. It was true that that objection might be removed by altering the wording of the measure; but how would this Bill apply to marriages dissolved by special Acts of Parliament which allowed divorced persons to marry again without specifying any form of marriage? The matter would, he admitted, be open to argument, but he believed that the effect of this Bill would be to alter the provisions of all previous Acts which had authorized marriage in any mode. If the Bill now before the other House did not pass, this measure would have no effect upon subsequent Acts of Parliament dissolving marriages, because when such an Act said that it should be lawful for the parties to marry again, that would mean as other persons could. In fact, this enactment would not operate on any known status, except marriages dissolved by the Ecclesiastical Court, and it was in fact, a clause or "rider" on the other Bill, the enactment of which had been already negatived three times. Under these circumstances he hoped their Lordships would refuse to give a second reading to this Bill.

Amendment moved, to leave out ("now") and insert ("this Day Six Months.")

LORD CAMPBELL thought the proposal of the noble Lord wholly unparliamentary and unprecedented. A Bill which embraced the whole of this subject, and from which this provision had been excluded, had been agreed to by their Lordships and sent down to the other House, and was about to be taken into consideration there. If the other House thought this particular provision a fair and just one they would no doubt insert it in the Bill; but it would be a very extraordinary mode of procedure to send down a rider to that Bill in the shape of a proposition which their Lordships had already rejected two or three times. He was very much surprised that his noble Friend, the great Lord of order in their Lordships' House, to whom they all looked up in matters of procedure, should have made such a proposition.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY said, that if on any point of order, as had been stated by the noble and learned Lords, there were a constitutional objection to the Bill proposed by the noble Lord, it would, of course, be unnecessary and improper to urge it upon their Lordships: but he must express his earnest hope that, in this or some other mode, either in this or in the other House, some relief might be afforded to the clergy, who were seriously affected by the matter to which it referred. There was nothing in the principle of the Bill in question which compromised their Lordships or interfered with what they had already determined—nothing which was inconsistent with their conduct on other occasions. It was now twenty years since some of those who dissented from the Church made a loud and earnest complaint that they were forced to celebrate their marriages according to a service which differed from their religious opinions; Parliament judged the complaint to be reasonable, and gave a remedy—a remedy which completely altered the whole law of marriage. The clergy of the Church now complain that they might be obliged by law to perform a service which they believed to be inconsistent with the Divine command. He would not now discuss the question whether they give a right interpretation to the Scripture; but he maintained that, as long as the same words remained in Scripture, there would always be many who would so interpret them. Surely it was not unreasonable to require that persons contracting marriage under the circumstances contemplated in the Divorce Bill now before the Commons House should be satisfied with a civil contract, content with the privilege of a legal marriage and a legitimate issue. The case became much stronger by the nature of the marriage service. He was unwilling to allude more particularly to that service; indeed, it could hardly be done in connection with this subject without the appearance of profaneness. But their Lordships would remember that the service assumed, in solemn terms, the Divine approval of the marriage, even that it was divinely ordered. It was true that charity hopeth all things; but it passed the bounds of charity to pronounce, ex cathedra, the Divine approval of a marriage which had its origin in a guilty passion, and was brought about by a heinous crime. For these reasons he trusted that a new obligation might not be imposed upon the clergy which they could not fulfil without doing violence to their conscience; but that, either through this present Bill, or in some future clause of the Marriage and Divorce Bill, a remedy would be found.

LORD REDESDALE said, it was not denied that there was a great grievance in compelling the performance of the marriage service by the clergy in these cases, and there could be no such hardship if this Bill passed. It would act as a relief to those who entertained conscientious objections on the subject, and would prevent that wantonness of tyranny which would compel the clergy to perform these marriages against their conscience. Under these circumstances he felt it his duty to take the sense of the House upon the measure.

On Question, that "now" stand part of the Motion? their Lordships divided:—Contents 23; Not-Contents 62: Majority 39.

Resolved in the Negative; and Bill to be read 2<sup>a</sup> on this Day Six Months.

ADULTERERS' MARRIAGES BILL.

PROTEST

Against the Rejection of the Bill.

DISSENTIENT—"Because many of the clergy conscientiously object to declare in the words of the Marriage Service the union of a divorced adulteress with her paramour 'holy matrimony, signifying the mystical union betwixt Christ and his Church,' and to pronounce over such union our blessed Lord's words, 'Those whom God hath joined together let no man put asunder;' and it is unjust to leave them subject to penalties for refusing to be guilty of what they believe to be an act of impiety, when relief can be afforded without injury to any principle or person in the manner proposed by this Bill.

ROMAN CATHOLIC CHARITIES BILL.

COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order.)

On Clause 1.

LORD ST. LEONARDS said, that, after the passing of the Roman Catholic Relief Bill, the Roman Catholic charities had been put upon the same footing as those of other Dissenters. He should be sorry to see the Act of George II., which applied to all charities, of whatever denomination, altered. The relief given to one class of Dissenters ought to be given to all. The Roman Catholics ought not to be allowed to occupy a higher ground than other Dissenters. The Bill, in fact, asked their Lordships to reverse a decision of Lord Cottenham on the construction of the Statute of Charitable Uses in reference to property left to Roman Catholic charities. The Bill provided that if any property had been left to any Roman Catholic charity, which had been unquestioned for twenty-five years, it should be no longer open to question. Property which had been long in possession of Dissenters had been taken away under the old law. That was thought a great hardship, and in 1844 an Act was passed which confirmed the title to property which had been held by one body undisturbed for a certain number of years. The contest was between Trinitarians, who sought to recover endowments which had for a long time been enjoyed by Unitarians. But the question here was wholly different. Not a contest between two classes claiming the same subject, but a question of the abstract validity of gifts of property for certain religious and charitable purposes. It might be advisable to regulate Roman Catholic charities, but this was not the right mode of doing it. Where there was evidence of good faith, it was right to relieve trustees from responsibility, but this Bill gave legal validity to all their actions; that is to say, it gave legal validity to all applications of property to superstitious uses which had existed for the last quarter of a century. Besides, a Bill had already been sent up from the other House, for the purpose of benefiting Dissenters of all classes, by enlarging the provisions of the Act of George II. This would be applicable to Roman Catholics as well as Protestant Dissenters. It provided for the very same objects to which this Bill was addressed. He would suggest that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee, and that the other Bill should be referred to the same Committee, not as approving of the latter Bill in any way, but simply that the Committee should see what was proposed to be done in regard to the relief of Dissenters generally from the provisions of the Act of George II.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that the Bill was by no means of a complicated character, and could be quite as well disposed of by the House as by a Select Committee. If the Bill were sent to a Select Committee, it would be necessary to refer the other Bill to the same Committee, and he could see no reason for any such reference. The object of the Bill was simple, and the whole of it was contained in four clauses. With regard to Roman Catholic charities, these were charities which had necessarily been conducted secretly and illegally. It could not be otherwise. The first clause removed certain doubts that had arisen, and the second gave time for putting these charities into a legal shape, which under the statute of George II. must be done within six months from the commencement of the trust. There were many charities of which all were illegal when they were created, but of which now some were legal and others illegal. For instance, a man might leave some money for schools and some for masses—part of this was legal and part illegal, and it was the object of the third clause to enable the courts to decide how much of this was legal and how much illegal. The last clause provided that when a Roman Catholic charity had been administered in a manner which was legal for other Dissenters, it should be legal also for Roman Catholics. They should not rip up old contests as to the terms of superstitious or not superstitious as applied to certain actions. There was the whole of the Bill, and it would be useless to refer such a Bill to a Select Committee. As to the other Bill to which the noble Lord referred, the two Bills might be united, but he thought that the Bill should be left in his hand.

LORD CAMOYS said, that as a Roman Catholic he believed it would be satisfactory to his co-religionists if the Bill were referred to a Select Committee.

THE DUKE OF NORFOLK, also, thought that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee. It was kindly meant, but not acceptable in its present form. He had a number of Amendments to propose, and he believed other noble Lords intended to propose alterations. These could be much better considered up-stairs than in the whole House.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that as such seemed to be the opinion of the Roman Catholic Peers he would consent to refer the Bill to a Select Committee.

Bill reported, without Amendment, and referred to a Select Committee.

The other Bill was read pro forma a second time, and referred to the same Committee.

SOUND DUES BILL.

SECOND READING.

THE EARL OF CLARENDON: My Lords, in moving that your Lordships give a second reading to a Bill for carrying into effect a convention between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of Denmark, with regard to the Sound Dues, it will not be necessary for me to detain your Lordships at any length; but I think some observations are necessary for the information of your Lordships, in order to explain the circumstances which have led to the negotiations terminating in that convention. The Sound Dues, as your Lordships are aware, arose, and the right to collect them has been exercised, from that inherent right which every Sovereign Power possesses to impose taxes within its own territory and jurisdiction, and to impose duties on the commerce carried on within its dominions; a right which has been at all times acknowledged by all maritime nations, and has been recognised as a principle of international law for upwards of 300 years. The first treaty between England and Denmark on the subject of these dues was entered into in 1491. At that time the imposition of these dues was a matter of small moment; but as commerce increased the inconvenience of the tax became more and more felt, and therefore for many years past attempts have been made to get rid of it by means of a compromise. At the beginning of last year the Government of the United States gave notice to the Danish Government that they would not pay the tax any longer. In consequence of the announcement communications took place with the Governments of other countries interested in the question, and a conference was held at Copenhagen, when the Danish Government proposed to abolish the tax for a consideration of £3,890,000, to be apportioned among the different maritime States according to the average annual amount of tax they had paid. This led to a treaty, which was signed last March, by which it was agreed that the proportion of the British Government should be £1,125,000, in consideration of which British commerce was for the future to be exempt from the Sound Dues. The Danish Government also agreed that the transit duties over the Holstein Railway should be reduced by four-fifths. That was a matter of considerable discussion, because the Danish Government denied the right of other States to interfere with the management of the Holstein railways, which they considered to be simply a matter of internal regulation. The other States, however, contended that they were entitled to insist on a reduction of these dues, inasmuch as they had been imposed for the purpose of compelling goods to be carried by way of the Baltic, instead of by the railways, and so protecting the collection of the Sound Dues. The result was that the Danish Government consented to the reduction of the transit dues by four-fifths. The amount that English commerce paid annually for these Sound Dues was £75,000, but that was by no means the most serious part of the inconvenience and loss. A Committee of the House of Commons sat last year, and examined a great number of witnesses, amongst them Her Majesty's Minister at Copenhagen, who stated that between the desertion of crews, the delays caused to the shipping, and the necessary payment of heavy local charges, added to the dues themselves, the loss incurred by England was not compensated for by less than £200,000 a year. I intend to trouble your Lordships with a very short extract from the Report of the Committee of the House of Commons. The Report states:—

“The Sound Dues, as they are levied at present, combine in them what is most objectionable in taxes that fall upon trade; they are unequal in their operation, and they occasion great loss of time, and much needless expenditure in the collection of a comparatively small revenue, and, as far as the cargoes are concerned, without professing to be raised for any service rendered in return, tend to impede and burden an important branch of trade. Under these circumstances your Committee have no hesitation in declaring that these dues are the cause of annoyance and injury to British commerce, and that they deem it highly desirable that they should be abolished. Your Committee think that the proposals made by the Danish Government to the Governments of the different States interested in the navigation and trade of the Baltic, among which Great Britain holds the first place, should receive immediate consideration, and become the foundation of a final and satisfactory settlement of the question.”

I ought to add, that the proposals of the Danish Government are those that have been accepted, and accepted by twelve or thirteen States, all having a direct interest in the matter. There is every reason to believe, therefore, that the proposals of the Danish Government were fair and reasonable, and also the apportionment of the indemnity amongst the Powers upon whose commerce those charges fall. At all events, I believe the arrangement will be most beneficial to British shipping, which is more concerned in the trade of the Baltic than that of any other nation. It is right to mention that the United States Government, which first took the lead in opposing the payment of these dues, and gave notice that, after a certain time, they should pay them no longer, entered into a treaty in April last with the Government of Denmark, agreeing to the arrangement entered into, and to the apportionment of the indemnity which the other States agreed to pay; and nothing can be more honourable and straightforward than the conduct of that Government in the negotiations. The Sound Dues ceased and determined from the first day of April last, although, owing to the necessary delay which had taken place—for, of course, no money could be paid without the sanction of Parliament—the matter could not be considered as finally adjusted. The Danish Government, however, acting in a generous spirit, have levied no tolls and offered no impediment whatever to our commerce since the 1st of April in the present year. I have only one other fact of any importance to communicate to your Lordships. My right hon.

Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has been in communication with the Danish chargé d'affaires, and from him received a statement that it is not the intention of the Danish Government to have any portion of the money remitted to Denmark, but that for purposes of their own the whole of it will be invested in this country.

POLICE (SCOTLAND) BILL.

COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to order).

LORD PANMURE said, that this Bill was similar in principle to the Police Bill for England passed last Session. Some of the Scotch counties had a police force, but others had neglected to avail themselves of the opportunity, and the Bill enabled boroughs and districts to combine for the purpose of maintaining an efficient constabulary force. The Secretary of State would lay down rules as in England for the pay and clothing of the force, and the same proportion of one-fourth of the expenditure would be defrayed out of the public exchequer. A police committee was to be appointed in every county, and that committee would have the same powers in reference to the police as the justices of the peace in England. There was a clause in this Bill which was not in the English Bill, empowering police to be raised for the protection of great public works in course of construction. The Bill had been referred to a Select Committee of their Lordships, who had given valuable assistance in putting it into proper shape.

THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH considered that the Bill was of great importance to Scotland, where great inconvenience had been felt from the different systems which prevailed.

LORD CAMPBELL said, no doubt this was an excellent Bill, and that Scotland was very much indebted to his noble Friend for bringing it in. It was very creditable to the Scotch Peers and Members of Parliament that they met and laid their heads together and came to a sensible decision upon Scotch Bills before they came under discussion in Parliament. As they were in Committee, he might say he hoped that occasion would be taken either to abolish "rogue money" or to give it a more creditable name. He remembered, for example, that when a monument was erected to a most meritorious public servant, the balance that remained to be defrayed was paid out of "rogue money." Upon another occasion the dinner bill of some Commissioners was defrayed out of the same questionable source.

Amendments made; the Report thereof to be received on Tuesday next.

DUTY ON PAPER IN POTTERY MANUFACTURE—QUESTION.

MR. J. L. RICARDO said, he wished to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Government will consider the question of granting a drawback of duty on paper in the Pottery Manufacture as in the case of the Jacquard Loom Cards?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I have communicated with the Commissioners of the Inland Revenue, and find that the reason for the drawback on the Jacquard Loom Cards does not apply to the paper used in the Pottery Manufacture. I cannot, therefore, recommend a drawback upon it.

MR. J. L. RICARDO: In consequence of the reply of the right hon. Gentleman, I beg to say that I shall call the attention of the House to the subject at the earliest opportunity.

NEW WRITS—RESOLUTIONS.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, he hoped that the House would permit him to move the Resolution of which he had given notice with respect to the issue of a New Writ in the case of a seat being declared vacant on the grounds of Bribery or Treating, and which was in the following terms—

"That in all cases when the seat of any Member has been declared void by an Election Committee on the grounds of Bribery or Treating, no Motion for the issuing of a New Writ shall be made without seven days' previous notice being given in the Votes."

He thought it was desirable that the Resolution should pass at once, and without waiting till the Orders of the Day had been disposed of, because several Election Committees were now investigating charges of bribery and corruption preferred against several hon. Members, and would shortly make their Reports to the House. A similar Resolution (with the exception of the seven days' notice) was agreed to in the Session of 1847, and in that of 1853 a Resolution requiring, at the suggestion of the noble Lord the Member for the City of London (Lord J. Russell), seven days' notice was adopted with respect to the issuing of new writs. He (Mr. Duncombe) thought that he might claim as a matter of privilege to move the Resolution before the Orders of the Day were proceeded with.

MR. SPEAKER: I do not think the hon. Member is entitled to claim as a matter of privilege to introduce the Motion at this hour, and out of the due course of business. It is quite true that a Resolution similar to this has been passed in former times; and I do not speak as to the substance of the Resolution, which may be proper, but merely as to the Order of the House. The issue of a writ is a matter of privilege, because it is one of the duties of the House to see that its numbers are complete; but this Motion goes to suspend a privilege, and not to enforce one, and precedence cannot therefore be properly claimed for it. It ought, rather, to be made in due course, and with due notice. It is, therefore, entirely at the pleasure of the House whether this Motion shall be made at the present time.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, he did not claim it as a matter of privilege, but he thought that for the convenience of the House the Resolution should be passed, before any Member had by accident been unseated. The Parliament before last ordered that in all cases no Motion for the issue of a new writ should be made without due notice. The noble Lord the Member for London, last Session, introduced the words, "without seven days' notice," because previously notice was certainly given, but it was given the night before, and the consequence was that the House was often taken to a certain extent by surprise.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM said, he rose to order. He felt the importance of his

hon. Friend's observation, that it was important the passing of the Resolution should not have a personal application; still, he thought, after the opinion given by Mr. Speaker, the Motion ought not to be pressed at the present time, especially in the absence of the noble Lord at the head of the Government.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that by the rules of the House, Orders of the Day had precedence over Motions, and therefore hon. Gentlemen seeing this notice in the paper would not expect its coming on early in the evening.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he must admit that his hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury could not claim as a matter of privilege to propose his Resolution now, but he would beg the House to consider that if the order of their proceedings were strictly adhered to, they might get into very great difficulties, because the seat for a borough might be declared vacant on account of bribery, and then, without notice, a new writ might be moved for as a matter of privilege. The House would then be obliged to discuss that as a particular, and almost as a personal question. He would, therefore, suggest that the hon. Member for Finsbury should withdraw his Motion with the view of submitting it again at half-past four o'clock the next day, in order that the House might have full notice of its coming on.

MR. DISRAELI said, he regarded the question raised by the hon. Member for Finsbury as one of very great importance as regarded the conduct of public business in that House. His (Mr. Disraeli's) view of the matter was, that they should not deviate from the rules of the House without, at least, the advice and, as he thought, the sanction of the leader of the House—the person most responsible in cases of this kind. The rule which the hon. Member for Finsbury proposed was tantamount to a Standing Order of the House; and it would have been competent to him to have made his Motion when the Standing Orders were submitted to the House at the beginning of the present Session. However, as he had not done so, he (Mr. Disraeli) did not think that the House should go out of its ordinary course to change one of its rules in the absence of the noble Lord at the head of the Government.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, that by adopting the suggestion of the noble Lord, and taking the discussion to-morrow, all irregularity would be prevented. He should therefore propose, on the part of the Government, to take that course, and would afford his hon. Friend an opportunity for submitting his Resolution to-morrow.

Motion postponed.

EXAMINATIONS FOR THE DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR SERVICES—QUESTION.

MR. W. EWART said, he would beg to inquire of the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the system of examination proposed for Candidates in the Diplomatic and Consular Services has been adopted, or is in course of adoption; and, whether there will be any objection to lay before Parliament a statement showing the nature and subjects of such examination?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that a correspondence between the Foreign Office and the Civil Service Commissioners, which was laid before Parliament and printed on the 8th of February, 1856, fully explained the nature and subjects of the examination proposed for candidates in the diplomatic and consular services. That correspondence was also reprinted in the first Report of the Civil Service Commissioners in 1856, and their second Report contained further information on the subject.

MR. W. EWART said, he understood there had been some alterations in the character of the examinations.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER replied, that the information to which he referred was furnished from the Foreign Office, and he was not aware of any such alterations.

EDUCATION IN THE ARMY.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. WARREN: Sir, before I gave the notice which stands in the Votes in my name for this evening, I called the attention of the hon. Baronet the Under Secretary for War to the important subject-matter of that Motion, and at his request postponed the matter till this evening. I am happy to say that I have just received a communication from him of such a satisfactory nature, as will prevent my going into detail on a subject which involves, as every one knows, the stirring of very delicate and critical topics. I shall, therefore, content myself with reading so much of a General Order of His Royal Highness the Commander in Chief, dated the 19th June instant, as gave occasion to my notice. The Order to which I have referred was a General Order issued by his Royal Highness the Commander in Chief on the 19th June, directing—

“That, for the future, every soldier, after being dismissed from drill, shall attend school as a duty, until he is reported upon as sufficiently advanced in reading, writing, and arithmetic. With the concurrence of the Secretary of State for War, no fees are to be required for this attendance at school.”

The portion of the circular to which I am more particularly desirous of directing the notice of the House, is that which says, “that for the future every soldier after being dismissed from drill shall attend school as a duty, until he is reported upon as sufficiently advanced in reading, writing, and arithmetic!” Now, Sir, the spirit and object of the entire Order all must applaud, and I congratulate the country on his Royal Highness’s enlightened anxiety and efforts to elevate the condition of our soldiers; but immediately on seeing this Order, it occurred to me that very grave difficulties would beset any attempt to carry into execution that portion of it to which I have called the attention of the House. I need not now specify them; but my views have since been greatly strengthened by communication with some of the most distinguished general officers in the service. I have always felt a great interest in military matters, and let few General Orders escape my notice, which must be my apology, if any be necessary, for having ventured to call the attention of the House to this General Order. I beg, therefore, simply to ask the hon. Baronet whether the consideration of the authorities at the War Office has been given to this General Order; and, if so, whether they are prepared to take any steps to rescind or vary it?

SIR JOHN RAMSDEN had to tender his thanks to the hon. and learned Member for Midhurst for the courteous manner in which he directed the notice of the authorities to this subject. The question was one of very great importance; and though the Government was advised that the particular instruction to which the hon. and learned Member referred as a portion of his Royal Highness the Commander in Chief’s circular did not violate any principle of law, yet they thought that it would not be desirable—in fact, that it would be very objectionable—to act upon it. Consequently his Royal Highness had withdrawn the circular in question; and the particular passage to which the hon. and learned Member for Midhurst had pointed was modified by withdrawal of the words which required that attendance at schools should be part of a soldier’s duty. Instead of those words, a passage was substituted which merely recommended the officers of regiments to give every encouragement to soldiers in availing themselves of those facilities for instruction which were now afforded in the British army. He trusted that this explanation would be satisfactory to the House.

THE STATUTE LAW COMMISSION.

ADDRESS MOVED FOR.

MR. LOCKE KING said, he rose to call attention to the large sums of public money which have been expended by the Criminal and Statute Law Commissions without the consolidation of any branch of the Criminal or Statute law, and to move that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to dispense with the present Statute Law Commission. In the last Parliament he had brought forward several Motions having reference to those Commissions, upon which he had met with considerable support on both sides of the House. He would frankly confess that those Motions implied a censure upon the Statute Law Commission, but he thought it more satisfactory and straightforward now to submit a Resolution which would settle the point as to whether this Commission should or should not cease to exist altogether. Every one desired that the consolidation of the statute law should be proceeded with, and it might be thought strange that he should now propose to destroy the only machinery by which this was intended to be effected. He felt confident, however, that not only did the Commission, as at present constituted, accomplish no good whatever, but that it was productive of evil by pretending to do something, while it really effected nothing—that it was, in fact, a mere sham and delusion. There had been several of these Commissions, so that the people had no ground for complaining that that House had refused the supplies necessary for effecting an object so desirable. Far from that, the most lavish expenditure had been incurred, and, as he should show, no result whatever had been obtained. In 1806 a Commission had been appointed, and another in 1813, but he would confine himself to what had occurred in reference to this subject since 1833. In that year a Commission was appointed to digest the criminal law, and to inquire what could be done with the statute law generally, and they issued a series of blue-books down to 1845. No less than £37,000 had been expended by that Commission, and not a single Bill had been drawn by it. In 1845 another Commission was created to complete the work of its predecessor, and that Commission spent an additional £12,500, making a total of £49,500 expended by those two bodies. It was said that that last Commission had drawn one Bill which was once laid upon the table of the House of Lords, but it never passed into an Act. In addition to that sum of £49,500, he had found on moving for a Return of additional expenses that a further sum of £1,680 had been spent upon a variety of Bills which never passed, and he believed that they were the same Bills which the present Statute Law Commission had taken to itself the credit of having framed. In 1850 or 1851 the Commission of 1845 came to an end, for the simple reason, he believed, that all its Members had ceased to exist, or had been provided with other places, with the exception of Mr. Bellenden Ker, who had served as a Commissioner sixteen years, and who had received £10,400 of the public money without any result whatever. The next step in the order of events was the appointment of another Commission in 1853, the appointment of which was thus explained by the Lord Chancellor in proposing it:—

“But I look further. I conceive there is no reason why this proposed step should not at some future time, some years hence, constitute the formation of that which I have always looked forward to as the most desirable, though heretofore I have feared to be unattainable—a Code Victoria.”

At the head of that Commission was Mr. B. Ker and four members of the legal profession, were appointed as sub-commissioners to act with him. The Lord Chancellor's instructions to that body were very clear and satisfactory. They were—

“To ascertain precisely the text of the Statute law, as it now exists, by determining what Statutes have been repealed (expressly or virtually), what have expired, and what have become obsolete or unnecessary in the present state of society.

The text having been thus examined, a special and detailed Report should be made of all the repealed, expired, and obsolete Statutes.

This Report will form the groundwork of a declaratory Bill to repeal or confirm such Statutes, to be introduced, if possible, at the end of the present Session.”

That was the Session of 1853, but the Bill in question had never yet made its appearance. The new Commission set to work, and during the first year of its existence he must say it laboured hard. The expurgatory list was prepared, but it never had been revised; the sub-commissioners were all discharged, for what reason no one had yet explained, and Mr. Ker was left alone with his pupil, Mr. Brickdale, to constitute the Commission. Nothing of importance, however, took place till 1856, when a great event occurred. The Commissioners then discovered that all their previous work had been useless; instead of the Lord Chancellor's plan of preparing an expurgatory list, a new scheme was propounded, and it was determined that certain “bundles of statutes,” as they had been termed by the present Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, should be selected for consolidation. The great event of the year, however, was, that the hon. and learned Member for East Suffolk (Sir F. Kelly) joined the Commission. The hon. and learned Gentleman made a very able speech in that House in moving for leave to introduce two Consolidation Bills. The House gave him leave to bring them in, but those Bills had never made their appearance. The hon. and learned Gentleman upon that occasion made a very extraordinary statement. He said, “You must leave the whole matter to me. If you do, I will undertake myself in eighteen months to consolidate the whole law of England.” He (Mr. L. King) remembered that upon that occasion the present Mr. Baron Watson, who was then Member for Hull, said that if the hon. and learned Gentleman would only do in eighteen years half as much as he had promised to do in eighteen months, he would undertake to raise to his memory a column twice as high as that to the memory of the Duke of York in St. James's Park. He (Mr. L. King) knew not what progress the hon. and learned Member had made with his Consolidation Bills, but the eighteen months had long since elapsed, and not one had yet been laid upon the table. At the end of the Session of 1856 several Bills were hastily laid on the table of the House of Lords.

He was told that those Bills were sent over to Ireland, and that they came back with certain comments made upon them which showed that it was quite impossible that they could pass, and it was a fortunate thing that they had not passed upon the faith of that Commission. He was sure the House would agree with him that if the Statute Law Commission had been in earnest those Bills ought to have been revised during the autumn, and introduced again early in February, 1857. But that had not been done. The other day the same Bills were again laid upon the table of the House of Lords, but every one must see that it was impossible such Bills should pass when they were brought in at so late a period of the Session. There had been recently placed in the hands of hon. Members the third Report, as it was called, of the Statute Law Commission; but, in point of fact, it was the sixth Report, three Reports having been previously presented under the auspices of Mr. Bellenden Ker—three of these, however, were said to emanate from the Statute Law Board and three from the Statute Law Commission. If the Report lately issued had been the first instead of the sixth, he could readily believe all the promises that were made; but seeing that upon every occasion a fresh plan was propounded and fresh promises were made, he did not see how they could place any reliance upon it. Besides, the right hon. Gentleman opposite, the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Napier), last Session carried an Address to Her Majesty recommending the appointment of a Minister of Justice, and this appeared to him to be an additional reason for dispensing with the services of the Commission. He should not longer trespass upon the time of the House. He thought that he had made out his case, and he begged to move as an Amendment to the Motion, "that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair; that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to dispense with the present Statute Law Commission."

Mr. HADFIELD seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to dispense with the present Statute Law Commission," instead thereof.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he did not complain of the hon. Gentleman for having brought this important subject under the consideration of the House. The hon. Gentleman might, perhaps, have chosen a more fitting and convenient occasion for the purpose; but he rejoiced at the opportunity which was at length afforded him of communicating to the House something at least of what had been attempted by others, as well as by the Statute Law Commission, and of what had been done by the Commission since it had been in existence under Her Majesty's authority. It was but justice to the Statute Law Commission that it should be made known to the House and to the country that this great work of the consolidation of the Statute Law, which for more than 250 years had baffled and defeated the efforts of the most eminent jurists and statesmen which this country had produced, was now, upon one simple uniform and comprehensive plan, actually begun, and in a course of practical and, he trusted, successful progress under that very Statute Law Commission which the hon. Gentleman had that night called on the House to censure, and upon the Crown to dissolve. He hoped to be pardoned for endeavouring briefly to explain the nature and extent of the undertaking, for not completely and successfully executing which, during the short time the Statute Law Commission had been in existence, the hon. and learned Gentleman charged them with incompetency and incapacity. That work was the consolidation of the Statute Law, which meant neither more nor less than converting the present Statute-book, consisting of forty folio volumes, and containing upwards of 40,000 statutes, into a short, comprehensive, and intelligible work of four, or little more than four volumes, containing what then would be the whole of the effective and operative law of England; not as at present scattered indiscriminately and in confusion through a large number of volumes without any arrangement, beginning with Magna Charta and ending with the last Act of the last Session of Victoria, but collected in a short and comprehensive form, containing a series of statutes, arranged and classified, the classes being again subdivided into single Acts of Parliament, each Act being on a single subject but embracing that entire subject, and all in a well-arranged and chronological order on one uniform and connected scheme. It was needless at the present moment to dilate on the multiplied evils to which this country, and especially the Legislature, was subjected by the present state of the statute law. He needed not to remind the House that in those forty volumes of statutes to which he had referred, the whole of the 40,000 statutes, besides nearly 50,000 local and personal Acts, were now to be found only according to the order in point of time in which they were passed, and named after the successive Sovereigns in whose reigns they were passed; and not only were all these statutes heaped together without any description, order, and arrangement, but there were a great number of single Acts and even single sections of Acts, embracing each in itself a variety of subjects entirely unconnected with each other. With all the aid to be obtained from indexes and text books no one could attempt to make himself master of any single subject without laborious investigation and making his way through the whole body of statute law. And even then he had to ascertain, as best he could, whether whole statutes or particular sections and clauses were repealed or still continued in force. Not merely the members of the legal profession, but magistrates and country gentlemen, who, for the better discharge of their duties, might desire to possess themselves of a copy of the Statute-book, must purchase the entire forty volumes, nine-tenths of the contents of which are repealed or otherwise superseded. But, independent of the evils felt by all classes from the present state of the statute law, its effect on the current legislation of the country was more mischievous than could well be imagined. One consequence was that no individual bringing in a Bill into that or the other House of Parliament could satisfactorily make himself master of the statute law as it existed in reference to the subject on which he proposed to legislate. It therefore often occurred that Bills, which had passed through Committee with every care, repealed over again statutes or statutory enactments which had been repealed before; but, what was infinitely worse, statutes which were not known to exist were passed by and disregarded, and new enactments which were made in Bills that received the sanction of Parliament were found afterwards to be utterly at variance with existing enactments. Hence arose a degree of confusion leading to an amount of litigation, which became a fearful and wide-spread evil, as in the cases of the

Sir Fitzroy Kelly

Royal British Bank and the Tipperary Bank, in reference to which the courts were engaged in considering the effects of different Acts of Parliament, which were inconsistent with each other and contradictory. It had frequently been attempted by some of the most distinguished lawyers and statesmen to find an adequate remedy for these multiplied evils, and so long back as the reign of Queen Elizabeth the state of the Statute-book was considered by a Commission appointed by that Sovereign. Sir Nicholas Bacon, the Keeper of the Great Seal, was employed to make a Report on the subject to the Crown and to Parliament; but even in that early time, when the whole of the statute law was contained in some four or five small volumes, it was found, from the state of confusion, complication, and contradiction existing in the Statute-book, that the attempt to remedy the evil must be given up, and the most learned men and able lawyers of the day shrunk from the task in despair. The Statute Law Commission, appointed in 1835, and on which, as the hon. Gentleman stated, upwards of £30,000 had been expended, in their Report referred to some earlier Report of twenty or thirty years ago, and to a work on public records, in which the writer stated that the general revision of the statute law had often been recommended from the Throne, petitioned for by both Houses of Parliament, and engaged the attention of successive Committees; that it had been undertaken by individuals, sometimes with, and sometimes without the sanction of the Crown and Parliament, but never carried forward to any degree of maturity. It therefore appeared that Bacon, Hale, Somers, Hardwicke, Blackstone—all these great lawyers and statesmen—had in succession attempted this work of the consolidation of the statutes, and failed. Approaching our own times, Romilly, Tenterden, and Sir R. Peel, were found attempting much, and accomplishing something in the way of consolidation. The noble Lord the Member for the City of London (Lord J. Russell) and the right hon. Member for Carlisle (Sir J. Graham) with other hon. Members of that House; and in the other House of Parliament, the first and greatest of the law Reformers of the day—Lord Brougham, assisted and followed by Lord Lyndhurst, Lord St. Leonards, Lord Truro—and, though last not least, by the present Lord Chancellor Cranworth, had all directed their attention to this important subject. Numerous Committees or Commissions had considered the question in 1806, in 1816, in 1829, in 1833, in 1839, and again in 1849; but, although these Commissions—which were attended with vast expense to the country, and which had all the aid that could be afforded to them by the great statesmen and lawyers of the day—had done something towards the consolidation of particular branches of the statute law, none of them had been able to devise a specific, intelligible, and uniform plan upon which this great work could ever be even commenced with the slightest prospect of success. He (Sir F. Kelly) now came to the proceedings of that Commission which the hon. Gentleman the Member for East Surrey (Mr. Locke King), had denounced, and would persuade the House to address the Crown to dissolve. Under the advice of the present Lord Chancellor, Her Majesty was pleased to appoint, in 1853, a Commission to inquire into this subject. He (Sir F. Kelly) would admit that that Commission had sat from 1853 to 1856, without being able to accomplish what the great and eminent personages he had mentioned had attempted, but attempted in vain; but he did not concur with the hon. Gentleman in the opinion that the Commission had done nothing, or that the country was not indebted to them for their services. He (Sir F. Kelly) could speak freely of the proceedings of the Commission from 1853 to 1856, because he had not the honour of being a member of that body until February, 1856, and he ventured to say that, during that short period of three years, the Commission had done more than had been accomplished by all other Commissions which had sat during the present century. The Commission of 1853, acting upon the plan suggested to them by the Lord Chancellor, and with the aid of the Lord Chancellor himself, devised, in the first instance, the preparation of an index to the statutes, distinguishing in that index the various Acts and portions of Acts of Parliament which had been repealed, either expressly or by implication, which had become obsolete from lapse of time and change of circumstance, which had expired, or which had, from any other cause, or in any other way, become inoperative. Gentlemen, members of the bar, were employed in what had been called the work of expurgation, and Mr. Anstey, formerly a Member of that House, with the assistance of Mr. Rogers, prepared a very elaborate index to a great portion of the statute law, which was laid before the Commissioners, and was now in use as a guide to those members of the bar who were engaged in the work of consolidation. Besides this, also, most of the active members of the Commission employed themselves in framing Consolidation Bills relating to particular branches of the law; some ten or a dozen Bills were produced, and were now in existence, and although they required certain alterations to adapt them to the plan which had been devised, and was in course of execution, they were monuments of the industry, learning, and great ability of all who were engaged in their preparation, first among whom we must name Mr. Bellenden Ker, a gentleman with whom, except professionally, he had not the honour of being acquainted until he met him upon the Statute Law Commission, and to whom he should be doing an injustice if he did not say that the distinguished diligence, learning, skill, and untiring energy and perseverance with which he had dedicated himself to the work entitled him to the thanks of the country. There were others, also, who had rendered great and valuable services in this work; but, although indexes were framed, Bills prepared, Reports made, and suggestions thrown out, it was not until last year that the Commission could agree upon one fixed specific and uniform plan for the consolidation of the whole statute law. He (Sir F. Kelly) thought, considering what the Commission had actually accomplished within the short space of four years, which exceeded in practical utility all that had been done by former Commissions, he might safely and confidently appeal to the House whether the censure which had been passed upon it by the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Locke King) was deserved or not. In 1856, however, it occurred to several members of the Commission that, although the Bills that had been prepared were of great use and importance, and afforded some guidance and assistance towards the consolidation of the Statute-book, it was evident, upon a consideration of the entire subject, that a consolidation of the statutes could never be efficiently effected until some plan was devised by which the forty volumes of statutes could be dealt with completely, in such a manner as to lay aside all repealed, obsolete, and inoperative statutes, selecting from the mass the statute law of the land which was in actual force and operation. It was suggested that the law should be divided into classes, and that those classes should be subdivided into single Bills or Acts of Parliament, each class comprising some definite branch of law, and each Bill or Act of Parliament comprising one entire subject. It was further suggested that, whereas the same words were used in ten, twenty, or thirty different senses in different Acts of Parliament, and sometimes even in the same Act, an endeavour should be made to adopt one uniform system of arrangement and phraseology, and that by the new statute-book, which would reduce the statute law from forty volumes to four, the rudis indigestaque moles now existing should be converted into a well-arranged system of statutes, expressed in clear, intelligible, and uniform phraseology. After much anxious and laborious investigation by the several members of the Statute Law Commission, after several reports from various members, and after full consideration of those reports, a scheme for the entire and complete consolidation of the whole statute law of the United Kingdom was determined upon, and as soon as this was determined upon, measures were taken for carrying it into effect. He (Sir F. Kelly) had now to inform the House what had been done since this plan was devised. At an early period of the last Session he (Sir F. Kelly) moved for leave to bring in one or two Consolidation Bills, and he then stated to the House—as well as he was able to do so before the scheme suggested had received the entire and final sanction of the Statute Law Commission—the plan upon which it was proposed to consolidate the Statutes. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Locke King) was, however, mistaken in supposing that he had stated that the whole scheme would be carried into effect within eighteen months. What he said was, that, if the Government and the Crown would support the Statute Law Commission with the necessary funds and resources, and give their countenance and assistance to the plan which he then suggested, Bills for the consolidation of the whole statute law of the realm might be passed through both Houses of Parliament within three years. It was now fifteen months since he had made that statement, and he was prepared to repeat it with the greater confidence. A great number of Consolidation Bills were already drawn, and some of them had been laid upon the table of the House of Lords; and he was enabled to say very confidently that if the

Statute Law Commission obtained the support of the Crown, of Ministers, and of both Houses, there was no reason to doubt that in some eighteen months or two years from this time the whole statute law of England—and he hoped he might add of Ireland and Scotland—would be completely consolidated, and those forty cumbrous volumes of undigested matter be reduced to four, upon the system he had described to the House. He wished to make a few observations with regard to the criminal Bills. It occurred to the members of the Statute Law Commission that, inasmuch as the criminal law, beginning as early as the reign of King John, and going down to our own times, was in a state of great confusion and encumbered with all the difficulties that beset the task of consolidation, it would be but fair to the House, the Crown and the country, if they were to begin with the criminal law; and if they found any difficulties attending the work which appeared insurmountable, that it would be becoming in them to state to the House that they had met with those impediments, and that the whole undertaking must be abandoned. But, on the other hand, if they found on going through the whole of the criminal statutes from Magna Charta downwards, that by patience, perseverance, and determined application these difficulties were not insuperable, they should be justified in stating that circumstance to the House; and if they were afterwards able to consolidate the whole criminal statute law of the realm, the same means by which that result had been attained might be applied to the consolidation of other branches of the statute law. Accordingly, during the last year, they proceeded to consolidate the whole of the criminal statute law. It was true, as the hon. Gentleman had said, the Bills they had prepared as the result of their labours were transmitted to Ireland, but when he said those Bills had been returned by the authorities there with observations showing the impracticability of the undertaking, the hon. Gentleman was labouring under a misapprehension. It was found, however, that the criminal statute law of Ireland differed so much from that of England that the two could not conveniently and at once be consolidated on the same plan, and the result had been that the task with reference to Ireland was now committed to persons perfectly competent to undertake it. There was no reason to doubt that as soon as it was determined by the proper authority, whether or not it was advisable, to propose to Parliament the repeal of such statutes as constituted a substantial difference between the law of England and that of Ireland, the consolidation of the criminal statute law of Ireland would be completed, as it was complete with respect to England. The dissolution of the late Parliament prevented the Bills being brought forward with the hope of being carried in the short Session which began within the present year, but they had now been laid on the table of the House of Lords by the Lord Chancellor with some improvements, so that they were now in a fair way of being brought under the consideration of both Houses of Parliament. The hon. Gentleman had said that he could point out many errors in this consolidation of the criminal law. He wished that the hon. Gentleman had stated the nature of those errors, so that those who had the charge of the Bills might know what they were. Those Bills had been prepared during an interval of three or four years by some of the most eminent criminal lawyers at the English bar; they had been then submitted to Mr. Greaves and himself, then to Lord Wensleydale, and the late Lord Chief Justice Jervis, and had undergone a complete revision at the hands of the Lord Chancellor. Consequently the Commissioners believed that they were, at least, as free from error as a work of that kind could be expected to be, considering the nature of the undertaking and the difficulties with which it was necessarily surrounded. He believed those criminal Bills were now in a state to be passed through the House of Lords, and that when they came before the House of Commons they would receive its sanction and pass into a law. But, besides those eight Criminal Law Bills, there were ten other Bills ready to be submitted to the House, on some of the most important subjects within the compass of the law, such as the Law of Patents, the Law of Aliens, and other subjects, which he would not stop to enumerate. These also had been prepared by barristers of eminence and ability and had undergone a similar scrutiny. There was also another class of Bills now under the consideration of Vice Chancellor Page Wood. They had, in fact, independent of the Criminal Law Bills, forty-six Bills, either completed or in such a state of preparation that they hoped to submit a great part of them to Parliament during the present Session.

Such, then, were the labours of the Statute Law Commission, which the hon. Gentleman was so anxious to destroy. As to the question of expense, he thought he might say the whole of this great work might be completed at less than one-half the cost which had been expended on a single ineffectual Commission in other days. He submitted that, upon a consideration of the circumstances he had stated, the Statute Law Commissioners, so far from deserving the censure which had been cast upon them, might confidently appeal to Parliament and the country for their approval.

MR. WHITESIDE said, this discussion had come upon the House somewhat unexpectedly. The subject was one of great importance, and he was aware of the value due to any Commission which had the assistance of the industry, capacity, and knowledge of his hon. and learned Friend (Sir F. Kelly); but he was afraid that the discussion, so far as it had gone, only went to prove the necessity of their acting as soon as possible on the Resolution of the House by the creation of something like a Department of Justice, whose labours would meet with the confidence and approbation of the House. When the matter was last under discussion, the late Attorney General objected to the plan of the Statute Law Commissioners, because he wanted to have a codification with consolidation. The Lord Chancellor proposed consolidation without codification, and the present Attorney General argued in favour of a plan, which he illustrated by reference to the civil law. It was true that those who laboured under Justinian accomplished in three years what they had to perform in ten; but that was a charge which would never have to be imputed to any modern reformer. He (Mr. Whiteside) had been endeavouring to understand the proposition of his hon. and learned Friend with reference to imperial legislation; for if it were intended to have one set of statutes for England, another set for Ireland, and another set for Scotland, the original evil would, in his opinion, be magnified threefold. He should certainly oppose any proposition to have a separate set of Statutes on the same subject for England and for Ireland. Having received a copy of the Statutes on the criminal law, he carried the treasure to Ireland, and on the 30th of January put it into the hands of a gentleman perfectly familiar with the statute and criminal law, with a request to be told within what time it was possible to put the Bills, which contained literal copies of old Acts, into a shape whereby the law would be really consolidated, amended, and improved. The gentleman to whom he referred, thought it could be done by the 1st of April; but, as to the Bills themselves, pronounced an unfavourable criticism. The plan seemed to him to perpetuate the evils which it was intended to cure, and only to lay the foundation for future work by collecting Acts, which were scattered up and down the Statute-book. Under these circumstances, he (Mr. Whiteside) did not see there was much to be grateful to the Statute Law Commission for in the matter of expedition. The Lord Chancellor had said, that the Bills came back from Ireland an incongruous mass. He (Mr. Whiteside) did not know in what state they had been sent there; but he did know that there was no insuperable difficulty in consolidating the Irish Criminal Statute Law; and he, therefore, could never sanction a law which went to make separate sets of laws for the different parts of the same kingdom. It was a mistake to suppose that there was any insuperable difficulty in having the same law for England and for Ireland. He entirely denied that there was any great or broad difference between the criminal law of the two countries, and whatever difference there was, it might be easily adjusted. To make the same law apply to both countries was a comprehensive and imperial, while the opposite was a provincial and mistaken mode of proceeding. It was true that "conspiracy to murder" was a capital offence in Ireland and was not a capital offence in England. But why should that be so? The principle should be decided upon and the law made identical. It was understood that the Commissioners would take the criminal law first, then the law of real property, and then the mercantile law; but surely it was not intended to have a separate set of statutes as to real property and mercantile law for England and for Ireland. The Merchant Shipping Act, as a work of consolidation, was well done, and applied to the whole empire; and why should not the mercantile statute law be done in the same spirit and made to apply to the whole empire? He believed that when it came to be discussed, the House would be of opinion that it was better to have one code than three, and he should certainly oppose any other proposition.

SIR FITZROY KELLY explained that it was part of the plan, that the consolidation of the statute law should apply equally to England and Ireland, and that the reason why these Bills in the House of Lords only applied to England was, that it was left for future consideration, whether the points of difference in the law of the two countries should be permitted to remain or be extinguished; and he, therefore, hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman would give them his assistance when the Bills came before them in making them applicable to Ireland.

Mr. BAINES said, he could confirm in the most distinct manner the statement of his hon. and learned Friend that the Commissioners were most anxious to have no distinctions in the statute law of England and Ireland; though there were at present important differences in the law which existed in the two kingdoms, such as the Whiteboy Acts and other special statutes, which had no reference whatever to England. Indeed, one great object of the work in hand was to get rid of the differences that existed in the legislation for the several countries. The Motion before the House was for the discontinuance of the Statute Law Commission, and, in his opinion, that discontinuance at the present moment would be a great public misfortune. His hon. Friend the Member for East Surrey (Mr. Locke King) had referred to the unproductive labours of the Criminal Law Commission. He thought it only common justice to say that the Criminal Law Commission did a great deal of good. It consisted of the most eminent criminal lawyers, and they applied themselves diligently to the whole subject of the criminal law. They produced a series of the most valuable Reports, and although they did not propose any Bills which afterwards received the sanction of Parliament, every Bill on criminal subjects which had since passed had the suggestions of the Commissioners more or less incorporated in it. They took opinions upon various questions of criminal law upon which lawyers differed, they referred to the state of the law in other countries, they prepared a digest of the whole criminal law, and he thought it impossible to say that their labours had not produced great benefit. With regard to the Statute Law Commission, he believed there was now a prospect of their doing a great deal of good if their labours were not interrupted. What did Lord Brougham, a first-rate authority on this subject, say of the labours of this Commission, of which the hon. Member for Surrey spoke so disparagingly? In the debate which took place about ten days ago in another place this distinguished law reformer declared that—

“He entirely approved the course which had been taken by his noble and learned Friend (the Lord Chancellor). Great misrepresentations had been made with respect to the Statute Law Commission, and he was glad that his noble and learned Friend had described exactly what the Commissioners had done, and how far their labours of consolidation had proceeded. . . . The statement of the Lord Chancellor as to the value of the services of the Commissioners was by no means exaggerated, and if he were asked to mention one or two of the Commissioners who were more especially entitled to the thanks of the country, he would mention the names of Mr. Bellenden Ker, Mr. Coulson, and Sir Fitzroy Kelly.”

Again, it was well known that other men, whose names carried the greatest weight, were rendering important services to the Commission. Lord Wonsleydale regularly attended its proceedings, and Vice Chancellor Page Wood had also assisted in superintending many of the Bills drawn up under its direction, and so far from thinking the Commission of no use they were doing everything in their power to render its labours effectual. Seeing then the great advantage of their assistance, and the progress that had already been made in this work, no fewer than between forty and fifty Bills consolidating the law of this country on several most important subjects having either been introduced or brought to an advanced state of preparation, nothing could be more rash or injudicious than the course now recommended by the hon. Member for East Surrey. It was no doubt extremely desirable that the Resolution of the House of Commons should be carried out, and a Minister of Justice should be appointed, but until an ample opportunity had been afforded the Government for examining that question in all its bearings, and of considering the best mode of establishing another authority, to whom it might, perhaps, be found advisable to transfer the functions of the Statute Law Commissioners, he trusted the House would refuse to countenance any such Motion as that of the hon. Gentleman.

MR. NAPIER said, that he did not intend to prolong the discussion, but he wished to say a few words on the subject before the House. At the request of the Commissioners he had endeavoured to co-operate with them in regard to the improvement of the law of Ireland, and with that view he had, after consulting with other gentlemen in Ireland, given in a plan which was published in the Appendix to the Report. On finding, however, that his views were not adopted or his plan acted upon, he felt that he could do no good by further attendance on the Commission, and he therefore withdrew from it. While giving his hon. and learned Friend (Sir F. Kelly) every credit for his labours as a Commissioner, he nevertheless could not conscientiously say that he thought the Bills sent over to Ireland well adapted to the requirements of the case. In his opinion the plan that had been pursued could only end in public disappointment. It was impossible for a person so much engaged as his hon. and learned Friend in professional and Parliamentary duties to devote sufficient time to the due supervision of a work of this kind. No doubt they had many able persons anxious to carry out law reform, and who were collecting very valuable materials; but there was no one controlling mind to direct the whole. It was with this feeling that he had advocated the establishment of a Department of Justice, and he was happy to acknowledge the support he had received for this proposition from the noble Lord the Member for London. The object was not only to digest, amend, and consolidate the existing laws, but to keep our current legislation in harmony with the spirit of the times; and for this purpose they must have a responsible Minister with a separate department. The work of the Statute Law Commissioners would come properly under the surveillance of such a department. The Attorney General, he was bound to say, had directed his attention to the subject with great energy, and he (Mr. Napier) had given him every suggestion in his power. He (Mr. Napier) sincerely believed the plan would be fully considered; and he had reason to suppose that before long, a system would be constructed, under the auspices of the Attorney General, which would meet the Resolution of the House of Commons on the matter. If this were done, the working of the Statute Law Commission would come under the surveillance of that department, and the House might then reasonably calculate upon the result. In the hope that this would be speedily done, and that the labours of the Commission would be made useful, he (Mr. Napier) would recommend his hon. Friend the Member for East Surrey to rest content with the valuable discussion he had elicited, and not to press his present Motion to a division.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, it was not his intention to prolong that discussion, but he thought the House would feel that a more unreasonable proposition than that they should cut down the tree at the very moment when it was about to bear fruit, could hardly be submitted to any assembly. Nothing could be more absurd than to expect, on a subject like this, that a plan should not only be matured, but practically executed in a short period, by a Commission which could not sit de die in diem, but was composed principally of legal functionaries, whose other important functions so fully occupied them that they had but little time left to dedicate to this part of their duties. There was no subject on which he felt more anxious, or on which he held himself more pledged, than with regard to the undertaking entered into by the Government to carry out the formation of a Department of Public Justice. He had prepared plans with considerable care for that object, great part of which were now undergoing examination by Her Majesty's Government. He hoped that the scheme would be sufficiently matured to be made public before the end of the Session, and this was an additional reason why the hon. Member for East Surrey ought to be content to withdraw, for the present, the application which he had made to the House.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: I was surprised to hear the hon. and learned Attorney General designate the proposal of the hon. Member for East Surrey as eminently absurd. When my hon. Friend brought forward this subject last year, I thought that, upon the ground just stated by the Attorney General, it was quite fair to give the Government time to proceed with this Statute Law Commission; but when I went into the lobby to support them, I saw the Attorney General of that day, now the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, go away from the division. He would not vote for the Government. Surely, then, there must be some ground for saying that the Commission is not very useful. I am still prepared to do what I did last year—namely, to give further time to the Government; but I think that the question is not in a very satisfactory position. I think that what the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Napier) has said is quite just. It is very well to have a Commission which shall prepare a consolidation of the law, but unless you have some eminent person sitting in this House who can move the Consolidation Bills, show the reasons for the different clauses, and support them, there is very little use in having such Bills laid before Parliament. We are told now, that a set of Consolidation Bills has been laid before the other House of Parliament. That may be so, but the hon. and learned Member for East Suffolk must admit that, even if they pass through the other House, they cannot, at this period of the Session, come down to us in sufficient time to enable us to give them that consideration which would be necessary before we could venture to pass them. It appears to me that the use of these Commissioners is to enable persons holding the proper offices to take advantage of their learning and experience, with a view to the preparation and bringing before Parliament Bills for the amendment of the law. That was the course which I took in 1837 with regard to the amendment of the Criminal Law. When I had to propose Bills on that subject in that year, I collected the Criminal Law Commissioners at the Home Office, and sat with them several days, going through the different alterations which it was proposed to make. Part of those Bills, which made considerable alterations in the Criminal Law, are now, I believe, the law of the land. I must confess it strikes me that the Lord Chancellor has been rather premature in speaking of the speedy consolidation of the law, because, if you attempt to consolidate the law in its present state, you merely put together all that is to be found in the different statutes, and form a mere incongruous mass, as has been remarked with regard to the attempt to consolidate some part of the statute law of Ireland. You will find, with regard to breaches of trust and fraud, that there are various Acts of Parliament, and that those who drew them had different views of the guilt of different kinds of fraud, and, having different views with respect to the same frauds, they affixed different penalties to them, and different modes of conviction. If, therefore, you bring these Acts together, you will form not only an incongruous, but a very contradictory mass. I believe that the present is the time rather for amending than consolidating the law. The House of Lords has sent to us in the present Session two Bills, which I venture to say are founded upon very sound principles, and which, I trust, with some alterations, will pass into law. They are Bills upon two important subjects—one being on the subject of testamentary jurisdiction, and the other on that of divorce. Two more important subjects could hardly be touched by legislation. Those Bills, I believe, were framed, not by the Statute Law Commissioners, but by the Government, and by the House of Lords, under the guidance and advice of very able and learned men—Lord Lyndhurst, Lord Brougham, Lord St. Leonards, and others who have seats in that House. There are several other subjects, the laws on which will require very large amendments before you can proceed with their consolidation. If you attempt to consolidate the laws prematurely, you will re-enact a great many things that never ought to have been enacted at all. What you have to consider is, not how to consolidate, but how to amend. I agree with my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, that the question as to the appointment of a Minister of Justice should be maturely considered before you adopt any particular plan. But I am convinced that some such plan should be adopted, and that, unless you have persons besides the Lord Chancellor and those gentlemen whom the Attorney General described to be occupied in other matters, and who, therefore, cannot give the time necessary for sitting de die in diem to this matter, you can never properly proceed with the work of consolidation. But, if you have a person who is to give his best faculties and his time to the consideration of law reform, I believe you will see some good fruit, whether the Statute Law Commission continues its work or not. I do not know whether the hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin will agree in what I am going to say. I very much fear that he will not. No doubt this Minister of Justice would be a considerable expense to the country: but I think we might save that expense by abolishing that useless office, the Lord Lieutenancy of Ireland. That is a matter on which the Government should have full time to deliberate, but I think the time has come when such reform might be made, and I hope that a Minister of Justice will be appointed. I cannot vote for the abolition of the Statute Law Commission, but I must say that I think my hon. Friend the Member for East Surrey had very good grounds for asking what was the use of that Commission?

Motion negatived.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE: Sir, I rise for the purpose of occupying the time and attention of the House for a few moments, while I make a few observations upon the award of the judges who were appointed to take into consideration the merits of the many plans sent in for the construction of the new public offices, as well as upon some of the peculiarities of those plans themselves. The want of such offices had been admitted for a long time past, and had been much complained of by the public from time to time, until at length the Government admitted the fact by coming to the determination that suitable offices should be built. But although it was a matter long talked of, it cannot be said to have been very prominently forced upon the attention of the Government until within the last two years, and it is only very recently that active steps have been taken in reference to it, by inviting competition from all nations for tenders for the undertaking. The result of that invitation we have all seen in the specifications and drawings that have been sent in; so that it may be said that we have now arrived at that stage of progress in the undertaking, when it becomes imperatively necessary to pause, and weigh well and maturely and deliberately the next step, ere it be too late; for once the final step be taken, the Government may find themselves plunged headlong into an undertaking, the vastness of which it is scarce possible to comprehend, and which must necessarily entail upon the country for many years to come, a most enormous expenditure of the public money. I believe that all, or nearly all, the public newspapers in this kingdom have given publicity to the result of the deliberations of the judges, and have sent forth to the world, the award they have made; at least I saw it in several of the newspapers published yesterday. Now, it is no part of my object to find fault with that award, and I had no intention whatever of doing so when I rose to address the House on this subject; on the contrary, I am of opinion that the judges have shown that they well deserve the high opinion enter-

Office, sent in a design also for the Foreign Office; and it is somewhat curious to observe, that those two designs closely resembled each other; and yet when his design for the Foreign Office was compared with that of the gentleman who has been declared the successful candidate, the latter carried away the prize so successfully, that the design of the former gentleman for the Foreign Office was "nowhere." In fact, with respect to those two designs from the same individual, they may well be compared to the Siamese twins, having undergone the operation of being dis severed. In the case, again, of one of the minor prizes for the War Office, that prize was carried away by a gentleman, whose elevation for the Foreign Office, though absolutely related with the other, was rejected. Hence will arise many of the peculiarities and complexities which are sure to be found attached to such a complicated competition, although thrown open to the talent and genius of foreign nations. Now, with all these facts before us, I think the House will agree with me, that there ought to have been either a commission or a preliminary competition, at which the block plans should have been arranged; information ought to have been sought from architects, engineers, and amateurs, at home and abroad; a great imperial plan ought to have been insisted upon, and every advantage ought to have been taken of an opportunity which may never again recur. When all the conditions had been arranged, then one range of buildings should have been decided on all massed together under a single roof. There ought to have been one competition for all the public offices, while the successful design might have been carried out as the funds were forthcoming and opportunities presented themselves, and so we should have been released from the complication which must occur before long in respect to the difference between the block plan and those for the offices. Another mistake has been committed, which will prevent the complete success of this great undertaking. We are in possession of perhaps the most magnificent range of park land which any city in the world could boast of within its limits. There may be finer parks at Vienna and elsewhere; but for extent of sylvan scenery and exercise ground, and for amount of pure air in the heart of the metropolis, London is unequalled. Beginning with Kensington Gardens, you come next to Hyde Park; the open ground is resumed at the Green Park; the Palace-gardens may, as regards the fresh air they afford, be included, and then the range terminates with St. James's Park. Well then, following up this line of route, this last-named park brings you within, I may say, a few yards of the Thames. Then we arrive at a point which, under any other circumstances, would afford a grand and most varied and beautiful perspective following the course of the river, just at that curve in its course which gives on one side the fullest view of St. Paul's, as well as the countless spires of the city churches, and on the other of Westminster Abbey and the new Houses of Parliament. But all this splendid perspective is utterly lost from the extensive masses of those most squalid, wretched, and tottering buildings which offend the eye in the vicinity of St. James's Park. It would be extremely desirable that all this lumber should be removed, and that the park should be continued down to the river side, and that thus an improvement worthy of the age — worthy of this great and wealthy metropolis and of the country should be effected. And what, let me ask, is to prevent it? There is at present a Bill on the table providing for the purchase by the nation of this very block of houses, but it is proposed to devote the land on which they stand, not to the improvements I have mentioned, but to the rebuilding of the public offices, which, if finished, will for ever shut out the Thames from the parks. Why should this House give its sanction to such a proceeding as that? Is there no plot of ground now unoccupied on which these offices could be planted? I believe there is. The Parade behind the Horse Guards is a spot for which probably no one would claim any particular beauty or utility. I say, then, that if the Parade and the Horse Guards, and the Admiralty, were taken down, there might be laid out with little difficulty a piece of ground approximating to eight acres in area, 750 feet in length, and 400 in width, on which the whole offices might be reared. They would stand in that position isolated and magnificent, and then the site of the block of houses I have spoken of could be appropriated as garden-ground that would stretch to the water side. Into this of course would be thrown the garden opposite Palace Yard and the Abbey Yard, and thus there would be an open space of something like twenty-four acres, bounded on one side by the river, while isolated in the middle would stand the public offices, and further to the north the new National Gallery. If, however, these offices are built where the Government proposes, they will cut off everything from everything for ever. The parks will never reach the water side, the new National Gallery will be intercepted from the Houses of Parliament, the public offices will be crowded in, and the proposed embankment of the Thames will be deprived of what would be its noblest establishment. I am sorry to see that the competitors were limited in their plans to buildings of three stories. This height is, I know, in favour with speculative builders in the streets ramblingly distributed by them over new districts, but men of taste have learnt to discard it in their private houses; and yet it is to be perpetuated in what ought to be the most magnificent building of the age. I have already said that the present is an opportunity which may never occur again, and therefore I entreat of the House to bear in mind that important fact, and not to lose sight of it; for, once lost, it never can again be taken advantage of. Now is the time for the House to decide, whether this shall or shall not involve and decide the question of the future architectural beauty and magnificence of London—whether our parks shall be made the marvel of the world, the most magnificent specimens of landscape gardening ever known, or whether they shall remain patchy and blotchy, and cut off from the noble river which on one side might bound them. But I may perhaps be met by the argument of cui bono,—I may be asked, “Why do all this? I meet that by asking the House, Will it sacrifice such an opportunity as now is offered of making these vast and magnificent improvements in this part of the metropolis, and rush hastily and headlong into the adoption of plans and suggestions which have been as hastily acted upon up to a certain point, and which are in themselves exceedingly crude and ill-digested. I pray for a little consideration, a little pause, and I am satisfied that all the good results naturally to be anticipated by the competition which was a noble idea in itself, may be realized. With respect to the style, I will only say that it would be a vast pity if regard were not had to unity of design with Westminster Abbey and the Palace of Westminster. I am aware that the Gothic style is not very popular at present in this House, on account of the expense which has attended the construction of the building in which we are now assembled; but much of that expense is attributable to the selection of an impure style of Gothic architecture, and to the absence of a proper system of contracts, especially in the earlier stages of the work, as the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Public Works pointed out the other night. In conclusion, then, I again entreat the House to pause while there is yet time, and consider this question well, ere the too common error be fallen into, of mistaking outward ornament and mere tinsel, for real architectural grace and beauty, and therefore I do trust that the House will not come to any final conclusion upon the site and the style of architecture of these new and vast public offices, until the whole subject has been more fully and maturely discussed.

SIR BENJAMIN HALL said that, having received the Report of the judges on Monday evening, he had presented it on Tuesday to the House, and he thought that it would have been better if his hon. Friend had deferred his observations until that Report, which was now in the printer's hands, had been circulated among hon. Members. When the scheme of a competition was first devised a number of architects and other gentlemen waited upon and requested that he would name a mixed Commission to decide upon the designs, and he determined, therefore, with the consent of the Government, that the Commission should consist of seven gentlemen—one Member of the House of Peers, one Member of the House of Commons, Viscount Eversley, so long Speaker of the House of Commons, and four gentlemen connected with scientific societies. The judges who were selected were the Duke of Buccleuch, from the House of Lords; Mr. Stirling, the hon. Member for Perthshire, from the House of Commons; Viscount Eversley, the late Speaker; Earl Stanhope, the President of the Society of British Antiquaries; Mr. Brunel, as the representative of the civil engineers; Mr. David Roberts, of the Royal Academy; and Mr. Burn, to represent the architects; and he had never heard a single objection raised to the composition of that tribunal. In consequence of pressing business the Duke of Buccleuch was obliged to leave London for Scotland, and was unable to attend after the first meeting, and they all knew the sad event which had prevented Viscount Eversley from attending of late; but he had received a letter from his noble Friend, in which he stated that he entirely concurred in the selection which had been made of the block plan, and of the designs for the War Office and for the Foreign Department. So far as the first prizes were concerned; and he was happy to state that the other judges had been unanimous in all the designs which they had subsequently selected. He would now state the course which he proposed to take in reference to those designs. A great number of models had been sent in for the Wellington Monument—already fifty had been received from British artists, and nearly forty from foreign artists. He proposed, as soon as those models could be set up, that they should be exhibited in the interior of Westminster-hall, and that on the existing hoarding should be affixed the designs which had been selected for the block plan, for the War Department, and for the Foreign Office. It would be very inexpedient to come to any conclusion as to the relative merits of those plans until the House and the public had had an opportunity of inspecting and considering them. He was aware that his hon. Friend took a different view, perhaps a more intelligent view, than he (Sir Benjamin Hall), considering the duties of his office, could venture to submit to Parliament. He agreed with his hon. Friend that, if all the intervening buildings between the Park and the Thames were removed, one of the most splendid sites in the world would be obtained; but, looking at the House of Commons, and at the vote come to the other night, he did not think that he should meet with much success if he were to propose such a scheme as that, which would add at least £1,000,000 or £1,500,000 to the plan already contemplated. He had therefore contented himself with taking a very small proportion of the ground proposed to be taken by his hon. Friend, and he hoped that there would be no objection to that; at all events, that which he would propose would not only be part of an ultimate whole, and would not interfere with the plan for throwing open the view to the Thames. If it should be the pleasure of the House that there should be two new offices erected, as there really ought to be, for the benefit of the public service—namely, one for the War Office, and another for the Foreign Office; and if they should not disapprove the plans which had been selected by the judges, he would endeavour during the recess to make the plans as perfect as possible with regard to the interior arrangements. He would have drawings prepared in conformity with those interior alterations, he would have the quantities also taken out, and he would place the drawings and the quantities in the hands of a limited number of the most eminent builders in the kingdom. Tenders would then be sent in, and he hoped that he should be able to state to Parliament what would be the entire ultimate cost of those erections. Indeed, if those preliminary steps were taken, he saw no reason why a person in his position should not be able to give something like a guarantee to the House that the buildings should be completed for a sum named, with such trifling addition for contingencies, as was always allowed. That was the course which he proposed to pursue, and he hoped that it would meet with the approval of the House.

MR. LINDSAY was anxious to ask the Secretary for the Treasury when the Vote for harbours of refuge (No. 1) would be proceeded with? He had expected it to be proposed to-night, and he now found that other Votes stood for consideration.

MR. WILSON said, that the first Vote which would be considered was in connection with the British Museum. If time permitted, the Vote to which the hon. Member referred would come on in the course of the night.

MR. BRISCOE said, that he would suggest that in addition to the drawings about to be exhibited, there should also be models of the proposed new buildings made to a certain scale. The public would thus be better enabled to judge of the nature and correctness of the designs which had been approved.

MR. BAILLIE observed, that the right hon. Baronet had not stated the intentions of the Government with respect to the site of Westminster-bridge, and the alterations to be made in conformity with some general plan.

SIR BENJAMIN HALL said, that what he stated some time ago was that, after receiving the award of the judges on the plans for public offices, he would take into consideration what should be done with Westminster-bridge. He had only received the award little more than forty-eight hours ago, and therefore he could not yet state positively what should be done with respect to the matters referred to by the hon. Member, but he hoped to be able to do so before long.

MR. MANGLES said, he wished to say a few words on a subject cognate with that which had been brought under the consideration of the House. The hon. Member for Maidstone (Mr. B. Hope) had spoken with great ability on the importance of throwing open the Thames to the park. No doubt that was very desirable, if it could be done, but before the Thames could be thrown open to the park with any advantage, comfort, or decency, they must first purify it. It was impossible, in his opinion, for any man to speak in terms sufficiently strong of the abominations by which the river was at present polluted. The Thames might be made a great object of beauty in the metropolis; while it certainly was a great highway, an enormous amount of traffic passing daily along it between the city and the west end; and he had been in the habit of going to and from the city in steamboats. He should do so no longer, for in the present state of the Thames it was impossible for any man who had any regard for his comfort or nose, or for his health, to be upon the river. He was satisfied that its condition must be injurious to the public health. He came up it the other day—it was a hot day—and the river emitted throughout its whole course, and not merely where the drains ran into it, a most abominable stench, which was so much increased, as the steamboat ploughed up the water, as to become quite unsupportable. He had made up his mind never to travel in that way again. During the hot weather last year the hon. Member for Richmond (Mr. Rich) was made seriously ill by one single voyage between Westminster and the city. It was a scandal that this magnificent river should be converted into an open sewer, poisoning the health of the population. If the cholera were to visit the shores of the Thames the most serious results must be apprehended, and he therefore thought that no amount of expense ought to be spared to restore the Thames to its pristine purity, and he earnestly hoped that his right hon. Friend the Chief Commissioner of Works would take the earliest and most effective measures for the attainment of that important object.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY remarked, that he thought it well that public attention had been called to this subject. He was anxious to know how soon the plans submitted by the Metropolitan Board of Works to the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir Benjamin Hall) would be returned, and the Board enabled to proceed with the purification of the Thames.

SIR ERSKINE PERRY said, that public attention had long been anxiously directed to this subject, and it would be very satisfactory to know what was being done with the designs for the improvement of the river. He entirely concurred in the observations which had just fallen from the hon. Gentleman respecting the state of the Thames.

SIR BENJAMIN HALL said, under the Metropolis Act of 1855 the Metropolitan Board of Works were diverting the sewerage from the Thames, and might, if they pleased, intercept sewers on each side of the river. They were bound to submit the plans to the First Commissioner of Works for his approval. He had received those plans at the close of last year, and referred them to three eminent engineers, Captain Galton, Mr. Simpson, and Mr. Blackwell, one of whom he saw a few days ago, and was told that they had gone thoroughly into the case, and hoped to be able to submit the plans to him in a fortnight, with such alterations as they deemed necessary. As soon as he received them, he should forward them with the Report to the Metropolitan Board of Works, and perhaps it might be convenient that a copy of that Report should be laid on the table of the House, in order that the House might see how the Act of 1855 was likely to be carried out, and what the great scheme was which was submitted to the Government by the three Commissioners.

MR. BENTINCK said, he must complain that the House was not earlier in possession of the way in which the Government proposed to move the Estimates.

LORD ELCHO said, that his hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone (Mr. Beresford Hope) had suggested what should be done in the way of improvement on the Westminster side of the river, and he begged to suggest something in the way of improvement on the other side. Every one must admit that the buildings opposite the New Palace at Westminster were most unsightly, and, as a new bridge was to be built, he suggested that an endeavour should be made by the Government to obtain possession of those buildings on the opposite side of the river, for the ground there would become exceedingly valuable when the Westminster side was thoroughly improved. If a good class of houses were built there by the Government, they might be found an excellent speculation, and serve to pay part of the expenses of the buildings on the Westminster side.

SIR BENJAMIN HALL inquired where the money to purchase the buildings was to come from.

SUPPLY—MISCELLANEOUS ESTIMATES.

House in Committee. Mr. FITZROY in the Chair.

(1.) £46,400 British Museum Establishment.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, that in compliance with the annual practice, he came forward, as one of the trustees of the British Museum, to submit this Vote to the Committee. The sum now required for the Museum was £46,400, which, added to the Vote of last Session, would make the total expenditure this year amount to £66,400, being an increase of £6,400 on the sum voted for the same purpose last year. He could, if necessary, point out the various items in which the increase took place, but he thought the Committee would be satisfied if he merely called attention to the different heads of expenditure; on the first head, "salaries," there was an increase of £4,380; on the second, "house expenses," there was an increase of £600. On the third head, "purchase and acquisition," the increase was £4,690; under the head of printing catalogues the increase was only £50. On the fourth head, "book-binding, cabinets," &c., there was a decrease, £3,165; and a decrease of £100 in the miscellaneous charges, making the net increase £6,400, as he had stated. The great increase in the item of salaries was owing to the increase of the Museum and the opening of the New Reading Room. The Committee was aware, that some time back, after much discussion and consideration, a sum of £150,000 was voted for the purpose of increasing the space for the library, and giving sufficient room to students; in pursuance of that Vote a building of great beauty and magnificence had been erected; the dome exceeded that of St. Peter's in diameter by one foot. A matter, however, of even more importance than its beauty was the great amount of convenience it afforded, and he thought it would be found most commodious by all persons frequenting the library for purposes of study and literary research. It contained tables, along which ample space was allotted to 300 persons, and on the shelves around it were arranged 800,000 volumes. Those shelves were altogether not less than twenty-five miles in length. Upwards of 10,000 volumes had been added to the library last year, and up to the present period of this year 3,000 more volumes had been received under the Copyright Act than during the corresponding portion of the year preceding. The Committee would see, therefore, that the money which was now asked for, was asked for to keep up a library which was at present one of the most considerable in Europe; and he believed that for purposes of study it was superior to any in the world. Great additions had also been made of late years to the collections in the Museum, in the shape of objects in Natural History, and Assyrian, Greek, and Roman Antiquities. A question had been raised as to whether so many different objects ought to be deposited in one building. That was not, however, a point which the trustees of the Museum had to decide. Their business was merely to see that the general management of the establishment was properly conducted, and to see that the collections entrusted to their care were as accessible as possible; and as it appeared that 360,000 persons during the past year had visited the Museum while a considerable number had attended the reading rooms, he thought that these facts showed that it must have been productive of much pleasure and instruction to the public. There was another question with which the trustees had nothing to do, but which had frequently been discussed; and that was, whether the Museum should be opened on the Sundays. That was a matter which the House only could decide; and last year they had by a great majority resolved that it should not be opened on those days. The trustees had, therefore, only to see that that Resolution was carried into effect. He should also state, that the Museum was very much increased by the additions which were gratuitously made to it from time to time. The late Sir William Temple, for instance, our ambassador at Naples, and a man of great taste and intelligence, had left to the Museum a large mass of Greek and Roman antiquities, which he had peculiar facilities of collecting. Some complaints were put forward last year, that the subordinate officers of the Museum were not paid as well as persons holding similar situations in other public and private establishments. The trustees had, in consequence, asked the Lords of the Treasury, to send certain gentlemen to the Museum to inquire into that subject. Those gentlemen had made that inquiry, and would, he believed, before long make their Report, and as soon as it should have been produced, the House would be made acquainted with the steps which it might be proposed should be taken in the matter. For the present the trustees felt compelled to pay the officers of the establishment at the rates which had hitherto prevailed. He believed that he need not trespass any further on the time of the Committee; but if any explanation should be required of him with respect to matters of detail, he should be ready to afford hon. Members all the information in his power. In conclusion, he had to move the adoption of the Vote.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said that he found every year large balances to the credit of the Museum, and he wished to know whether those balances remained in the Exchequer or whether they were drawn out and placed in the hands of a private banker. He wished also to call attention to a complaint which was made of the number of days—only three—upon which the Museum was open during the week. For his own part, he considered that it might be kept open five days, and for a longer time during each day. The people paid a large sum towards this establishment, and greater facilities ought to be given to them to visit it.

MR. BRYDGES WILLYAMS said, that he observed an item of £5,000 for gilding the dome of the new reading room. Now, he considered that that was an unnecessary piece of expenditure, and he should take the sense of the Committee upon it.

MR. MONCKTON MILNES said, he would admit that great accommodation was now afforded to students, but unless something more was done a large number of persons would be deprived of the benefits of the institution, as there were many persons of high distinction in literature who could not bring themselves to study in a public room. Under the former arrangement no accommodation was provided for such persons, but he hoped that the trustees would now take such steps as would afford the requisite conveniences for at least a small number of these persons; in every foreign country these conveniences were provided. He had still to complain that no arrangements were made for lending out books at this or any other of our public libraries.

MR. JOHN LOCKE said, it would be recollected that he had on a previous evening called the attention of the House, when a discussion had been going on with regard to the new building at Brompton, to the fact that the working classes of the Metropolis justly complained of being deprived of any facility for visiting the British Museum or National Gallery in consequence of Sunday being their only day for recreation, and those buildings being closed on that day. On that occasion the right hon. Member for Hertford (Mr. Cowper) stated that the convenience of the working classes had been consulted to some extent in the case of the Brompton exhibition, inasmuch as the public had access to it during three evenings of the week. He (Mr. Locke) did not see why the rule adopted with regard to the Brompton exhibition should not be applied to the British Museum. Objections had been made to opening the library of the Museum in the evening, but there could be no doubt if that department of the institution were accessible in the evening it would be visited by thousands who had now no opportunity of availing themselves of the contents of the library. Indeed, under the existing regulations, almost the only class to whom the library was useful were persons engaged in literary occupations, who were able to spend their time there during the day. He saw no reason, however, why the collections of sculpture, mineralogy, and the other general departments of the Museum should not be opened to the public on certain evenings during the week. But if this alone were done it would be no great boon to open it to the working classes when they were exhausted by the toils of the day. To give them the full benefit of the institution, he thought that the Museum might with great propriety be opened on Sunday after the hours of divine service. It had been said that if this course were adopted the attendance of many of the officers of the Museum would be necessary on Sunday; but he had been informed by a gentleman engaged in the Museum that if the institution were opened on Sunday it would not be necessary to employ more than twenty of the servants, and this, it must be remembered, only after the hours of divine service. At present the only national establishments accessible to the poorer classes on Sunday were Hampton Court Palace and Kew Gardens. Those places, in consequence of their distance from London, could not be reached without some expense, and a great number of persons were necessarily employed on the railway and steamboats to facilitate the conveyance of visitors. He (Mr. Locke) believed that if the British Museum and the National Gallery were opened on Sundays the result would be to reduce the number of visitors to Hampton Court and Kew, and to lead to the diminution of Sunday labour by enabling the railway and steamboat companies to dispense with the services of many of their servants who were now employed on that day. He had considered it to be his duty to bring this matter before the Committee in the presence of the noble Lord the Member for London, who had moved the Estimate, and he felt quite sure that, if the noble Lord would take it into his consideration, and would arrive at the conclusion he had pointed out, a great step in advance would be made.

MR. CHILD said, he had always voted against the opening of the British Museum on Sundays, and would continue to do so, but he would urge the Trustees to render the institution accessible to the working classes on some week day evenings. In the county he represented (Staffordshire) an exhibition of works of art and science which had been opened in the evening had been visited by 25,000 persons, principally of the working classes, and, much to their credit, no mischief had been done to any of the objects exhibited. He would also suggest that the prints, etchings, and drawings in the Museum, which were now kept in portfolios and could only be inspected by special order, should be rendered more accessible to the public. In the Louvre the drawings of ancient masters were framed, glazed, and exhibited in a suite of apartments devoted to the purpose; and he thought that, with a view to the improvement of the popular taste, the Trustees of the British Museum should exhibit to the public the valuable collection of prints and drawings in their possession. If room could not be found in the Museum, he did not see why that portion of the National Gallery, which was at present occupied by the Royal Academy, should not be devoted to the purpose. He was informed that there were, in the mineralogical department of the British Museum many duplicate specimens which, he would suggest, might with great advantage be lent to provincial scientific institutions.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY observed, that if the Museum were opened on Sundays, he would recommend the trustees to engage as attendants on that day members of the Jewish persuasion. This arrangement would enable them to overcome one of the difficulties which presented itself. He thought it ought to be opened on week-day evenings, and also after the hours of divine service on Sundays. Why could not the Museum be opened on week-day evenings between the hours of eight and ten, when the working classes would have an opportunity of visiting the institution?

MR. BAXTER asked, whether it might not be possible to open the Museum to the public on Saturday afternoons. Some hon. Gentlemen did not seem to be aware that last year the House of Commons, by an overwhelming majority—something like six to one—determined that the British Museum should not be opened on Sunday. If any hon. Members were desirous that that decision should be reversed, the proper course, in his opinion, would be to bring forward a specific Motion on the subject, and then the views of the new House of Commons on this very important question might be ascertained. He thought, however, that the present was not a fitting occasion for the discussion of a question in which the nation took so deep an interest.

MR. STEUART said, that he was decidedly in favour of the working classes having a fair opportunity on week days to view works of art, and he believed that if people laboured only fifty-five instead of sixty hours in the week, and occupied the remaining five hours in contemplating the works of art and nature stored in our national collections, they would feel the benefit of such a course during the whole of their working hours: without going into the theological arguments, therefore, he should oppose any proposition which, by opening the British Museum on Sunday, was likely to check the movement in favour of a Saturday half-holiday, which was going on in the metropolis and other large towns.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, he could see no reason why the British Museum should not be opened at least five days in the week. With respect to the Sunday, he entertained a strong opinion that it was one of the greatest blessings to the working population of this country that Sunday was entirely consecrated. He was quite satisfied that those who had the interest of the working classes most deeply at heart were most anxious carefully to preserve for them that blessing of a hallowed Sunday which scarcely any other country in the world possessed.

MR. INGRAM observed, that a great deal had been said about opening the British Museum upon Sundays, but for his part he should like first to see it open every day in the week. Granting that it required time for cleaning, he thought that the building need not be entirely closed for that, as the public might be admitted to one part while the other was closed, which, as it took considerably more than one day to view, would form a matter of very little importance; and he would say the same of the National Gallery. He thought, also, that if the designs of models now being exhibited in Westminster Hall were shown in the British Museum, it would form an additional attraction, while at the same time it would relieve the former building, and thus obviate the inconvenience they all had experienced of late.

MR. JOHN LOCKE remarked, that he would remind the House that it would be quite time enough to discuss the question of Saturday half-holidays when they found the employers willing to pay a whole day's wage for half a day's work. At present the workman in many instances considered it an absolute injury to him, reducing as it did his scanty earnings. With regard to the desecration of the Sabbath, that was a question upon which many different opinions prevailed, and it was past his comprehension how the contemplation of all the wonders of nature and art in the British Museum on a Sunday could be deemed a desecration of the Sabbath. The Nineveh marbles alone afforded a better commentary on that book which they all revered, than many a written one he had seen or heard read. He certainly thought religion would be benefited by permitting the people to visit such places on a Sunday. He would remind the House that Saturday was the Sabbath, and not Sunday; and for his part, when he spoke of the Sabbath, he spoke as a Christian, and not as a Jew.

SIR HENRY VERNEY observed, that he considered it would be introducing the thin end of the wedge for the establishment of Sunday labour, and if ever that was established, workmen would not get one farthing more for working seven days a week than they now did for six.

MR. HARRIS said, that he also should be glad to see the Museum opened on weekday evenings. With reference to the question of opening it on Sundays, he thought that was one of national interest; for if it were opened on that day he saw no reason why the public should not be also admitted to all other institutions of a similar character, both in London and the provinces. There was, however, a deep national feeling for the religious observance of that day, and he was sure that the people of this country would never consent to the public money being given to these institutions if they were opened on Sundays. This, moreover, was a subject of too great importance to be discussed on a Vote of the kind then before the House, and whenever the question came forward in a proper manner he should record his vote against it.

MR. STEUART said, that in reply to the observations of the hon. Member for Southwark (Mr. Locke) he would observe that the grants for general education and for education in the fine arts, which had been increasing from year to year, were based on the principle that skilled labour was more valuable than unskilled; and it was, therefore, his belief that if the working classes got a half-holiday on Saturday their skill would, in consequence of the education which they would thus be able to obtain, be so much increased that they would soon be as well paid for fifty-five hours per week as they now were for sixty.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he rose to reply to the questions which had been put to him. The hon. Member for Lambeth (Mr. W. Williams) had asked how it was that there were every year such large balances to the credit of the Museum, and whether these balances were placed in the hands of its banker. The answer was that those balances were always left in the Bank of England, where the Museum had a separate account; and they were necessary, in order to enable the trustees to continue their current payments during the interval which elapsed between the end of the financial year and the time when the Votes of that House were agreed to. These balances, however, were not more than was generally required for that purpose. Several hon. Gentlemen had advocated the opening of the Museum on days and times when it now was not open. Let him, before replying to those hon. Gentlemen, state when it was open. The Museum was open to every one on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays, and to artists and those who wished to study and make copies of works of art, on Thursdays and Saturdays. During the summer months it was also open to the public on Saturday afternoons. The reading-room was open to persons having orders of admission from ten till five o'clock in winter, and from nine till six in summer. When it was proposed to open the Museum an additional number of hours and days they had to consider the convenience and utility of the Museum to various persons who went there for different purposes. After the discussion which took place on this subject in that House last year he (Lord John Russell), being then one of the junior trustees of the Museum, placed before the Standing Committee the proposals which had been urged with regard to the days on which the trustees might on their own authority open the institution to the public. But they were of opinion that if the Museum were open to the public on Tuesdays and Thursdays considerable inconvenience would result to persons who were in the habit of attending it for the study of art. He desired also that the opinion of the officers of the Museum connected with the art department might be taken upon that point, and they likewise coincided with the trustees. The trustees then considered the proposition made last year by the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck), that the Museum should be open in the evenings; but they were of opinion that there would be such great danger of fire to the contents of the building, which were so extremely valuable, from such an arrangement, that they did not feel themselves justified in acceding to it. And with respect to the number of days on which it should be open, he must express the great doubts which he felt, whether the persons who were unable to visit the Museum on a Monday, Wednesday, or Friday, could find the means to do so on any other weekday. Then came the question which had been opened in the course of this discussion—namely, as to the opening of the Museum on Sundays. With regard to which, the trustees felt that, after the decision of the House last Session, they had no right to entertain it. He was not going to give any opinion on that subject at present. It was quite competent to any hon. Member to introduce the question, but if it was to be regularly decided, it must, he thought, be upon a separate Motion. He was entirely satisfied with the reasons given by his noble Friend the First Lord of the Treasury last year against the opening of the British Museum on Sunday. He voted as a Member of that House against its being opened on that day; but the question might be again considered by the House when any hon. Member chose to bring it forward. Then his hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Milnes) thought it very hard that persons who wished to study privately at the Museum should not have separate rooms and accommodation expressly provided for them. But his hon. Friend would see that it would be extremely difficult for the trustees or the principal librarian to decide who the persons were who ought to be admitted to such a privilege. There were certainly persons in this country and in this metropolis of great literary fame; but he could understand that if the trustees attempted to draw a line the persons immediately below that line would consider themselves very much aggrieved. He (Lord John Russell) admitted it was an inconvenience to exclude persons from the benefit of private study; but if the general rule was left as it was at present at the Museum, that no such facility should be granted, the trustees would give less cause of offence to the great body of literary men frequenting the institution than by drawing an invidious distinction such as had been suggested by his hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract. With regard to the gilded dome, he must observe the trustees were not responsible for it. When the suggestion was made by certain persons, the architect was first consulted, before the gilding was undertaken, and he gave it as his opinion that it would be a great improvement, and would materially enhance the beauty of the building. But before the expense was incurred he (Lord John Russell) advised that the architect should go to the Treasury and consult the authorities there upon the subject. He did not think it was a question for the trustees. The Treasury listened to the representation of the architect, and certainly the result had been very much to heighten the effects of the structure. Whether they had not gone to an excess in that respect, so as to make the beauty of the building too much an object of interest to persons who resorted there for the purposes of study, was a different question, on which some doubt might be entertained; but all those who had seen the new reading-room must have been convinced, not only that it was extremely handsome, but also extremely convenient and commodious, and great credit was due, in connection with it, in the first place, to Mr. Panizzi, the principal librarian, who was the first to suggest the erection of a building on so magnificent a scale; next, to Mr. Smirke, the architect, who formed the design; and, in the third place, to Messrs. Baker and Fielder, the contractors, who carried out the design and executed the details. He would only add that it was the wish of the trustees generally—amongst whom was now included the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Walpole) and who paid great attention to this subject—to make this great national institution as useful as they could in every respect to the public. There was certainly the difficulty with respect to the working classes; but he hoped in some way or other they might have the advantage of seeing the building; for if the trustees could make the institution more accessible to that class of the population they would have the opportunity of studying the works of the Creator and of art with which it was stored, with, it was to be hoped, the happiest results to themselves.

COLONEL SYKES said, he wished to remind the Committee that a great public institution like this was supported out of the taxation of the country, and intended to aid in cultivating the minds of the great mass of the people. While, therefore, he concurred in the opinion that every public institution should be open to the greatest extent on week days, he was at the same time of opinion with other hon. Gentlemen who had addressed the Committee that the Sabbath should be set apart for other duties. With regard to the alleged danger of lighting up such a building at night so as to make it accessible to the working classes after the hours of labour, he confessed he saw no cause for apprehension on that score, provided the edifice was lighted from the roof, on the same principle on which the House in which they were assembled was lighted. It was very desirable, he thought, that foreigners and persons who came up from the country should be able to obtain admission at all times.

Vote agreed to, as were also the following Votes.

Lord John Russell

(2.) £29,314, New Buildings and Fittings.

(3.) £944, Purchase of Objects for the Museum.

(4.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £23,165, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expenses of the National Gallery, including the purchase of Pictures, to the 31st day of March 1858."

LORD ELCHO said, when this grant was under discussion in the last Parliament, exception was taken to the appointment of a secretary and of a travelling agent. He now wished to call the attention of the Committee to the same subject. Last year a Member of the House moved that the Estimate be reduced by the amount of the travelling agent's salary and his travelling expenses, which amounted together to about £1,000. A Committee of that House, which sat in 1853, recommended the appointment of a director, and that he should receive a handsome salary, but they made no such recommendation with regard to the appointment of a secretary. But now the House of Commons was asked to vote £750 for the salary of a secretary—a very excessive sum considering the duties. With a thoroughly efficient director a secretary could not have much to do beyond answering the letters about current business and the purchase of pictures, and attending the meetings of the trustees, and certainly £750 was rather an extravagant salary for this. It might be said by the Secretary for the Treasury that he had a great deal to do, that he had arranged the Turner pictures, for instance. So he had, but Mr. Ruskin, who took as great an interest in Turner as any man, had offered to perform that duty gratuitously, and no doubt he would have done it quite as well. The Secretary for the Treasury would also say that he had to compile a catalogue, but that could not be very hard work, inasmuch as previous to the new constitution a catalogue was in existence, drawn up by this same gentleman, and the purchases made since were comparatively trifling. Mr. Murray, or Mr. Longman, or any other publisher for £750 down would engage to get up as good a catalogue as any one could want. Considering how long the clerks in the public offices had to work before they got £750 a year—twenty or twenty-five years on an average—and considering how many of our hard-working clergymen were living on salaries far less—this was rather too much to pay for a secretary, and he should move to reduce the Vote to what he thought a very ample amount, namely, £500. Next came the Vote for the travelling agent. This, too, was an appointment not recommended by the Committee, and which had taken the House rather by surprise. It was discussed last year, and an attempt was made to get rid of it, but the proposition was rejected, and he then pledged himself to renew the discussion this year. This travelling agent was appointed at the instance of the director, who was most anxious about him, and, in fact, made his appointment an ultimatum, without the concession of which he would not accept office himself. He expressed great confidence in this gentleman's judgment; but at the same time great diffidence, it was said, in his own. The appointment, he contended, was vicious in theory, and had worked ill in practice. In the first place, he did not see how they could expect to get a trustworthy and efficient man to fill that office for £300 a year; and in the next place, it perpetuated, to a certain extent, the system of divided responsibility, while the endeavour ought to be in all these institutions to get one responsible officer. Under the old constitution there were trustees and a keeper equivalent to a director. They did not go well together, and if mistakes were made the trustees threw the blame upon the keeper, and the keeper, in his turn, threw the blame on the trustees; so in the same way now the responsibility was divided between the travelling agent and the director. Having been, in the course of the last winter, in that part of Italy which the travelling agent and the director had been exploring, he had heard, though he could not vouch for the truth of the statement, of one or two instances in which this divided responsibility had led to works, which would have been a great ornament to the gallery, not being purchased. If he asked why such and such a picture was not purchased, the answer was, "Oh, the director wanted it, and the travelling agent didn't want it," or vice versa. They might, however, judge of the system by what had been actually done. Last year there was a great deal of discussion about the purchase of a Paul Veronese. That picture cost £1,977, and he had seen something about it in the Official Gazette of Venice, which might be presumed to be good authority, which would, perhaps, enable the Committee to form some idea of the judgment shown in that purchase. This picture came out of a church which was being restored; all the pictures were taken down, and permission was obtained from the Pope to dispose of them for the benefit of the church. The curate of the church rendered an account of what had become of these pictures, and he stated that—

"After the complete restoration of the ancient temple of Pope St. Sylvester, some of the paintings which had decorated its walls had remained out of use since 1837, and among them was a Paul Veronese representing the 'Adoration of the Magi.' They were appraised by a commission appointed by the Royal Academy of Venice, and the value set on them was 11,300 Austrian livres, or about £400, and out of this sum the Paul Veronese alone was valued at 10,000 Austrian livres, or £370."

And this was the picture for which the travelling agent and the director had thought themselves justified in giving £1,977. That £370 was the full value of the picture was pretty clear from the high price which, as everybody who had been in Italy knew, the Italians, and particularly the Venetians, were in the habit of setting on their pictures. And the picture itself, so far from being in a fine state, had been much repainted. It was, in fact, what was called a "ruined picture," and £66 was paid for its restoration to one of those professors who pretended to restore but invariably destroyed. It was well known by those who took an interest in these matters that the destructions by time, damp, and neglect were as nothing when compared with the destructions of these restorers. The hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Coningham), writing on the restorations going on in our own gallery, said, "These harpies of restorers always fly at the face;" but the harpies in this country were animals not nearly so savage in their propensities as those abroad; and, indeed, to do justice to those who had charge of our gallery, he was bound to say that the pictures in the galleries abroad were in a very much worse state than those in our gallery. This purchase was a disgrace to the walls of the National Gallery, and he would engage that if it were put up at Christie's auction-room it would not fetch £200. No doubt, good purchases had been made; he admitted that. For instance, the Perugino which had been bought was one of the most beautiful pictures which he had ever seen. That there was a good ground for the outcry which was made against these gentlemen was shown by the fact that whenever they made a good purchase not a word was said against them. Nobody complained of the purchase of the Perugino. Everybody, on the contrary, was delighted. "Have you been to the gallery to see the new Perugino?" was in everybody's mouth; and certainly it was a beautiful picture. So that it was really not from a disposition to cavil at the proceedings of these gentlemen that complaints were made, but simply from a feeling that the public money had been wasted. This year the director and travelling agent had bought another Paul Veronese, for which they had given £13,650. The reading which he put on this purchase was this:—Having made a desperate mistake with their Paul Veronese last year they determined this year to buy a Veronese at which nobody could grumble. There was a Paul Veronese at the Pisani Palace which had a great celebrity, and that they determined to have. The sum, however, which they had given for it was perfectly absurd. Paul Veronese was a beautiful painter, who flourished towards the decline of the Venetian school; but, after all, he was only a decorative painter; what people most admired of his were those beautiful ceilings at the Ducal Palace and the altar-pieces in the churches at Venice. He did not inspire the same sublime emotions as Raffaele's pictures. So that the country was paying this enormous sum for a second-rate specimen (for it was by no means a first-rate specimen of Paul Veronese) of a second-rate artist. He did not deny that there might not be a better specimen in Italy, but whether it was a first, second, or third-rate specimen it was perfectly absurd to give that price for a Veronese. Had it been a Raffaele he should have had nothing to say. To show the opinion of the House on this purchase, and to teach the directors and the travelling agent to be more careful for the future, he should be very glad if some gentleman would move that the sum of £5,000, which the committee were called on to repay to the civil contingencies, should be refused, for it had all gone in this purchase. £10,000 was annually granted for the purchase of pictures, and the directors, having gone over their mark, were obliged to borrow £5,000 from the civil contingencies. To show that it had all gone on this picture he would read a few extracts from a letter of a well-known gentleman, Mr. Morris Moore [a laugh.] He saw a smile on several gentlemen's faces at this name—caused, no doubt, by the recollection of his correspondence with Lord Bloomfield—but, without attempting to justify that gentleman's conduct at Berlin, he would say that there was no man in England who was a better judge of pictures, or more conversant with their condition or market value. Having been in Venice for three months, and made inquiries on the subject, he could vouch for the accuracy of every statement in Mr. Moore's letter. The following was the account Mr. Moore gave of the way the money went:—

"The money given to Count Pisani was £12,360; banking commission to Mr. Valentine at  $\frac{1}{4}$  per cent, £70. Commissions on the pictures—1, Signor Enrico Dubois, banker (son-in-law of Pisani), £62 10s.; 2, Carlo Dubois (banker), £62 10s.; 3, Caterino Zen, Pisani's steward, £300; 4, Pietro Dezan, 2nd idem, £271 10s.; 5, Dr. Monterumici, lawyer, £271 10s.; 6, Paolo Fabris, restorer, £200; 7, Giuseppe Conurato, Pisani's valet, £12; 8, Caterina Rini, cameriera (chambermaid), £10."

He did not think that dear.

"9, Pietro Galberti, gondoliere, £6; 10, Angelini Comini, idem, £6; 11, Riccardo de Sandre, cook, £6; 12, Pietro Dorigo, porter, £6; 13, Angela Dorigo, porter's wife, £6."

He begged to read an extract from the Report of the director, Sir C. Eastlake, which would be found in the printed estimate. Sir C. Eastlake said:—

"This picture, according to family traditions and the united testimony of the historians of art, was painted by Paul Veronese for the ancestor of the present Count Pisani. According to Boschini vast sums were offered for it two centuries since, and within the last thirty years Sovereigns, public bodies, and opulent individuals have in vain endeavoured to secure it. D'Argenville states, on the authority of the Procurator Pisani of his time (the first half of the last century), that Paul Veronese, having been detained by some accident at the villa of the Pisani (at Este), painted and deposited there this work, informing the family after his departure, 'that he had left wherewithal to pay for the cost of his visit.' If this story be true the great painter has now munificently redeemed his word."

He was disposed to think, not that the painter, but that the English director had munificently, or rather wastefully and foolishly, redeemed the painter's word at the expense of the public. When in Venice, the laquais de place came in one morning and said he had such a story to tell about the Paul Veronese picture. Mr. Mündler was in a state bordering on distraction. It had been arranged that the money was to be paid without any documents being signed as to the authenticity of the painting. When Conte Pisani sold the picture he would not part with the frame. It seemed absurd, but the secret had come out. There was at the villa at Este another picture by Paul Veronese, precisely the same in subject and in size, which would fit the frame Conte Pisani had kept. Mr. Mündler, never having heard of another picture, was naturally in a state of alarm as to which was the original, and he and the restorers were about to undertake a pilgrimage to the villa in order to ascertain the fact. Up to the present hour he was unaware of the result of that visit, though no doubt the Secretary of the Treasury would be able to give them a satisfactory explanation. He did not propose to reduce the Vote by the amount of travelling expenses, which were estimated at £600. He thought there must be some travelling expenses, but he did not think there was any necessity for a travelling agent. The director ought to be his own travelling agent. The period for purchasing pictures was during the London season. The sales at Christie's, Phillips's, and Foster's commenced in February and ended in June, and at those sales the best pictures were to be bought. No one had a finer collection than his hon. Friend the Member for Brighton (Mr. Coningham), and he believed he was correct in stating that a majority of those pictures had been bought in London. But, as the object was to get a collection worthy of the nation, it was desirable that the director should also seek pictures elsewhere. During the dead season of the year—during the winter—the director should travel in Italy—and he could not imagine a more pleasing occupation than travelling at the public expense in that beautiful and classic country—in search of pictures. The director could establish in every town in Italy a local agency, and by giving a commission would obtain information of every picture which was offered for sale. In that manner he thought the business would be better done, even if it cost us as much upon the whole. Mr. Mündler, by going about Italy, had spoiled the market. Wherever he went he was known as the agent of the English Government for the purchase of pictures; prices rose a hundred-fold, and it was stated the Austrian Government had on this account issued instructions to the mayors of towns, heads of convents, and priests of churches, where fine works of art were to be found, forbidding them to give him admission. A far more effectual mode would be for the director himself to travel, and therefore he did not propose to reduce the vote by the travelling expenses, which the nation would cordially pay, although £600 a year was somewhat high, and it might possibly be that it was given to compensate for the lowness of the salary. He thought it his duty to bring the subject before the attention of the Committee, and he believed that if his suggestions were adopted there would be a better chance of their getting good pictures. He therefore moved that the Vote be reduced from £23,165 to £22,615—being less the amount of the travelling agent's salary and the reduction of the secretary's salary from £700 to £500 a year. He would rather some other hon. Gentleman would move the reduction of the £5,000 to be repaid to the civil contingencies, as some hon. Members might be willing to vote for his reduction and not for that reduction, and it was therefore better to keep the two propositions distinct. There was one point which he had omitted to mention. Last year an Act was passed, empowering the directors to sell pictures and to remove them to other places. They had sold some pictures, which he believed were very bad ones, and they had likewise transferred some to Ireland. He did not know whether the Irish Members would approve of their National Gallery being made the refuge for the rejected pictures of the National Gallery of this country. If the pictures were good they should be kept for the National Gallery, and if they were bad they should not be sent to Ireland or anywhere else.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £22,615, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expenses of the National Gallery, including the purchase of Pictures, to the 31st day of March 1858."

MR. COX said, he would not, like the noble Lord, "hint a fault, and hesitate dislike," but would go to the very bottom of the whole matter, for the statement of the noble Lord revealed such a gross system of jobbery, that he would not only refuse the £5,591 paid from civil contingencies, but the whole £10,000 asked for the current year. He followed the noble Lord in his opposition to the salary of the Secretary; for he thought £750 was too much, and £500 quite sufficient for that official; but he knew that, according to the rule of the House, if he were to vote for the noble Lord's Motion, it would be impossible for him to submit the Motion which he himself wished to make. When a proposal was made in Committee for a reduction in the Estimates, it was not permitted to any hon. Member to move that a lower sum be reduced, therefore he would go the extreme depths, and leave it to others to rise to the top time after time as they chose to do so. He objected also to the travelling agent, and on that point would support the noble Lord, but he could not agree with him in allowing the travelling expenses. The noble Lord admitted that paintings could be more advantageously purchased in London than anywhere else. He (Mr. Cox) was a mere Goth in such matters. He knew nothing of pictures, but the noble Lord did, and he said the best place to purchase pictures was in the auction room of Christie. For the very reason, therefore, that the noble Lord had given, he objected to the £650 for travelling expenses, as there could be no necessity for going to the Continent to get pictures. With regard to the picture to which the noble Lord last referred, the letter from which he read stated that the Government had obtained, not the original, but only a copy of that picture.

LORD ELCHO said, his impression of the letter was, that it did not say the picture at the Villa d'Este was the original; nor did he. All he said was, that Mr. Mündler had gone in a state of desperation to see the picture, but that to this hour he had never heard what conclusion he had arrived at.

MR. COX said, he had been distinctly told that the picture was not an original, but a copy, and that we had left the frame behind for the original to be put in. Was it not disgraceful that £12,000 should have been paid by this country for such a picture? Then, there were those extraordinary items paid by the purchaser to butlers, and cooks, and chambermaids. Why should he give £10 to a chambermaid? And, not satisfied with that, he must give £6 to a cook, and £6 to the cook's wife. When he saw this item, it puzzled him very much; for he could not conceive what a culinary professor could have to do with the sale of a picture; but it occurred to him that there was a goose to be cooked, and that, therefore, this sum was paid for cooking the British goose. Such extravagance as this was positively disgraceful. It was not often that independent Members were able to hit a blot like this; but he believed there were many such blots in the Estimates, if they could just get at all the facts connected with them. He should move that the Vote be reduced to £4,974.

. Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £4,964, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expenses of the National Gallery, including the purchase of Pictures, to the 31st day of March, 1858."

MR. WILSON said, he hoped the Committee would not be led away by the statement of his noble Friend (Lord Elcho) or of the hon. Gentleman who last spoke, for he believed he would be able to show by a faithful history of the transaction to which they had referred, that the letter of Mr. Moore, on which their account was based, was a tissue of misrepresentations. If ever the Government exhibited care and caution with regard to the purchase of a picture, they had done so on this occasion, and what they did entirely took away from Mr. Mündler the responsibility of that purchase. Many months before making a purchase so important, the Government, anxious that no misconceptions should prevail regarding it, communicated, through the Foreign Office, with Mr. Harris, our resident Consul at Venice, and employed him to take the necessary steps for authenticating and securing the picture, and so far as Mr. Mündler and the National Gallery were concerned, he was bound to acquit them entirely of the transaction, and take all the responsibility upon the Government. Several years ago this picture attracted the attention of the Government, and Lord Aberdeen authorised our Consul to endeavour to effect a purchase of it. From time to time offers were made and rejected, and at least £12,000 was demanded by Count Pisani, to which he annexed this condition, that as his domestics had for a number of years obtained a large income by the fees received for showing the picture to strangers, an additional sum should be given to compensate them for the loss they would sustain by the stoppage of the fees. The amount for compensation was found to be £1650, and under these circumstances the total sum paid was £13,650. Now, with regard to the amusing distribution of that money, so graphically described by his noble Friend, Mr. Mündler had no concern whatever with it, nor, so far as he knew, had Mr. Harris any concern with it. All that was to be done by the Government was to pay the sum agreed upon, and leave the distribution to others. The hon. Gentleman who spoke last appeared to be under an impression—which was justified, perhaps, by the letter from which he derived his information, but which nevertheless was incorrect—that Mr. Mündler had been treating with all the domestic servants respecting their particular shares. The fact was, the Government paid the money stipulated, but had nothing to do with its distribution. As to the value of the picture, that was perhaps a matter of opinion which could better be discussed after the painting had been exhibited in the National Gallery. He could only say that no one who had visited Venice could be unacquainted with the fame of that picture; that, in fact, it had a world-wide reputation. In order to show the difference of opinion that might exist upon subjects of this kind, he would mention that one gentleman, who had expressed himself most strongly against the purchase, had actually within the last twelve months himself advised the directors of the National Gallery to buy it, and had declared that the Government would be to blame to lose it, even at a cost of £20,000. The instant the purchase was made, however, that gentleman turned round and denounced the directors for having made it. [Cries of "Name!"] That gentleman was not a member of that House, and, therefore, unless the directors of the National Gallery gave permission he should decline to name him. He only mentioned the circumstance as an instance where the Government was blamed for acting upon the advice which was given by those who afterwards censured them. The noble Lord (Lord Elcho) had alluded to the constitution of the National Gallery. All that he (Mr. Wilson) could say upon that point was that, in consequence of a resolution of that House, the duty devolved upon the Treasury Board, of which the noble Lord was a Member, to frame a new constitution for the National Gallery. [Lord ELCHO: I had no share in that, and knew nothing of it.] At all events, the constitution, as framed, was submitted to and was not disapproved by the House. With respect to the question of the utility of a travelling agent, he could only say that it was the opinion of the trustees and directors that he was an officer of the highest importance to them, and he knew that at the present moment several negotiations were pending through Mr. Mündler for most important works of art. Within the last fortnight or three weeks, Mr. Mündler had been able, by his presence on the spot, to purchase pictures which, if resold, would produce a profit that would defray the salary of the agent for four or five years to come. With respect to the salary of the secretary, the noble Lord appeared to have forgotten that Mr. Wornum held the double appointment of keeper and secretary; and when he talked of Messrs. Longman or Mr. Murray producing a catalogue of the National Gallery for £750, there was no doubt that could be done if a list of the pictures was all that was required, but Mr. Wornum was a man fully qualified to produce a historical catalogue of the contents of the Gallery, and upon some such work he was now most usefully employed. Moreover, that gentleman, upon accepting his present appointment, had given up engagements which produced him £850 a year. The noble Lord had also spoken of the divided responsibility between the directors and the travelling agent, but the truth was, the duty of the latter was only to report to the directors and to act upon their instructions, having no power to make purchases of his own motion. After the discussion of last year he (Mr. Wilson) did not expect the subject of the purchase of the other Veronese would have been revived, but, as it had been, he could only repeat his former statement—that Mr. Mündler had nothing to do with that purchase, the responsibility for which rested entirely with the trustees and directors of the National Gallery. For that picture an offer had been made of £400 beyond the sum that had been paid. The hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. Cox) had moved to reduce the Vote by the amount of £5,000, which had been paid from the civil contingencies. That payment might be right or wrong, but the Government was responsible for it. If, however, the hon. Gentleman should succeed in carrying his Motion, it would have the effect of stopping several negotiations now pending for many important works, and therefore he hoped that those hon. Members who were anxious for a good National Gallery would pause before taking such a step. The hon. Gentleman also stated that he believed the picture which had been bought was not the original, but only a copy. Nothing was more unfounded than that idea, for Mr. Mündler had seen the copy at the Villa d'Este, and found that it was a wretched performance by a wretched artist, and that, moreover, the French soldiers who had at one time been quartered at the villa had amused themselves by thrusting their bayonets through the eyes of every figure in it. As to the travelling expenses, the noble Lord ought to be aware that the director was in the habit of travelling in the autumn, whenever he could, for the purpose of making or confirming purchases, in consequence of the previous inquiries of Mr. Mündler. The £650 for travelling expenses included, not only the expense of the travelling agent, but also those of the director when he found it necessary to go abroad upon the business of the Gallery. Those travelling expenses, moreover, were regulated by the Treasury, according to a fixed scale. He (Mr. Wilson) was not aware that he had any further remarks to make, but hoped that those he had made would remove false impressions, and would induce the Committee not to assent to the reduction proposed, which would have the inconvenient consequence of disturbing many negotiations now in progress, while it would not interfere with the Veronese purchase, which was now a settled and concluded affair.

MR. CONINGHAM said, he admired the courage with which the Secretary of the Treasury had undertaken to endorse the acts of Sir C. Eastlake, but it was not in the power of the hon. Gentleman to relieve him from the responsibility attaching to his office. By a Minute of the Treasury, made in 1855, it was laid down that the Director must be responsible in case of difference between himself and the trustees. That regulation imposed upon Sir C. Eastlake the responsibility for the purchase of all pictures. As personal reference had been made to him, he would clear the ground before he entered into the question of the system of management which now prevailed in the National Gallery. His noble Friend the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) had alluded to the collection of pictures which he made, stating, somewhat inaccurately, that it was principally formed in London. It was, to a considerable extent, formed in Italy; but, he had no hesitation in asserting, that if the English Government would but state that they would buy any really good pictures that might be brought to this country, they would soon be encumbered with works of art from all parts of the world. The system of management which now prevailed in the National Gallery was of recent introduction. For a long time the Gallery was managed by a Director and a body of Trustees, the former receiving, he believed, the very moderate sum of £200 a year. For many years it was composed of the Angerstein collection, and it was only recently that the stimulus which had been given to the study of the fine arts rendered it necessary that something should be done. Upon the death of Mr. Seguer, Sir Charles Eastlake, who at that time was not President of the Royal Academy, but only a member of it, was appointed to the keepership. During his occupancy of that post, a considerable number of pictures were purchased for the National Gallery; and it was hardly necessary for him (Mr. Coningham) to recall to the recollection of the Committee that one of the first purchases which Sir C. Eastlake made for the Gallery was the celebrated "Portrait of a Medical Gentleman," by Holbein, for which the sum of £630 was paid. The notoriety of that transaction relieved him from the necessity of dwelling upon it. Any gentleman who wished to satisfy himself as to the nature of the purchase had only to visit the National Gallery in Trafalgar Square, where he would see this spurious daub, a libel upon the great artist whose work it pretended to be, and which gave the public a foretaste of the subsequent purchases of Sir C. Eastlake. He might allude, among others, to the purchase of "The Youthful Saviour," by Guido, from the Harman collection, which was another downright libel upon the artist. That purchase, also, was made by Sir C. Eastlake, when keeper. The office of keeper, however, in consequence of a series of attacks made upon him in the press, Sir Charles was compelled to resign. He was succeeded by Mr. Uwins, who in his turn was obliged to retreat before a similar storm of public indignation. Afterwards Sir C. Eastlake became President of the Royal Academy, and, unfortunately for himself, ex officio Trustee of the National Gallery. In that capacity he was responsible for another series of purchases, which, to a great extent, were distinguished by the same errors as those he made when keeper. He might allude, among others, to the purchase of "The Tribute Money," by Titian, from the collection of Marshal Soult, which was undoubtedly a spurious work, and recognized as such by some of the most competent judges in Europe, and for this Sir Charles had the folly to pay the enormous sum of £2,613 3s. 2d. He would not tire the Committee by dwelling upon the purchase of the picture attributed to Pachierotto, or upon the daub ascribed to Albert Durer, but would go at once to the purchase of the Kruger collection, for which he was not certain that Sir C. Eastlake was absolutely responsible. Sure he was, however, that whoever was responsible for that purchase, was responsible for one of the worst ever made for the National Gallery. Some sixty of these pictures were purchased in a mass for £2,916 19s. 8d., and a considerable number of them were sold by public auction at Christie's, realizing something like £3 or £4 a piece, the minimum price being £2 10s., and the maximum £20. Notwithstanding the series of purchases to which he had referred, the Secretary of the Treasury had the boldness, when Sir C. Eastlake was appointed to the directorship, to rise in his place and declare that he had shown qualifications of the highest order for the office. Now, when they saw the purchases which were made under the auspices of Sir C. Eastlake, and when they remembered the process of destruction which, under the name of cleaning, was carried on in the National Gallery under the directions of that gentleman—a process which Mr. Morris Moore and himself happily succeeded in putting an end to, though not before very serious injury had been done to some of the finest pictures in the collection—he thought that they would agree with him, that the statement which he had just quoted from a former speech of the Secretary of the Treasury detracted considerably from the authority which might otherwise have been attached to his observations on the present occasion. The hon. Gentleman had plenty of evidence beforehand of the gross incapacity of the person whom he undertook to defend. The fact of the matter was, that the National Gallery was the scene of numberless intrigues, nor was it difficult to discover who pulled the wires. Sir C. Eastlake, as he had already stated, proved himself incompetent at a low salary to discharge the duties of his office. He was driven ignominiously from it, and when he became an ex officio trustee, he stated in a letter of the 17th of April, 1854, "I wish it to be clearly understood that it is not my intention to interfere in any way in future with the concerns of the National Gallery;" thus acknowledging his own incapacity and the truth of the charges which had been brought against him. Yet this gentleman, within a very short period, had the audacity—for he could call it nothing else—to accept £1,000 a year from the nation. For what? Why, for making purchases that disgraced the National Gallery, as witness "The Adoration of the Magi," ascribed to Paul Veronese. These purchases taken together amounted to the very large sum of £12,793 18s. It was hardly necessary for him to go further into the more recent purchases of Sir C. Eastlake, but he could not help pointing out to the Committee how dangerous the system was of purchasing complete collections and then selling portions of them by auction. We ought to purchase none but the very best pictures, and he had no hesitation in saying that the new system was likely to lead to unlimited jobbing. Upon a previous occasion he stated that the new plan was introduced from Berlin, and, if he was not trespassing too long upon the time and patience of the Committee, he would give them some details corroborating that statement. He begged to remind them, however, that in Berlin there was no free expression of public opinion, no real liberty of the press, and the consequence was, that the necessity for selling the worst pictures did not exist. Any hon. Member who would take the trouble of walking through the gallery in that city might see the masses of pictures that disfigured the walls upon which they were exhibited, and, were the Berlin system carried out in all its integrity here, we might behold the whole of the villanous Kruger collection, a part of which had been sent over to corrupt the taste of the Irish nation. The formation of the Berlin Gallery was of comparatively recent date. It was composed principally of pictures which originally belonged to the Solly collection, and for which 500,000 thalers were paid. He held in his hand a pamphlet, entitled, The Picture Baptism of Dr. Waagen, published at Leipsic in 1832, giving a full account of the Solly purchase, and showing also the system which prevailed in Berlin. It said:—

"The State having purchased that enormous quantity of Mr. Solly's pictures, there was a great mystery about them. It was considered a rare favour to have a look at them; perhaps they feared public opinion, and wished to make everything fine and shiny by restoration and varnish, in order to deceive the public. Berlin painters consequently were not just wished for to do this work of restoration; the workmen were sent for from abroad, and especially by Dr. Waagen, who had made proper acquaintances at Munich while he lived there. If any offer was made to a Berlin artist, the pay was so paltry that the man could not but refuse. Now, restoration began to be carried on on a grand scale, a quantity of pictures were transformed into the style of famous painters and their pupils, and enormous sums—for which real old original pictures might have been bought—were thus spent. In Mr. Solly's collection were a great many which could not be exhibited without undergoing very important restorations. For this purpose there arrived—first, a Mr. Horack from Saxony, who had been a tailor, but then felt inspired to restore old pictures. With pompous words he praised his own skill, and assured them that he was able to take off pictures from worm-eaten wood and draw them over new wood or canvas. He moreover pretended to possess a water with which to wash and clean pictures without washing them away. This master tailor, after having spoiled a number of pictures intrusted to him by private persons, was engaged by the committee of the Museum, and received a large picture from the Solly collection to remove it from the panel. Horack asked for an advance and obtained the money. Somewhat later he asked for another advance, and obtained it. Now he went on working a few days longer, then he shut up his abode and disappeared from Berlin. The committee finding the door locked, and obtaining no answer to their rappings, ordered the door to be forced, and satisfied themselves that their artist had bolted with the money, but left them the corpse of the picture to bury. An eternal silence, of course, is kept about the fate of this picture. Meanwhile Dr. Waagen had carried out his plan. For a high annual salary, the restorators, his old connections were appointed—namely, Mr. Schloßinger, Mr. Koester, and Mr. Xler. Now, the high sanhedrim was complete, a Restoration-atelier was arranged, and all the pictures of the State entrusted to it to be sentenced to life or death."

That was the system which Dr. Waagen had introduced into Berlin, and he respectfully submitted to the Committee that a very similar system had been introduced through the instrumentality of Sir C. Eastlake into our National Gallery. He thanked the Committee for the very courteous manner in which it had listened to him; but he could not sit down without alluding to another point to which public attention ought to be directed. They were constantly told that the true models for study and for educational purposes were of the modern school of art. On that subject he would quote the words of Sir Joshua Reynolds, who said:—

"The modern who recommends himself as a standard may justly be suspected as ignorant of the true end and unacquainted with the proper object of the art which he professes. To follow such a guide will not only retard the student, but mislead."

He was opposed to this novel theory, and in favour of reverting to the pictures of the 15th and 16th centuries for our models, and he thought that works of that description should almost alone be purchased for the National Gallery.

Mr. HENLEY said that, as he understood it, three objections had been taken on the present Vote. First, as to the selections that had been made in the purchase of pictures; secondly, as to the employment of the travelling agent; and, thirdly, as to the spending of money without the authority of Parliament. He should say, that the explanation of the Secretary for the Treasury, in answer to those objections, was rather an alarming one. The Vote was objectionable enough as it stood in the Estimates; but the explanation given of it, instead of mending the matter, only tended to give it a more serious complexion. A good deal had been said about the increase in the Civil Service Estimates; but let the Committee consider for a moment the Vote now before them in comparison with what it was in former years. In 1848 the Estimate for the National Gallery paintings was £5,000. From that amount it had increased till in 1854-55 it was £6,600; in 1855-56, £16,000; in 1856-57, £12,000; and this year it assumed the moderate proportions of £23,000. From this it appeared that the Estimate was going on at a very comfortable rate, to say the least of it. It could not be said that in this respect art was neglected in England. But the most alarming feature in the business was this—the noble Lord and others complained that a sum of between £5,000 and £6,000 had been paid without the sanction of Parliament. The Secretary to the Treasury replied, "That is quite a mistake. If you choose to censure the Government, well and good; but Parliament put £100,000 in their hands to pay for anything that happens to need paying, or for what are called urgent matters;" but if this argument of the hon. Gentleman was admitted, the House might next year be called upon to grant, not £23,000, but a sum of £123,000. He thought that the case was put in rather too broad a way by the Government; because, if the doctrine of the Secretary to the Treasury as to the discretion vested in the Government held good, the House of Commons having voted a specific sum for the purchase of paintings, there was nothing to hinder them from increasing the amount by £100,000, without a question being asked by anybody. Surely, however, the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Wilson) had pushed the right of the Government to an extravagant length. Now, let them see how what was called the travelling agent worked. They had been told that the Government had been nibbling at a certain picture since 1853. It seemed very clear from the negotiations carried on in respect of that picture that the country had not derived much advantage from this travelling agent on that ground, unless the advance of price which was the necessary consequence of that nibbling process could be called an advantage. They were informed that the picture in question had more than a European—that it had a world-wide reputation; that everybody who had been anywhere had seen it. If so, it could scarcely have been necessary to have a travelling agent at £600 a year, with travelling expenses, “nibbling” at it for four years. It appeared, that so far back as 1853 the picture was valued at £12,000, which sum the owner asked for it, on which the trustees recommended the Government to give £10,500, honestly saying at the same time it was worth £12,000. Now, that was a curious way of doing business. In his (Mr. Henley’s) opinion, if they thought a man was asking a fair price for an article, it was better to give him his own money, for if they attempted to beat him down, they might be sure he would make a fool of them afterwards, and it would serve them right if he did. This had been the case with this picture. The price asked for it in 1853 was £12,000, but the price paid for it in 1856 was £13,650. That was what was got by offering £10,500 for a work of art admitted to be worth £12,000. Moreover, he was not at all consoled by being informed that the alleged copy of this picture was “a wreck,” for the term “wreck” was never applied to what had always been worthless. Then came the question how this Vote was to be dealt with. The amount by which it was proposed to be reduced was larger than he could approve of, but if the proposition were to reduce it by the sum overpaid last year, he should be glad to give it his support, upon the ground that if the House agreed to give £10,000 a year for pictures, it was a pretty clear indication that they did not mean that the Government should go and spend £15,000. To the Amendment so altered he should be happy to give his assent.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he regretted to take any part in the discussion, because the House never appeared to less advantage than when they discussed the merits of individual pictures, and when speeches were made in tones far more intemperate and violent than upon other occasions. Upon matters of taste gentlemen proverbially differed, but, surely they could express their different opinions without imputations of incapacity, much less of jobbery or dishonesty. He was somewhat surprised to hear from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr.

Henley) an objection that the Government had spent in a single year more than the £10,000 set apart for the purchase of pictures. He could quite understand the right hon. Gentleman if he said that no more pictures ought to be paid for out of the public purse, and that the present system ought to be abandoned. But he could not understand him if he said that because an estimate of £10,000 had been agreed to for the purchase of pictures, therefore the purchase of pictures by the Government during the following year should be strictly limited to that amount. He was surprised to hear so strange a doctrine advanced by so acute and intelligent a Gentleman as the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire. With regard to this particular picture he would not pretend to give any decided opinion. All that he knew was that he had been several times at Venice, and he had never been there without hearing it spoken of as one of the principal ornaments of Venice. He never doubted that it was a picture of as established a European reputation as any that could be mentioned. It might be true that the Venetian school did not rank so high as others. He believed that the purer taste of modern times had lowered the estimation of the Venetian school, but that did not prevent it from being a most important school. And surely when an opportunity occurred for this country obtaining possession of a work of one of the most celebrated masters of that school, it was not surprising that those who had the direction of these things should think it of importance to secure such a picture for the country. It might be said, “that is very true, but a most unreasonable sum was given for it.” That, however, was a question of opinion. The House would recollect that a picture by Murillo was sold at a public auction at Paris, a few years ago. Murillo was a great painter, but not one of the greatest painters in the world; and he (Mr. Labouchere) did not think that picture was one of the finest specimens of his work. It was sold openly. There was no jobbery nor travelling agent, nor any of those suspicious circumstances on which some hon. Gentlemen had laid so much stress. And what took place? There were competitors; and who were they? The Emperor of the French, the Emperor of Russia, and a rich English nobleman. The picture was sold, he believed, for £25,000. [Lord ELCHO: £23,000.] A most astounding sum, he must say. If he were to hazard an opinion, he would say that the Paul Veronese was cheaper at the sum that had been given for it than the Murillo at £23,000. He thought that they would make a very bad exchange if they parted with their Paul Veronese for the Murillo of the Emperor of the French. But however that might be, he should not have risen on the present occasion but for his anxiety to do justice to a distinguished man. He deeply regretted that they could not discuss matters of this kind without making personal attacks upon Sir Charles Eastlake. He had had the honour of his acquaintance for several years, and all who knew him felt that there was not a man of higher integrity, purer character, or greater accomplishments in this country. He believed that he was one of the most learned and accomplished artists that this country possessed. He regretted to hear his hon. Friend the Member for Brighton (Mr. Coningham), than whom there could be no better judge on this subject, bring into this debate personal attacks upon Sir Charles Eastlake. His hon. Friend had said that Sir Charles Eastlake had shown his incapacity by the manner in which he had managed the National Gallery and overlooked the cleaning and preservation of the pictures. He appealed from him to his noble Friend who introduced this question. His noble Friend stated—and he believed truly—that there was not a great collection of pictures in Europe that was not far worse treated than the National Gallery with respect to cleaning. He (Mr. Labouchere) was not a very competent judge of these matters, but he had visited most of the picture galleries in Europe, and he was able to form some opinion on them. He would refer merely to two of the most celebrated galleries in Europe—the gallery at Madrid, one of the noblest in the world, and the great gallery at Dresden. He believed that some of the pictures in both those collections had been injured by injudicious cleaning, carried on under the superintendence of those who ought to have been their guardians and preservers, but who, in truth, were their destroyers. His noble Friend had said most truly that Sir C. Eastlake deserved great praise for the very careful manner in which the cleaning and restoration of the pictures in the National Gallery had been carried on. It was to him that we owed, in a great degree, the present state of those pictures. He (Mr. Labouchere) sat on the Committee that made inquiries some years ago into the manner in which the pictures were being cleaned and restored, and when he recollected the evidence that was then given as to the injudicious manner in which they had been treated up to that time, he thought the country had reason to rejoice that so much care and vigilance had since been exercised in their preservation. But be that as it might, he believed that it served no purpose to discuss the merits of a particular picture on this Vote. If the House believed that the system of purchasing pictures for the nation out of the public purse was bad, let them alter it. If they believed that those to whom the management of this matter was entrusted were incompetent, let them say so. He did not believe that they were incompetent. A man abler than Sir C. Eastlake to superintend the National Gallery could not be found. It was not to be supposed that he or any other man could please everybody in every purchase of pictures which he made. He did not know how it happened, but as far as his experience went, he did not find that a love and practice of the fine arts made men more charitable or amicable. People talked of the odium theologicum, but the odium of the professors and critics of art against each other was the most envenomed that he knew. He never could discover exactly whence it proceeded, but that it existed was indisputable. What would the House think of calling a private collector over the coals for every picture that he purchased? Where was the private collector that had not committed some mistake? His hon. Friend the Member for Brighton (Mr. Coningham) had had a very beautiful collection of pictures. They were sold some years ago in this capital. No one could visit that collection without seeing that it evinced on the part of its owner great taste and great knowledge of the art. But at the same time he recollected that it contained two pictures which betrayed a want of judgment. His hon. Friend, therefore, ought to be more indulgent when he made criticisms on the purchases for the National Gallery; for he was sure that there was no one, who had ever been engaged in the purchase of pictures, who would not concur in the remark of Napoleon, “that those are the most fortunate who have committed the fewest blunders.” If the Committee wished that no power at all should be given for buying pictures, or that the duty of purchasing them should be entrusted to other hands, let it say so;

but if they were to collect pictures for the National Gallery, he thought the sum they now asked was very moderate, and believing it would be safe to entrust the control of the expenditure to a man of such high honour and integrity, and enlightened and pure judgment as Sir Charles Eastlake, he should regret extremely if the Committee did not agree to the Vote before it.

MR. STIRLING said, he had, on a former occasion, asked his right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone), who was at the time Chancellor of the Exchequer, for some explanation as to the purchase of the Krüger collection, but that explanation had never been given. He begged, therefore, now to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, upon whose professional advice that collection was purchased for the National Gallery. His right hon. Friend the Secretary for the Colonies had already so well defended Sir Charles Eastlake that he should not trouble the Committee with any observations on that point; but he did think Mr. Mündler had been badly used. The noble Lord (Lord Elcho) had told a story which he heard from his laquais de place at Venice. Now, if every hon. Gentleman would retail the stories which they heard from their laquais de place, perhaps the Committee would be enlivened with some anecdotes about the noble Lord and his pictures. The noble Lord, however, went to Venice, talked to his laquais de place, and then favoured hon. Members with his anecdote. Now, he (Mr. Stirling) remarked that his noble Friend carefully avoided giving any opinion as to the authenticity of the Pisani picture, and did not authenticate a single statement of Mr. Morris Moore, although he read the whole of that Gentleman's letter; he merely amused the Committee with his story, and left the subject where he found it. But, as his noble Friend was on the spot for several months, and had formed an intention last year to bring the subject of the National Gallery before the House, might he not have sent his laquais de place to Este, or have ordered his gondola and have ascertained for himself whether the Pisani picture in the palace or that in the villa—which he did not see—was the original? He thought his noble Friend might have spent a few hours in this way most agreeably to himself and very usefully to the country. With regard to Mr. Mündler, he knew nothing of that gentleman or of his qualifications, but was aware that he received £300 a year, and had his share of the travelling expenses, which, he believed amounted altogether to £650. Now, some four or five years ago, Mr. Uwins and the late Mr. Woodburn, the picture dealer, were sent, at the expense of the Government, to report on one of the collections at Venice—the Manfrini, he believed. No purchase was effected, but that single journey cost the country £400 or £500, or very nearly what was paid for the services of Mr. Mündler all the year round. As the suggestion that agents should be employed in every town of Italy and Germany to supply the place of a travelling agent, he would ask the Committee what the expense of purchases so effected would be. The ordinary percentage which a picture dealer expected on these commissions was 10 per cent, and at this rate the purchase of the Pisani picture would have cost £1,300 for agency alone. With regard to the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Coningham) he would only say that, having for a long time enjoyed his friendship and been acquainted with his works, he wished the hon. Member had amused the Committee with extracts from his own writings, instead of quoting his very dull friend the Berlin pamphleteer. In his own pamphlets the hon. Member had, more happily than he had done to-night, reflected with great asperity on the management of the National Gallery; but after all, of what did he accuse the directors? The head and front of Sir Charles Eastlake's offence, as stated by his hon. Friend, amounted to this—that having made a mistake in the purchase of some picture, he had the candour and manliness to own it, and that on several occasions he had expressed considerable diffidence of his own judgment. Now, these were two errors into which picture collectors were not apt to fall; at all events, he had never heard that his hon. Friend and the noble Lord had ever done so. With regard to the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Henley), he thought it a very good one. If a certain sum (which should be a large and liberal one) were voted annually for the expenses of the National Gallery and the purchase of pictures, it would be much better than the present arrangement, and the deficiency of one year might be made up from the excess of another.

MR. WILSON said, the collection to which the hon. Member referred was not included in the present Estimates. It was purchased in 1853, and paid for in 1854;

but in the absence of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gladstone), who was Chancellor of the Exchequer at that time, he was sorry that he was not able to say on whose professional advice it had been purchased. The collection was bought in consequence of the advice of certain persons who were qualified to express an opinion upon it; but he was bound to say that they were not the trustees of the National Gallery.
